George W. Titus entered upon his work to assist at the Humboldt St. Church, Brooklyn, Feb. 11. Mr. Titus will give special attention to the young people of the church. Already an increased interest is evident in the work and the outlook is good for a most aggressive work. We have a men's organization of thirty-five members; a Y. P. S. C. E. of forty members; a Sunday-school of 256; a sewing class for the girls of sixty members; a splendid Athletic Club meeting each Tuesday that crowds our limited room. We have a church membership of 253, of which number about 150 live near the church and are earnest consecrated workers whose consecrated lives count very largely in the work. With a larger equipment a most efficient work can be done that will count for truth and righteousness in this great manufacturing section of the city.

C. A. Donnelson has been holding a meeting at the Ridgewood Heights Church. The principal object has been to get our work and teaching before the community, and strengthen and build up the church. The definite aim has been to a large extent accomplished. The work has been most efficiently done. An interesting part of this mission is the growing Sunday-school with an attendance of about 100 every Sunday.

Evangelist Henry F. Lutz will begin a campaign at the Borough Park Church the last of this month. This work is being well organized. They have now a membership of forty. With an optimistic hopeful church, the outlook is promising for a good meeting.

Fred M. Gordon is crowding the Flatbush Church. The Sunday-school has already outgrown its quarters. They will be compelled to face the problem of building before long.

Sunday, Feb. 25, a Russian baptismal service was held at the Humboldt St. Church. Two excellent men were buried with their Lord in baptism to rise to walk in the new life. The entire service was conducted in the Russian tongue, and entered into most heartily by all present. The regular services of this mission are being well attended. We are gaining the sympathy of many of the Russian people. We have in New York City 478,200 Russians and 7,400 from Finland. Our mission is in the heart of the Russian section, and if an adequate building could be secured a great work could be accomplished.

Brooklyn is completing preparation for the eight-day campaign of the Men and Religion Forward Movement to be held March 19-26. Our church and men are heartily co-operating in this movement. We are expecting it will bring to us some valuable information and give us a more intelligent and practical view of our field.

The annual dinner of the Disciples' Missionary Union, held at Hotel Marseilles Feb. 27, reached the high standard set for this gathering. About 200 Disciples sat down together and enjoyed the most delightful evening of the whole year. The general topic considered was "Christian Union." Rev. Geo. Alexander, D. D., Moderator of the New York Presbytery, was the principal speaker of the evening. Dr. J. M. Philputt, acting pastor of the Central Church, and Mrs. Atwater, of Indianapolis, also gave most inspiring addresses.

JOSEPH KEEVIL,
Supt. of City Missions.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
CENTRAL CHURCH
New York, 142 West 81st St. Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

BOWLDEN BELLS
FOR CHURCH AND SCHOOL
Sweet Tone
Far Sounding
Durable
Catalogue Free.
AMERICAN BELL & FOUNDRY CO., NORTHVILLE, MICH.

WE READ and clip for you daily everything printed in the current country and city press of America pertaining to the subject of particular interest to you.
NEWSPAPERS contain many items daily which would inform you exclusively of where you can secure new business, an order or a contract; where a new store has been started, a new firm incorporated or a contract is to be let. A daily press clipping service means more business
FOR YOU. Send Stamp for Booklet
THE CONSOLIDATED PRESS CLIPPING CO.
1109 167 W. Washington St., Chicago, U. S. A.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS. THE WINTER OF 1912 SURPASSES ALL RECORDS

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a 'liberal' in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

THREE COPIES
Willett Prof H L
1220 E 56th St

Vol. XXIX March 21, 1912 Number 12

IN THIS ISSUE

PLANNING FOR THE SUMMER GARDEN
BY IDA WITHERS HARRISON

UNION OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS IN CHINA
PLAN URGED BY DR. J. L. BARTON

CHRISTIAN SERVICE ON AMERICAN-MEXICAN BORDER
BY JESSIE L. P. BROWN

THE LOST ART OF DISCUSSION
BY WILLIAM E. BARTON

GAINS IN GIFTS TO AMERICAN AND FOREIGN MISSIONS ANNOUNCED BY THE SECRETARIES

EDITORIALS
THE AUDACITY OF MISSIONS
THE GREAT DECISION—A LENTEN STUDY
ON REPRESENTING THE DISCIPLES
WHAT DISCIPLES DO NOT BELIEVE—ILLUSTRATED

CHICAGO

AN EXCELLENT START

The returns from the March Offering for the first thirteen days of March are most encouraging in spite of the stormiest weather we have ever known during the March Offering season.

First of all, 372 churches have responded, a gain of 81 over the corresponding days last year. The churches, as churches, have sent in the thirteen days $10,831, a gain of $4,815. This is an increase of 80 per cent. This is very encouraging to those who are interested in the spread of the gospel. We congratulate the churches upon their splendid start. And on behalf of the tired and anxious missionaries we express sincere thanks to the churches for the interest they have taken.

The total receipts from all sources for the thirteen days of March amount to $16,597, a gain of $4,231. This is an advance of 34 per cent. Last year there was $2,600 Annuity receipts more than this year. That amount has been overcome by regular receipts and still there is a good gain.

Thirteen new Living-links have been enrolled this year, and others are expected.

The total gains of the year to date amount to $13,006. The total gains from the churches as churches, for this time amount to $9,896. The total number of contributing churches from October 1, 1911, to March 13, 1912, is 304. These gains all cheer all Christian hearts.

We will be pardoned for expressing the sincere hope that the churches will be prompt in forwarding their contributions. The money is greatly needed. If we make a good gain during March, we are almost sure of an encouraging gain for the year.

There is widespread interest in this March Offering. The friends are rallying to the support of the work in a most encouraging way. There have been some exceptionally liberal gifts. We rejoice in the hope that the churches this year will go away beyond the record of any previous year.

Please send to F. M. Rains, Secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, who will promptly return a proper receipt.

Notes from the Foreign Society

Dr. L. F. Jaggard and wife sailed for the Congo on the S. S. Baltic March 14.

Some friends in the First Church, Louisville, Ky., will provide a memorial hospital at Longa, Africa, in memory of the late Dr. William Bailey, who for forty years was a consecrated member and an honored elder of that church.

The church and Sunday-school at Sullivan, Ind., will give far more for foreign missions this year than in any previous offering. Frank E. Jaynes is the new pastor. Mrs. Jaynes is a sister of Dr. C. C. Drummond, missionary of the Foreign Society at Harda, India.

The offering of the church at Uniontown, Pa., has already passed $400 and will be greatly increased.

The Central church, Huntington, W. Va., W. B. Hendershot, minister, has raised $400 for foreign missions and expect another $100 in June, and altogether a Living-link fund is assured.

"You will be glad to hear that four were baptized here on Dec. 31, and seventy-one in January."—Herbert Smith, Lotumbe, Congo.

The official board of the Broadway Christian church, Louisville, Ky., W. N. Briney, pastor, has decided to organize itself into a mission study class.

W. R. Holder was appointed a missionary to Africa at the last meeting of the executive committee. He will go out this spring or the early summer. He will be supported by the churches in Birmingham, Ala.

A number of new Annuity gifts have been received in the past few days.

The First Church, Los Angeles, Cal., Russell F. Thrapp, minister, reached the greatest offering in the history of that church. The amount was $1,300.

T. E. Winter, Fulton, Mo., sending $456 on their Living-link Fund, says, "We shall easily reach the required $600. We dedicate our beautiful new church March 10, but we felt that we must take care of our missionary obligations first."

"We will raise the money to keep Miss Franklin in India and we hope to have a little extra."—J. Boyd Jones, Anderson, Ind.

The offering of the Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, Ohio, has already amounted to $1,240. This is a record for this congregation. I. H. Goldner is the minister.

W. A. Fite, Paducah, Ky., says, "Count on us for $600 for the support of our missionary C. F. McCall, in Japan.

ECHOES FROM THE MARCH OFFERING.

"We took our best Foreign Offering last Sunday. —L. E. Sellers, Philadelphia, Pa.

"We will be responsible for our Living-link this year."—M. B. Ainsworth, Georgetown, Ky.

"Today was one of the stormiest this winter, but our offering reached $200 and everybody is happy." —W. S. Bullard, Bluefield, W. Va.

"Severe snow storm. Offering $166. Will reach apportionment."—J. H. Craig, Logansport, Ind.

"I think apportionment doubled."—G. H. Sims, Medina, Ohio.

"Offering from Sonniat Church $120."—F. D. Macey, New Orleans, La.

"We will give attention to the March Offering in a few days. We are now in a revival with 629 additions in twelve days more to come."—P. H. Welshimer, Canton, Ohio.

"Offering $400. We will become a Living-link."—J. E. Parker, Bozeman, Mont.

The splendid church at Danville, Ky., was the first to send the March offering of $600 to support their missionary, James Ware at Shanghai, China. H. C. Garrison is the minister of that church and Fred Harris is the treasurer.

Great Premium Offer

in connection with

The Gospel of the Kingdom

BY JOSIAH STRONG

The Lessons in Social Christianity, published monthly by The New Christian Century Co., are now used by hundreds of classes throughout the country. The subscription price, 50 cents per year, brings them within the reach of all members of a class.

We believe the message they contain should be heard by every Bible, Adult Sunday School, or Y. M. C. A. Class, and Church Brotherhood in the country. To this end, and to repay somewhat the work of organizing classes, we offer

FREE

To Any Minister or Layman

who organizes a new class, or induces a class already organized, to take up these studies, and who secures

50 ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS OR OVER

One cloth-bound copy of The New

Encyclopedia of Social Reform

Edited by W. D. P. BLISS Price, $7.50

"A perfect mine of information."—Dr. ALBERT SHAW, Editor "Review of Reviews."

This is a great chance for you to get the most authoritative treasury of social facts and forces extant—and without costing you a cent. Remember The Gospel of the Kingdom is only 50 cents a year—it really does not cost so much as is usually paid for Sunday School quarterlies. And it comes fresh every month.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY COMPANY 700 East 40th Street, Chicago

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Bishop Gore on Social Reconstruction

The Social Obligations of Christians was the theme of an address by Bishop Gore at a meeting of the Westminster Branch of the Christian Social Union in London. Among other striking passages we quote this from the Churchman:

Our Lord, people say, was not a social reformer. Think of it! If he had come into our churches and said what he said about poverty and wealth, what would be said today? What would be said of one who today had the audacity to get up and articulate those words in our ordinary congregation? People would not call it social reform. They would call it something a great deal worse. And look at our Lord's tremendous and awful words about wealth, words which no one of us who are wealthy, rich in income, can read today without trembling through and through. Then look, on the other hand, what he means by poverty. Is he sanctioning our slums? Ask yourselves. You know. He said "Blessed are the poor." Think of the people he said "Blessed are the poor" to. The apostles and the like of them, what were they? Were they like our poor, the people we call poor—the people who live in our slums? Were they the people oppressed and crushed with the hopelessness of external conditions? Not a bit of it! They belonged to what we should call the well-to-do artisan class. If you look at his denunciations of the rich, and if you look at what he meant by his benedictions of the poor, and then think of what our society is, I dare any of you to say that was not a revolutionary doctrine. It is only that we are so used to the sound of the words that they can be uttered in any one of our congregations and not seem revolutionary doctrine. Do you say he was not a social reformer? What did he do? He founded the church—the society of brethren. If there is any person here who says, "I want to adopt the method of Jesus Christ; I do not want to go mixing up with your dirty politics; I want to follow pure religion," I will say, "Well, go and do it." That is pure religion. That is the most revolutionary thing you can do. That is what turned the world upside down."

Incidents in the Life of Principal Fairbairn

When Principal Fairbairn went to Oxford in 1886 the influence of Cardinal Newman was still a factor in the religious life in England. Against that influence the great non-conformist was to exert his vast learning and devotion, and to add to all that makes for the intellectual development of a people in the sphere of religion. He succeeded in turning the thought of his age away from Newmanism, and into other and, as we believe, more vital channels. "Anglicans regretfully but frankly, in homage to truth, confessed that the greatest theological scholar and the weightiest intellect in Oxford was Fairbairn," says Dr. George A. Gordon in the Congregationalist. Continuing Dr. Gordon says:

"Dr. Fairbairn impressed every one as a man of vast resources. He had an extraordinary memory; he had long been a systematic and laborious student; the result was an enormous range of accurate and important learning. When he accepted the principalship of Mansfield College he was recognized as the most learned man in Great Britain in 'the Religions of the World.' This had come to be his special field after prolonged and profound philosophic discipline. His cherished purpose was to write a book upon this subject worthy of its importance, of his attainments and insight, and of the general need of the Christian Church. This alluring vision he surrendered that he might plant non-conformity in Oxford; this ideal he bequeathed to other scholars and thinkers that he might do another permanent but local administrative service. The character of the man looms through that painful but complete sacrifice like a great mountain."

The other incident, taken from the Literary Digest, is worthy of the attention of us all in an age of transition. People who have awakened to the fact that this is an age of changing creeds have done so because of their discovery of the fact that there are problems yet unsolved, questions unanswered, investigations yet to be made. Those who have settled all the questions and cast their conclusions into stereotyped form for the benefit of posterity will not appreciate the condition of mind in which we find Principal Fairbairn at one time, nor will they find much satisfaction, in the light of their own treatment of those who enter the ministry with problems unsolved, in the gracious results that attended this famous man's study and patience. It is fashionable these days with a certain type of mind to elbow out of the ministry every man who is not cock-sure of the greatest questions which have disturbed the minds of the best of men. Theology with such is regarded in the same light as the multiplication table, no room for difference, and no room for growth; once learned, it is learned forever. To hesitate, to doubt, to take time for investigation, to ask for more light, is in the minds of some good people the surest sign of unbelief, to be remedied only by denunciation and exclusion. The ignorant arrive at conclusions in a hurry and leave no room for revision. It is not so with the greatest minds; learning with them is a slow process. But to our story:

His career as a minister narrowly escaped wreck at the outset. Much reading and thinking brought about mental development and doubts, and so it came to pass that, in a village where theological views, however antiquated, were held with grim tenacity, the young preacher began to feel that he was not in a sphere that promised usefulness. He found himself obliged to resign his pastorate, and determined to study for a while in the freer intellectual atmosphere of the German universities. "I had forsaken the church of my fathers," he wrote, "and now no father of any church would consent to illumine a man made humble by failure. And so in a mood composed partly of hope, but largely of despair, I determined to seek abroad the light I could not find at home."

But the clouds were to pass over and the sun to shine again. In Germany Fairbairn "found himself," and strengthened by contact with German thought, he was able to return to his native land with doubts resolved and faith renewed. In 1872 he began a five-years' successful ministry in Aberdeen, a city to which he was afterward bound in many strong ties of affection. The university appreciated his erudition, and professors and students alike flocked to his ministry. As a preacher he had developed greatly, and his fame spread beyond the confines of the city. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the chair of moral philosophy at Aberdeen University, but in 1877 there came to him a call to Yorkshire to take up what proved to be his life work—the training of others for the ministry. For nine years he labored as principal of Airedale Independence College at Bradford, fitting himself for the larger sphere that was to open up for him.

"Club My Sheep"

The Religious Telescope (United Brethren) has an excellent cartoon on its pages every week, but the one bearing the above 'revised' Scripture in a recent issue, and the pastor belaboring the innocent flock, is strikingly suggestive. How often unwise shepherds have turned the staff into a club, and resorted to the madness of driving rather than to the gentler art of leading. No field is green to an abused flock; life is a stern necessity with dark skies and scanty pasturage. If sheep cannot be led they will not be driven long. When the driving period comes in the pastor's ministry it is time that he was committing the sheep to gentler hands. The true pastor knows the sheep, their needs, and the care that they will appreciate. God is our pastor, and were he not more patient with us than we with each other, the ills of life would never be borne. 'Feed my sheep,' is our work, the clubbing must be left to other hands.

A Four Million Dollar Campaign

New York City is maintaining its reputation for being foremost among the cities of the nation in good works. The following items from the Congregationalist and Christian World introduce us to the plans that are now on foot for the furtherance of the work among the Y. M. C. A., and the Y. W. C. A. of that city.

"The Y. M. C. A. already has in New York several great buildings with finely equipped rooms of every sort, but the Young Women's Association has had no adequate equipment for the great work it should do in the city. There are thousands of girls boarding in New York City who would like a Christian home and who would enjoy social advantages they have no way of procuring. Consequently a joint campaign of Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. has just been decided upon for the raising of $4,000,000. Three-fourths of this is to go to the young women's work and $1,000,000 to strengthening the work for young men. Mr. George W. Perkins is chairman of teh committee that will wage the campaign and Miss Grace H. Dodge the vice-chairman. The plans adopted for the development of the Y. W. C. A. with this $3,000,000 are interesting. A $6,000,000 building will be erected near East Twenty-third street, to be the central branch. A new half-million dollar building is to be placed in Harlem. A $350,000 boarding house for girls is to be erected at some central point. This is gratifying, for it is exceedingly difficult for girls in New York to get light, pretty rooms, where there are also parlors and dining halls at prices they can pay. A $400,000 home for nurses is also planned, to be known as the Central Club, where the hundreds of trained nurses in the city can have a home. One of the great needs is a suitable building for the National Board of the Y. W. C. A. with a training school for secretaries. Consequently, $8,000,000 will be spent for that. The rest of the funds are to go for the enlargement of the buildings already in existence. The $1,000,000 for the Y. M. C. A. will go for two new buildings costing together $750,000 and for enlarged equipments of the present plant. It is also proposed to build a new branch for the colored men's work. We can conceive of no better ways of spending this large sum than for making Christian homes for the great army of young men and women in this great city."

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN. ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

A Peculiar People

In youth we are apt to have very crude notions as to the relation of our experiences to those of the rest of mankind. We think we are not at all like other persons. In maturity our judgments are more accurate. We do not lose the sense of individuality but we feel that there is an element in all our experience that is shared with others. We are not so different from the average man as we imagined.

It is possible for groups of men to set themselves off from the rest of the human race and exalt themselves in their own opinion when there is not the slightest ground for their feeling of importance. This being true, it would seem to be the wisest course for the disciple of Jesus to spend as little time as possible in meditating upon his peculiarities. The Master did not call us to himself that we might enjoy a sense of superiority over those who do not heed his call. We can well afford to let the world note in what respects we are unlike its representatives.

If, when we are trying to live respectable rather than consecrated lives, we should forget ourselves and really lose our selfishness in the endeavor to do the will of God, then we may need to justify ourselves for being unlike the world. The first disciples were controlled by motives that were strange to the popular mind of the day. They were therefore forced to contrast their ideals with the ideals of the world. In so far as the ideals of Jesus have become authoritative in the world, the distinction between the church member and the man outside has disappeared. Many who do not call themselves Christian are nevertheless living up to many of the teachings of Jesus. It is the apostle of social righteousness, the self-denying missionary and the honest thinker, that open our eyes to the fact that the followers of Jesus, if they are to be such in more than name, must advocate practices which the world ridicules and rule their conduct by motives that are still absurd to the world.

The peculiarity of Christians is that they are devoted to holy living. The holy living that is Christian is characteristic of all who have any right to call themselves disciples of Jesus. There is no class to whom we can assign the task of living the devout life while the rest of us engage in the pursuit of wealth and pleasure. The pious William Law writes: "It is not left to any women in the world to trifle away their time in the follies and impertinences of a fashionable life, nor to any men to resign themselves to worldly cares and concerns; it is not left to the rich to gratify their passions in the indulgences and pride of life, nor to the poor to vex and torment their hearts with the poverty of their state; but men and women, rich and poor, must, with bishops and priests, walk before God in the same wise and holy spirit, in the same denial of all vain tempers, and in the same discipline and care of their souls; not only because they all have the same rational nature, and are servants of the same God, but because they all want the same holiness, to make them fit for the same happiness, to which they are all called."

Christians should be distinguished by the belief that all men have a right to know God and enjoy his love. They will, of course, meet the scorn of many ignorant and foolish men who are of the opinion that the only men whom God loves are white men who speak the English language. Men whose prosperity in business depends upon the ignorance and depravity of non-Christian races denounce the missionary enterprise and call the missionaries bad names. To stand for the rights of men is a most glorious peculiarity. "Leave the dead to bury their own dead." We can depend upon the people of America to do many things that are right. It is the province of the disciple of Jesus to lead in right doing and point out the necessity of doing the unusual.

Our civilization is only partially Christian. There is nothing strange in this fact. Religion comes by growth in races as well as in individuals. To say that we are only partially Christian is to say that we are still in the period of growth. It is to be hoped that many milleniums will pass before we come to the place where we can see no chance for improvement in laws and customs. There will doubtless be need of adjustments as long as the human race exists on the earth. It should be the peculiarity of all who call themselves Christians that they see where improvement can be made in the social order and that they strive unselfishly to bring about such improvement. [Midweek Service, March 27. 1 John 2:15-17; 1 Pet. 4:1-7.]

S. J.

The Great Decision

A LENTEN STUDY.

To one who enters with sympathy into the study of Jesus' temptation, there comes inevitably the consciousness of its reality and fierceness. The conception of its pictorial and dramatic character is increasingly unconvincing. It was an experience that tried to the utmost his reserves of moral strength. It compelled him to make the supreme choice of his life. The writers of the Gospels unite with the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews in the view that it was a real and testing temptation.

* * *

Nor could it have been the mere lure of common things that searched out all the hidden places in the character of Jesus and brought him to such a depth of agony. No desire for food, however imperious; no love of a persuasive and compelling public display of power; no political ambitions to rule over the nations of the earth, could have exercised over his character the terrible spell to which the temptation subjected him. On other levels the meaning of this experience must be sought.

* * *

It was with him as with all men of great ideals. The strongest appeal is not made by open evil but by the second best. It is only the shallowest and least worthful natures that can be allured by the seduction of things actually bad. It is the shaded grays rather than the forbidden blacks that solicit and urge the soul to compromise with the white purity of the best things.

* * *

Men are not often tempted to absolute and fraudulent falsehood. Lying, simple and base, makes little appeal to a nature with the least sensitiveness. But the innumerable shadings of truth to which resort is had in the desire to be amiable or successful seduce the mind to a gray compromise, to which in its supreme moments of insight it would never yield itself.

* * *

Probably few natures are tempted to murder. No one wishes to do violence upon another unless the evil within him has definitely asserted its supremacy over the good. Hatred rarely rises to murderous expression. But there are many half-tones of jealousy, envy, suspicion, grudging and unfriendliness which find place in the music of life without seeming to reduce it to utter discord. And it is these compromises with murder which win tolerance in natures that would be shocked to know the meaning of the sentiments so harbored, when assessed in the light of a supreme standard. One of the most discriminating judgments Jesus ever passed upon human character was his pronouncement of the murderous character of hatred. It opened to the world the knowledge that motive and not action is the true test of life.

* * *

The number of men who would openly accept the vocation of a thief is small in proportion to the multitude who covet the experience of honesty and honor. Yet the modern world is full of such compromises with business fidelity as to breed disquiet where only confidence should prevail. Investments not actually fictitious but so near the border line of fraud that they are certain to impose upon the credulous, fill the annals of present-day business ventures, and barely escape open taint of deceit.

* * *

It is these shadings of honor which constitute so sad a chapter of human experience. Men who would refuse to steal the property of another do not always hesitate before the opportunity to practice shrewdly upon the confidence reposed in them as successful business men. Nor do they decline to take for themselves a share of the proceeds of business transactions out of all proportion to the value of the services rendered by them.

* * *

It was just this type of compromise which assailed Jesus in the days of his supreme temptation. There lay before him two opportunities. By nature and training he preferred the supreme and unquestionable choice of that ideal which had ever occupied his thought as the hope of his people and the world. He had believed that the kingdom of God would appear in the world through the coming and leadership of some choice and elect spirit who should proclaim the holy will of God and bring the people, not by political means, but by moral persuasion, to that exalted estate toward which their providential history looked. Once this condition could be reached there was no doubt that the influence of such a purified and eager nation would have marked effect in bringing to pass the moral and religious regeneration of the world. Such dreams the prophets had cherished. Jesus accepted them and lifted them to their highest value in his ambition for the future and his self-dedication to this royal ideal.

* * *

But at once there arose the question as to whether such a severe and exalted experience was possible of achievement for the nation by any leader who might arise; and now that Jesus knew himself to be that hoped for leader, the question was supremely important. He knew all too well the character of those hopes which lay in the hearts of the religious and political leaders of the nation. He knew that his ideals would make but small appeal to such men. How could he win without their help? Why might he not accept their view as the only practicable one and thereby avoid the danger of a complete failure? Of the two choices the first was more satisfying but less practicable, the second less desirable but easier of attainment. And was it not after all better to gain a partial victory than to miss altogether the object of his mission through an unreckoning devotion to an unattainable good?

* * *

Then too, Jesus was not unaware of the personal element in his problem. To persist in the first of these choices meant his alienation from the men who were the acknowledged religious leaders of the time, and who in spite of great limitations in their vision were still the best men of the age. That way lay suspicion, hostility, persecution and death at last, with possible failure as the result of all. That way lay days of hardship and nights of wakefulness, journeys and labors of painful and lonely experience, continued misunderstanding and the loss of that affection which was to him so keenly essential to happiness. On the other hand, there was, to be sure, a partial compromise with the grosser desires of the people and their leaders. But there was at least the reasonable expectation of success. On that course he could not wholly fail, and moreover he would avoid those dangers both to his own life and his plans which brooded over his spirit like a haunting presage of evil. Why not take the easier plan? Why not be content with a partial success and so avoid the danger of an utter failure? For who could tell whether, after all was done to insure the success of his supreme ideal, he might not find humanity too selfish and indifferent even to profit by his holy and uncalculating sacrifice?

* * *

That was the great decision which Jesus was compelled to make. Upon it lay the issue of his whole ministry. To dare all and perhaps to fail, or to attempt part and be sure of success. These alternatives were balanced in his mind through those bitter and torturing days of anxiety and physical weakness. What the decision was to be could not yet be forseen. Heaven and earth might well have waited in agonizing spirit while the Master fought through his battle with temptation treading the winepress alone.

—The will of Mrs. Caroline W. Newstadter of New York gives $1,000,000 for the erection and maintainance of model houses in New York for families of moderate means, and $545,000 for other philanthropic purposes.

What Disciples Do Not Believe—Illustrated

This is the sad fate that has today overtaken the Disciples: to have developed within their own fellowship a body of thought more typical of the precise thing their whole history protests against than can be found elsewhere in Christendom. This body of thought rests upon a single text of Scripture, John 3:5—"Except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." There is no other text of Scripture that supports it. Like a huge pyramid standing on its apex it bears its whole weight upon this solitary verse. "Born of water" refers to baptism. Baptism, therefore, is immersion. No one not immersed can enter the Kingdom of God. And of course no one can be a member of the Church who is outside the Kingdom of God. Only those who have been immersed, therefore, are members of the Church of Christ. Only those churches are churches of Christ which practice immersion only. Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian churches are not churches of Christ—they are "denominational churches." Christian union may not be practiced with any except immersionist churches and with immersed Christians.

That this way of thinking should have found soil for its wretched roots in the minds of any considerable group of the Disciples of Christ is an historical irony at which Satan must laugh. But here it is in full bloom and cultivated by an active journalistic propaganda. The Christian Standard recently printed an article by a contributor for which its editor gratuitously furnished the accompanying diagram to illustrate the contributor's argument. The article and diagram were as follows:

A Church of Christ is supposed to be in his kingdom. Then, when one becomes a member of one of Christ's churches, if not already in it, he becomes a citizen of his kingdom. But, as he can not enter the kingdom unless he be born of water and of the Spirit (John 3:5), therefore he can not enter a church in the kingdom without being born of the water and of the Spirit. Hence, when one becomes a member of any church without being born of water and of the Spirit, that church is not in the kingdom—not a church of Christ.

To say any one should be recognized as a church-member who is not born of the water and of the Spirit, is either to confess that the church is not Christ's, or else deny that Christ was correct in reference to the terms of entering the kingdom, where only a church of Christ can be found.

He who says "water" (in John 3:5) has no reference to baptism should name some initiatory act other than baptism requiring water for its performance. But that can not be done. Hence to recognize the unbaptized as members of any of Christ's churches is a total error no matter what reasons may be claimed for it.

One could hardly find a more concise and pertinent statement of what the Disciples' position is not. It is against precisely that sort of teaching (not involving of course, this particular passage of Scripture) that the soul of Thomas Campbell revolted. He grew sick at sight of miserable little sects excluding others because they did not agree with them. He said:

> It is to us a pleasing consideration that all the churches of Christ which mutually acknowledge each other as such are not only agreed in the great doctrine of faith and holiness, but are also materially agreed as to the positive ordinances of the Gospel institution; so that our differences, at most, are about the things in which the kingdom of God does not consist; that is about matters of private opinion or human invention.

"What a pity," he exclaims, "that the Kingdom of God should be divided about such things!" The passionless logic-chopping of the above contemporary article is the antipodes away from Thomas Campbell's thought and temper.

The Christian Century has its view of John 3:5. But if the above construction of that verse were absolutely without logical flaw, it could not outweigh and suppress for us all the rest of the New Testament and Christian history. The facts are against that construction. Men are in the Kingdom of God who have not been immersed. We can more easily doubt our power to understand that text aright than we can deny the facts that God multiplies in such abundance and clearness before our eyes.

On Representing the Disciples

A most interesting letter is that of Mr. Frank E. Robey found on Our Readers' Opinions page. Mr. Robey is principal of the high school in the city of his residence. He writes from the layman's standpoint, and what he says possesses, therefore, more than usual significance.

Underneath his deep appreciation of The Christian Century and his sympathy with the ideals which it is cultivating Mr. Robey feels that there is a marked disharmony between these ideals and the great body of sentiment of the Disciples. He takes us mildly to task for assuming that our ideals represent the Disciples, and good-naturedly impeaches us for "consciously misstating the facts" in crediting our brethren with holding broader and more gracious views than he thinks they actually do hold. "In five [Disciple] churches which I have attended in the last four years," he says, "I do not believe five people could be found who would publicly support a proposition to practice Christian unity."

Mr. Robey's statement concerning these particular churches we do not intend to call in question, although we would add that it would make all the difference in the world how the proposition was put before them—in what temper and in what terms. If the temper was one of impatience or disillusionment or cynicism the proposition would surely fail. And even if it succeeded, the churches would no doubt have isolated themselves by their unsympathetic, uncoöperative, holier than thou attitude toward the Disciples' brotherhood. So that the forward step would have little more than local significance, and that of doubtful value to the cause of Christ.

Likewise if the proposition were put to such congregations in the wrong terms it would have little hope of carrying, and if it carried would have little significance. For example, the proposal to receive the "pious unimmersed" into fellowship is not a gripping proposal. That epithet does not describe the people whose reception is under consideration. It entirely lacks the essential thing that ought to be said about them. That they are "pious" does not distinguish them from devotees of Buddhism. Whether they are "immersed" or "unimmersed" means nothing religious at all. To consider a proposition to receive the "pious unimmersed" into fellowship does not allow a congregation to face the full fact. The full fact with which a congregation of Disciples must deal is that these persons under consideration are Christians, members of the Church of Christ, baptized members of the Church of Christ, and that they come bearing letters from a church of Christ commending them to the fellowship and care of this congregation. The facing of such a fact as this will touch the conscience and intelligence of a congregation of Disciples as no talk about the "pious unimmersed" or "Christian character" or an "ethical test of fellowship" will do. There is only one course that a church of Christ can take, if it is determined to deal Christianly with such a fact.

We therefore believe there are possibilities in the situation presented by these five churches which perhaps even our keen-sighted correspondent does not himself discern.

But a word now as to representing the Disciples. The Christian Century believes that a people has the right to be represented to the world in the terms of its deepest purposes. Often these purposes lack consistent expression in the established customs and characteristic phrases in vogue among its members. These customs and phrases may actually contradict the essential purpose of a people. A phrase may have been formulated to meet a particular situation and afterward given universal application. A custom that came in by sheer accident may have remained and grown sacred through the law of inertia. There are two ways of describing such a people. We will call one the photographic and the other the interpretative.

The photographic description simply sets down the prevailing practices of the people and quotes the phrases in which they characteristically express their views and purposes. Such a description is static; it regards its object as a fixed quantity, posed for its photograph.

The interpretative description penetrates prevailing practices and prevailing opinion; it cracks open characteristic phrases; it goes back to origins and traces out the historical process, asking all the while how this custom came to be, and in the heat of what controversy was this phrase formulated? It strives to go below the static things of the surface to the dynamic forces that push the community along. It takes account of the fundamental intention or passion of the community. Its picture is therefore idealistic rather than photographic. And it asserts that this idealistic picture is more real than the photographic picture, that it represents the facts while the photograph misrepresents the facts.

Any description of the Disciples of Christ in terms of their customary practices, or a consensus of their opinion, or their traditional phrases is a faulty and misleading description. These very phrases and opinions and practices are themselves to be interpreted by the original purpose and the historic experience of the Disciples. No fallacy has wrought within our communion so deadening an influence as the habitual appeal of even our leading minds to the "consensus of opinion" of the brotherhood. Mr. Robey says he doubts if there are five persons in five congregations who would be willing to practice Christian union, and upon this observation—a photographic observation—he builds the judgment that the Disciples do not truly wish Christian union. We reply as above that it all depends upon whether the full fact is presented to such congregations. We believe that there is in the soul of every congregation of Disciples an insight and a conscience, the heritage of the fathers, which would inevitably determine it to practice Christian union if it were properly brought to face the full fact of its present opportunity so to do. When The Christian Century describes the Disciples, therefore, it likes to describe them in terms of their deeper conscience and ideal rather than their surface opinion or practice.

Here is an apt illustration close at hand. Elsewhere in this issue of The Christian Century will be found a resolution passed by the trustees of Berkeley Bible Seminary defining the position of that institution as "in accord with the plea and position of the great body of the Disciples of Christ throughout the United States and therefore opposed to all innovations subversive of the teachings of the New Testament." If this resolution means that the Seminary intends to reflect the opinions and conform to the practices which it finds in a photographic description of the Disciples it is an ignoble resolution. An educational institution prostitutes its essential character when it so defines its position. No consensus of opinion nor prevalence of practice can be normative for an institution that is worthy of the educational ideal. But if the trustees meant by their resolution to assure the brotherhood that they and their Seminary were consecrated to the furtherance of the ideals and purposes of the Disciples, then their resolution should meet with applause from the whole brotherhood. In spite of certain suspicious-looking phrases in the context of the resolution, we have chosen in our comment elsewhere to interpret it in this latter sense. But it should be pointed out to these trustees that real devotion to the Disciples may, and likely will, lead their Seminary at times to withstand the consensus of opinion of the Disciples and to actually foster innovations in the face of traditional practices.

The Disciples' journalism affords another illustration of the deadening influence of this photographic conception of the Disciples. In the early days its journalism was independent and therefore creative. It actually led the people. Later it became apparent that the commercial advantage of a journal lay in its shrewdness in reflecting the consensus of opinion of the churches that had espoused the ideals of Christian union. It ceased to lead. It became a mouthpiece of popular sentiment, prejudice and partizanship. Underneath the protection afforded by this newspaper policy of frankly "taking the brotherhood as it is", the most flagrant corruption of the Disciples' ideals has gone on. We need cite now but one instance —our evangelistic ideals. An editor whose paper talks much of the "consensus of opinion among us" once declared in personal conversation that the evangelistic methods now in vogue in our churches ought to be smitten "hip and thigh." But no paper has afforded this corrupting business better protection or given it more specious respectability than this self-same editor's paper. His personal convictions were in harmony with the evangelistic ideals of the Disciples. His editorial policy was determined by the photographic picture of the prevailing practice.

Now if Mr. Robey should ask The Christian Century to state the Disciples' attitude toward evangelism we would not give him a photographic picture of present practices. We would affirm this paradox: that the Disciples are opposed to the typical revivalism of today—even while nine-tenths of their churches are engaged in it. We would affirm that they are being caught with a trick, that they are being made to contradict their historic conscience on the subject of conversion by the methods now employed by many conspicuous revivalists, and we would declare that any description of the Disciples as a body enamored of and committed to this hypnotic revivalism was a misrepresentation of them.

But let us return to our journalism. The final stage in the development of this false conception both of the Disciples and of journalism, has been reached in the proposal to officialize an organ that shall "speak representatively" for the Disciples, accurately reflecting the "consensus of opinion" of the majority. A good man has been led into giving a large sum of money in order that this thing may be accomplished. Thirteen men have been chosen through whom the "consensus of opinion" shall filter to the staff of editors. But even that precaution is not sufficient. Before an editorial is allowed to see the light it has to run the gauntlet of the editorial staff and submit to pruning and modification—in short it has to be thoroughly depersonalized. This depersonalization has been actually acclaimed as an advantage and a virtue by those who are engaged in doing it!

In very plain speech The Christian Century declares that the fundamental principle upon which this so-called "representative" journal proceeds is vicious. Its unavoidable issue will be to carry the Disciples' consciousness still farther into the sectarian mould. Its elaborate channel for conveying to its pages the "consensus of opinion" of the Disciples will produce a mere photographic picture of our people. A picture of the true brotherhood of Disciples, the ideal brotherhood, the great original, historic and fate-laden enterprise with which the fathers were commissioned, it will not give, because this picture will be blurred and eclipsed by the sharper outlines of the photographic picture created by the paper's sensitive and responsive contact with the "consensus of opinion."

Meantime there will be voices, whether they speak through a newspaper or in some other way, that will represent the Disciples more truly, more fairly, than any "consensus of opinion" represents them. Such a voice is that of Rev. J. R. Perkins in Alameda, Calif., the sad news of whose physical collapse has just reached us. A hairbreadth majority voted him a heretic. But he represents the Disciples and his opponents misrepresent the Disciples. The full distance which the "consensus of opinion" of his church board has gone from the great ideals of our movement cannot here be stated. But it stands no further from the Disciples' historic position than does the sentiment of the manager of the "representative" newspaper who told the churches on the Pacific Coast recently that if any Disciple wished to practice Christian union with unimmersed Christians he should go to the Methodists! That sort of counsel may settle the question for a majority of the Disciples but it does not settle it for the Disciples.

Despite their "representative" papers, their Alameda majorities, their Spencers and Sweeneys, their "only five persons out of five congregations who would support a proposition to practice Christian union"—despite all these, he truly represents the Disciples who pictures them as a people consecrated to freedom of mind and to breadth of Christian fellowship—a fellowship as broad as the whole Church of Christ.

—A letter signd by Missionaries F. E. Miegs, Dr. W. E. Macklin and James Ware and dated Shanghai, China, Jan. 8, puts their conservative and trustworthy confirmation upon the most serious description of famine conditions in that land. They say: "We have been getting into touch with the work of the Central China Famine Relief Committee, and consider it of such great and immediate importance, that we have taken the liberty of asking them to write you, and of assuring them of your sympathy and coöperation. China is facing the most terrible famine in many years, and in the midst of the fight for liberty has but little opportunity to care for the famine situation. She is in desperate need of our help."

Editorial Table Talk

Creating the Atmosphere of Union

Bishop Charles P. Anderson is the chairman of the Episcopalian Commission on Christian Unity. In addressing a meeting of the Baptist ministers in Chicago recently he said:

We must first create an atmosphere of love and fellowship before the conference proposed will be of any benefit. Until that time there will be so many imaginary differences that a unification will be almost impossible. The trouble with the Christian religion is that it has been analyzed to death. Every fact of the religion has been so minutely analyzed that it has caused many to wonder whether the facts expounded are true at all. There is too much analysis and too little synthesis by Christian people.

Proceeding the Bishop recommends the cure for many of our church ills.

Christian peoples should magnify the work of other Christians, even though they represent a different branch of Christianity. There is a tendency to minimize the good of Christianity, because of certain distinctions of belief. We should all become united under the great banner of Christianity instead of being divided as we are. We should love each other for the mutual good and toleration of the Christian beliefs.

Commenting upon these fine deliverances the Churchman says:

"They are indeed enemies of that better understanding between Christians which promises unity, who seek to suppress differences by compromise or to ignore them by a process that is called love, but is in truth sentimentality. The preservation of differences and the element of the truth behind them is essential, if any contribution is to be made to a unity that is worth while—a unity rich enough to satisfy the needs and the hopes of humanity. It is not difference but division that is sin. When the relation between God and man, and man with man in the one Body of Christ is made to rest upon facts and not upon man-manufactured formulas as definition of fact, then the necessity for all the things that the human heart and soul and mind can contribute to the fulness of a Catholic church becomes a realized need. . . . . But more even than common sense and common loyalty—even our Lord himself is today, through many a prophet throughout Christendom, forcing home the inevitable truth that those who claim membership in Him are false to their claim if they do not include all whom He claims, whether those who are visibly His by baptism or those whom He is saving through His word and His love.

However far off Christian union may be, that consummation can only be realized as we cultivate the fraternal, and resent every expression of uncharitable views. Some of the great reforms in our political and social life within recent years have been wrought by agencies that announced no program of reform, but silently and resolutely set about their task to work what is now a matter of history. Would not the irony be crushing if Christian union should be consummated by those who at one time seemed wholly indifferent to the need of unity, while the people who made it the red letter event in their church propaganda should be entirely left out? Doctrinal bases of union are important and essential, but there can be no use for them until an atmosphere is created in which any such basis will seem natural and not abnormal.

What the Statistics Show

The following facts based on the statistics recently announced in The Christian Century are worthy of note:

1. The Greek Catholic Church has leaped in membership in this country during these 20 years from 100 to 175,000 members. As these people conduct their services in the Greek language exclusively, we may see here our rapid growth in one of the foreign populations.

2. During these 20 years the Spiritualists have multiplied by 344 per cent, showing the most amazing growth in the entire table, as in this aggregation foreign immigration plays perhaps no part.

The Latter Day Saints show a growth of 143 per cent, a large part of which, of course, is foreign.

3. The Roman Catholic Church has doubled its membership in this country during the last 20 years and now has nearly two-thirds as many members as all the Protestant Churches together. The increase of the Roman Catholic Church during these two decades was 100 per cent, while the increase of the combined Protestant Churches was only 59 per cent of their membership.

In the year 1930, if the same rate of increase continues, the Roman Catholic Church will equal the Protestant Churches in membership in the United States.

4. The percentage of increase in the 12 Protestant denominations (North) showing the greatest growth during these 20 yars is as follows:

Lutheran Synodical Conference, 118 per cent; Disciples of Christ, 100 per cent; Lutheran Evangelical Synod, 88 per cent; Protestant Episcopal, 76 per cent; Presbyterian Church, 69 per cent; Dunkard Brethren Church, 64 per cent; Baptist Church, 50 per cent; German Reformed Church, 46 per cent; Congregational Church, 45 per cent; United Presbyterian, 45 per cent; Methodist Episcopal Church, 44 per cent; United Brethren Church, 44 per cent.

—It was felt by all present at the Parliament on American Missions held in Chicago last week, that the conception of the American missionary problem as it lies in the minds of the leaders of this enterprise gives them the right to claim for it an importance which the Disciples have been all too tardy in affirming. Too much hitherto has the task been taken in terms of the establishment of Disciple churches where none now exist—an enterprise of denominational propaganda. At last the wider vision has come and the conception seems to be growing that the basic function of the American Missionary Society is to connect the Disciples helpfully with the great enterprises of the Kingdom of God in American social life. In the performance of this function the great cities loom up as strategic centers where the type of our future civilization is being determined. The overlapping of churches of Christ in country places and small towns presents a problem whose solution inevitably will mean the decrease of the number of churches in order to increase the church's efficiency. Federation leading to ultimate union is the path American missions is bound to take. Thus the breaking down of denominational lines so manifest in foreign missions is implicit in the enterprise of home missions. Dr. McCash was full of enthusiasm with respect to the significance of the recent survey of western religious conditions in which he participated with the secretaries of four other religious bodies. The results of this coöperative attitude on the part of Home Mission boards can hardly be calculated. The series of parliaments now in progress was begun March 4 and will continue until May 1. In every community in which they are held the church leaders should put forth every effort to bring the people out to participate in them.

—The trustees of the Berkeley Bible Seminary in California unanimously adopted the following resolution at their meeting, recently: "Resolved, that we, the Board of Trustees of Berkeley Bible Seminary, hereby declare and define the position of the Seminary to be in full accord with the plea and position of the great body of the Disciples of Christ throughout the United States; and, therefore, to be opposed to all innovations subversive of the doctrines and teachings of the New Testament." This is a commendable resolution in every way. A school appealing to the Disciples for support should be in accord with Disciples' principles. And of course any Christian school will oppose all innovations subversive of the teachings of the New Testament. The great good fortune of a Disciple school is that in maintaining this intimate fellowship with the brotherhood which Berkeley Seminary seeks it need not surrender a jot of the educational ideal of freedom in the search for and teaching of truth. The Disciples do not ask conformity of their colleges; they demand that they shall be kept free of ecclesiastical pressure.

—Collier's Weekly says that in London, a city of 7,000,000, in the year of 1910 there were thirteen trials for murder. Of this number, eight ended in conviction and all eight were sentenced to death. In our American cities the riot of murder is appalling. While in London there was an average of one murder for every 500,000, the average in some American cities is one to every 2,000. High prices obtain in the case of every commodity except human life, which seems cheaper today than ever in the country's history. For this terrible state of affairs, our courts are largely to blame.

—Bishop Charles Edward Cheney in the pulpit of Christ Reformed Church, Chicago, last Sunday brought to a close the fifty-second year of his continuous service in that parish. Bishop Cheney's sermon on "The Redemption of Time" was listened to by the grandchildren of those who were first numbered among his flock.

—Governor Foss, of Massachusetts, has broken all New England records for the use of the pardoning power, having restored eighty-one prisoners to liberty during a year in office. His pardons include eleven murderers.

—"We are too busy manicuring our theology," said Rev. C. C. Wilson in First Church, Milwaukee, last Sunday, "the world goes past our doors. It doesn't want creeds and dogmas; it wants friendship, fellowship, love."

Union of Missions in China

Secretary Barton, of the American Board, Outlines a Plan

The conference of the Foreign Missionary Societies of America, which was held in New York, may result in definite action for union among the leading missionary societies at work in China. Dr. James L. Barton of the American board led in the discussion of the proposition, and made a profound impression by his able address. A committee appointed to consider the matter made a report which practically endorsed his views.

His Platform.

Dr. Barton said that there ought to be one common name adopted for all Protestant Chinese congregations, so that denominational differences should be submerged out of the sight of the Chinese public. Separate denominational institutions of education should be promptly merged—all, including even theological seminaries, should be operated on a union basis. All Christian literature issued in the Chinese language should be prepared and published by a joint board representing all the missions. And finally, some arrangement ought to be made for executive control on the field which would govern all Protestant mission effort harmoniously. District councils for the various provinces and one great board of strategy for the whole nation should be made up of the leaders of all denominations, both foreign and native, and should be vested with the final power to determine the scope and sphere of each denomination's activity in the field, distributing forces strategically and harmonizing their relations.

A Common Confession.

Dr. Barton called attention to the interdenominational character of some of the most important of the American and Canadian missionary organizations already existing and noted that the larger and more influential of the other societies number but seventeen, chiefly Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Episcopalian, and Congregational. Continuing, he said:

"It is in order to ask how much and how little these communions at the present time have in common in their policy and method of propagating Christianity among the Chinese. Let us here suggest a few of the fundamentals which, it seems to me, we unitedly and habitually advocate and practice. These should constitute a common starting point for more active co-operation.

"We believe God is the father of the Chinese as well as of the European, and that because of His great love for the world, including Chinese, He sent His son to earth.

"We believe every Chinese is in need of the saving knowledge of Jesus Christ as revealed in His gospel and proclaimed by the apostles.

"We believe the Old and New Testament contains the supreme revelation of God to men, and that it should be universally preached and distributed in printed form in the vernaculars of China.

"We believe in the power of the gospel lived and practiced by godly men and women and orally proclaimed in the language of the people to transform individual lives, to regenerate society, and to provide a safe foundation for the state.

"We believe in the preparation and dissemination of a Christian literature in languages understood by the Chinese and prepared to meet the needs of the Chinese mind.

"We believe in the value and potency of the medical missionary for the demonstration of Christianity and for the relief of physical suffering.

"We believe in the necessity of providing a Christian education in all grades and for both sexes, from kindergarten to the normal school, the college, and the theological seminary or training school, for implanting Christian principles in the minds of the young, for raising up Christian leaders in all trades and professions, and for creating for the Church of Christ in China an adequate and efficient Christian leadership.

"We believe in the Chinese church, self-controlled, self-supported, and self-propagating, to become independent of foreign domination, itself the leader in organizing and directing agencies of its own creation under God for the Christianization of the empire.

"We believe that the modern education of the Chinese as a whole must be accomplished at the expense of the Chinese themselves; at the same time we are agreed that as a means of implanting Christian truths and ideals in the minds and hearts of the youth during the formative period of their lives, there is no agency more potent and permanent than the Christian teacher. We are therefore agreed that it is a legitimate part of missionary work to prepare for this service selected Chinese students for both missionary and government schools."

Endorsement of the Conference.

The committee to which Dr. Barton's proposals were referred, said in its report:

"This conference desires to assure the missions in the strongest possible manner of its unreserved approval of the effort to accomplish the union of the Christian church in China and promise the missions that they will have in such efforts the hearty support of the members of this conference."

The conference added to this assurance another resolution specifically indorsing united work in "education, preparation, and publication of literature, hospitals, and philanthropy."

Prospects in China.

In discussing the changes which are now agitating China, Dr. Barton said:

"No longer will the foreigner be looked upon as the enemy of the country, himself a 'foreign devil' and his customs ridiculed and despised. Foreign ways are rapidly becoming the ways of China. The old haughty arrogance is broken and for the first time in history the people of China are in a position to learn in the school of observation and experience and to profit by what is learned.

"China will demand an adequate system of education wholly disconnected from her traditional history, and including all that will make her peoples genuinely learned. While in a half-hearted way for nearly ten years there has been a turning toward modern education, we may now expect a movement in this direction as much in advance of six or eight years ago as that stage was in advance of the educational system of the Ming dynasty.

"The Chinese will soon recognize that they have no religion adequate to meet the requirements of a great nation holding international relations with the leading governments of the world.

A Group of Chinese Christians.

No Longer Despised.

"No longer will Christianity stand as a despised religion. All efforts hitherto necessary to secure a hearing and to overcome deep-seated prejudice and even violent opposition, can now be directed to constructive endeavors in the way of organizing measures to systematize instruction in the fundamentals of our Christian faith.

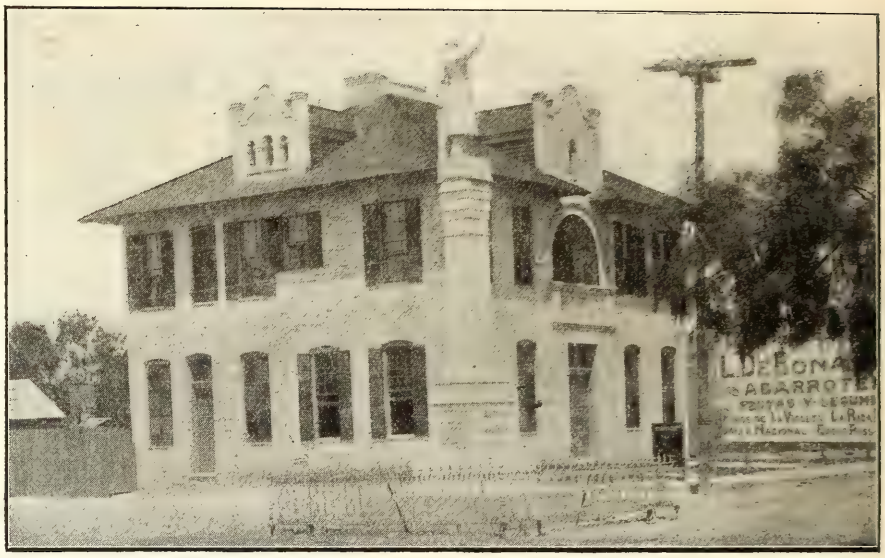
"No longer will Christian books and periodical literature be compelled to force their way into isolated homes, but the very character of the changes now taking place will compel intelligent Chinese to seek in the printed page answers to the questions that will crowd upon them regarding history, education, morals, and religion.

"We may confidently expect that the demand for Christian missionaries and the institutions for which they stand will be persistent from regions into which entrance hitherto has been scantily obtained. We may also be certain that the Chinese themselves will be more ready than hitherto to assume responsibility for their conduct and support.

"We may expect that effort will be made to give Christianity some official standing in the country, if not to make it the state religion. Christian forces must be organized to meet such propositions and prevent action that will nationalize its name and form while crushing out its spirit and life."

Christian Missions on the American-Mexican Border

Illuminating Story of the Work of Rev. S. G. Inman and His People's Institute in Mexican Border City of C. P. Diaz.—Overcoming Racial Suspicion, Rendering Practical Social Service and Imparting Christian Ideals to Old and Young.



The People's Institute, with Monument to Hidalgo in Foreground.

BY JESSIE L. P. BROWN.

The borderland between two continents, unless impassable, is always the seat of stronger prejudices against the neighboring nation than is the interior. Misunderstandings, unfriendly competition, and the thousand and one pinpricks of commercial and social rivalry are increased a hundred fold by the concentration of the bad elements of the two peoples. A handful of the baser sort can be a spark to light a smouldering flame that burns itself out on the houses and lands, the flesh and sinew of the two peoples. "Bad blood" between nations seldom starts at the capitals. Diplomacy and the entente cordial reign there. Out on the borderland, where man trades with man, and each stands to the other for a whole nation or race, where feelings are raw and expression is free, where human life counts for little and patriotism too often means blind bragging—here is the arena, with both sides eager for the drop of a hat.

Racial Prejudice.

On the borderland each nation interprets itself to the other more actively, if less truly, than in the councils of state. It is easier to convince the Canadian Parliament of our honest intentions toward reciprocity than to allay the fears of the average dweller on the border. The border man has a feeling against the other side. In fact, the whole border has feelings.

But the question of interpreting one nation to another is more serious where racial prejudice is added to national. Points of view are irreconcilable. Distrust becomes dislike, a pin prick an ugly open wound.

Annexation a Sore Memory.

Such has been the situation on our southern border for many years. If the annexation spectre proved such a bugaboo to Canada with all her wealth and the power of England back of her, what must it appear to the Mexican, who looks across the Rio Grande to the fair fields of Texas, and recalls the days of '47. Annexation is more than an imaginary bogey—it is a sore memory the fathers have given the sons. That what has been done once can be done again is easy reasoning. The Monroe Doctrine, with no healing in its touch, only probes the wound each time it is applied.

Contracts with United States.

The vital points of contact between the United States and Mexico are four—Brownsville and Laredo to the East (the latter on the direct line from St. Louis to Mexico City), El Paso and Eagle Pass on the west. The town C. P. Diaz, named for ex-President Diaz, and officially changed to Piedras Negras since the revolution, is on the Mexican side, opposite Eagle Pass. Like many a dusty Mexican town it has its market place and plaza, its bull-fight ring, cock-pit and theatre. Its uniqueness among Mexican towns is El Instituto del Pueblo, The People's Institute, which is doing more than any, than all other agencies combined, to arouse interest in civic, political, educational and moral advancement and to bring about a more cordial feeling toward the United States.

Religious But Not Obtrusive.

The People's Institute is housed in substantial quarters, owned by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, of the Disciples. Its work is truly religious, but not obtrusively so. The director and founder, Rev. S. G. Inman, saw that opposition to a foreign invasion and prejudice against Protestant influence could be silenced best by working from the civic point of view. This appeal has caught the civic pride of the Mexican residents and officials, both local and state, who are grasping for higher ideals with the new regime. The state assembly has officially recognized the worth of the People's Institute by granting an appropriation of $100 a month to the work, the first time such a grant has been made to a work connected in any way with a Protestant church.

Under the Diaz rule ideals were abstract theories that filtered away into sterile nothingness. Genius for leadership found expression in poetic and blind patriotism, the poetry of rhyme not reason. The new regime must make good if it would hold its own, so it welcomes the practical visionary. Instinctively Mexico would prefer that the dreamer of dreams, who can lead her into the promised land of true liberty and enlightenment, be a Mexican, certainly not an American, but how beautifully all feeling against foreign leadership has been allayed by the "Señor Director" of El Instituto del Pueblo, when one of the Mexicans, in a heated discussion against the United States, spoke of him as, "not an American, but a citizen of the world, the friend of humanity."

New Ideals Wanted.

The new Mexico wants new ideals, the young Mexico needs a true appreciation of conditions and possibilities to bring an advance in the whole body politic, and opportunities for individual expression in good citizenship and honesty. To increase the efficiency of the individual and so of the whole nation is a vital aim of the People's Institute. Speaking generally we find that Mexico has but two classes of people: the rich, well educated upper class that draws its sustenance from the lower class, its culture from France and the Continent, and the lower class that works for the others and gets but little for its toil. Mexico needs a middle class—skilled artisans and mechanics, workmen, farmers, shop-keepers and business men with modern methods, able to win by merit the outsider's place in his land.

Mexican Children of the Christian Mission School ready to take part in a Patriotic Fiesta.

Inauguration of new irrigation canals, built by the new reform mayor who was nominated and elected by a group of People's Institute men. This man, Lic. Enrique del Castillo, is doing wonderful things for the city, cleaning it up both physically and morally. He counts the People's Institute his greatest assistant in this work.
(1) Lic Enrique del Castillo. (2) Rev. S. G. Inman. (3) Miss Jessie Brown, New York.

Practical Service of Institute.

This is the service the People's Institute renders the Mexican. There are classes in English night and day, in stenography, telegraphy, geography, geometry. What the Y. M. C. A. is doing for the young men of the United States the Institute is trying to do without over-emphasizing the religious view point. As funds increase new classes will be added, the library enlarged, gymnasium and baths provided for a tub-less town, athletic tournaments organized, and a circulating library established for a community ignorant of its use. The Institute is in special need of English teachers. Its English classes are taxed to capacity limit. A young Mexican wants to be a Pullman conductor—he becomes to the Institute to learn English. A boy is going to New York to see the city and to learn business methods—he enters an English class at the People's Institute. A teacher in the public schools can get better instruction in English at the Institute than privately. She goes there.

Conferences and Public Meetings.

Gradually, if these students are in the night classes, they come early for the conferences, to hear what is new tonight. The saloon has no attraction for the hundred or more young people, out of a city of ten thousand. The conference, or public meeting, may be conducted by the young people themselves, on topics of current or merely local interest, or there may be an outside speaker, who talks on municipal reform, travel, education; he may be a musician or a politician, a sociologist or ornithologist, just passing through the city, or held up by the custom's house, for a few hours. Whoever he is—or she—he gravitates to the People's Institute and is grist for Señor Director's mill. "Sunshine Guy" Inman, as he is known to his hundreds of friends, has a way of making the dumb to speak and even the reluctant oyster to bring forth its pearl for his beloved Mexicans. The best in every line is none too good for this rejuvenating nation.

Freedom of Expression.

At the conferences the young men and women are welcome and encouraged to express themselves, a novel experience to the man who has thought and voted all his life as directed. In no uncertain tones did they express themselves, with the result that the semi-annual gambling fetes have been stopped. For one month, twice a year, gambling tables and booths were set up in the market place for all alike to risk their little all. The toddler was held up to the wheel, the aged counted his years by the times he had won and lost. One great need of the Mexican is amusement. Gambling and the saloon, the bull fight and the cock-pit have long provided this. The People's Institute began its work modestly by opening a reading room, the first public reading room in northern Mexico. The books, papers and magazines gave new lines of thought; politics, morals and philosophy were discussed. With the coming of the Revolution the reading-room was the scene of many a heated discussion, the headquarters for the latest news. This friendly point of contact naturally brought about the opportunity for all he public conferences and classes.

Mediator Between Nations.

But to increase the efficiency of the individual, to bring the best of knowledge and culture are only parts of the work of the modern missionary, and of an institution like El Instituto del Pueblo. To interpret one nation to another is a further step toward the day of world-wide peace and friendship between neighboring nations. One hardly would expect to attend a Mexican celebration of the Fourth of July, on a border town of Mexico, while the U. S. troops camped across the river. The Institute celebrated American independence while Mexico was trying to bring about a new independence, and this with no forced effort by the Gringo Director.

Public conferences on Democracy, held at the Institute, and great moral conferences, which had to be held at the theater to hold the crowds, and presided over by the Presidente of the Municipal, unconsciously took many of their view points and methods from the history and experience of their American neighbors.

Charity and Relief Work.

When a large district of the town was wiped out by a cloud-burst, the houses being built of adobe that melted down like mud pies on the heads of their inhabitants, it was the Institute that opened its doors to house the homeless. It was the director who organized the first relief benefit and served on the relief committee that collected funds from both sides of the Rio Grande, a practical example of Gringo efficiency and brotherly kindness.

In a hundred ways the People's Insitute has served the people of northern Mexico. It has won a high place in the civic life. It is here that one meets officials of city, state and nation, here that movements for the betterment of the community have a home, and here that the hatred of the Latin-American for the Gringo across the river is being dissolved in the light of a new understanding. Not long ago, a distinguished Brazilian agriculturist, Sr. J. de la Sa Pereira, after seeking in vain to find what Mexico is doing along advanced agricultural lines, was detained at C. P. Diaz for a few hours. Director Inman just happened, as usual, to come along, and, finding that the Brazilian mission to Mexico had been fruitless, immediately sent for Sr. Zefarino Dominguez, the Burbank of Mexico, who quickly changed the Brazilian's point of view and official report on Mexican agriculture.

Apostles of Brotherhood.

Only once, at least in North Mexico, has an American been honored with applause on ascending a Mexican platform. Latin chivalry and sense of fair play may give applause to an American after he has been heard, but El Director Inman recently was greeted with deafening applause, when called from the floor to speak at the first conference of parents and school teachers of the city. The meeting had been arranged at Mr. Inman's suggestion, and then he had retired to the place of a mere spectator. The Mexicans explain it this way. El Instituto del Pueblo is the people's institution, and "El Director Inman is not an American, or a Frenchman, a German or an Englishman, he is a citizen of the world and the friend of humanity." Nevertheless, he and his work are the apostles of brotherly love, the bringers of the best that a strong nation has in gifts and service to a younger sister.

New York City.

The Coming Campaign

Same old issues, same old game;
Same old charges, same old blame;
Same appeal to shop and farm,
Same old viewing with alarm.

Same old roorbacks rooring back;
Same spellbinding, too, alack;
Same old racket, far and wide;
Same old pointing out with pride.

Same old tariff, same old roar;
Same old foemen to the fore;
Same old fussing, same old broil,
Same old horny-handed toil.

Same old bluffing, same old fears;
Same old hisses, same old cheer;
Same old boasting for effect,
Same old little to expect.

—Chicago Record-Herald.

His Revenge

Official (to barber, condemned to death)—In an hour's time now, my poor man, you must prepare for your doom. Have you any last dying wish?"

Condemned Barber (savagely)—Yes, I'd like to shave the Crown prosecutor.—London Opinion.

The Lost Art of Discussion

By William E. Barton

We have come to a time when discussion is viewed with disfavor. That is a bad symptom. From the days of Plato and Socrates down to the times of the founding of the American republic, that is to say, from Athens to the New England town meeting, great systems have been wrought out by processes of discussion. Socrates and his friends went down to the harbor of Piraeus to see the races. They were starting back when some friends who lived at Piraeus met them. "Where are you going?" they asked. "We are returning to Athens," said Socrates. "That is where you are mistaken," said the harbor dwellers, "Do you see that there are more of us than of you?" Socrates liked that little joke, and stopped to discuss it. He who hesitates is lost. Socrates stopped to enjoy the hospitality of his friends, to see the torch races at night and to discuss. Whatever else they did, they discussed. And so Plato wrote his "Republic" out of what he thought he remembered of the discussions that started that afternoon between the hundred-yard dash and the torch race. It was so in the good old times of the Puritans. They discussed.

The Discusser Disturbed.

We have nearly ceased to discuss. Time is money, and money talks; so we keep still and let the committees thrash the matter out. We look upon the man who introduces discussion as a disturber of the peace. Woe unto those who are at ease in Zion; that is, unto us, who prefer to have things run smoothly rather than discuss them. Danger lies that way. The way of life is the way of motion, change, discussion.

There formerly was discussion at every corner grocery. Abraham Lincoln became a great man because he was not very happy at home, and sat around with his chair tipped back, discussing. His famous debate with Douglas made him president. John G. Whittier was always delighted when he could escape a group of hero-worshiping women, and slip around to the corner grocery, where enthroned on a cracker box he could discuss politics, local or state, or national. In his own heart he was a poet in order to being a politician, and he wanted to discuss. Where now is the historic cracker box? We order the groceries by telephone, and our dry goods are selected out of a mail-order catalogue.

Shoemakers Tugged at Ideas.

Once the shoe shop was a place of discussion, and many a cobbler rose to eminence. Village shoemakers became statesmen like Henry Wilson, or preachers like William G. Puddefoot—or no, there never was but one like him—but the reason for it all was that these men talked with their neighbors, and drove home an idea with every peg, and pulled through an argument with every waxed end. Now we buy a pair of somebody's "three dollar shoes" with his picture on every box, and make him governor or something, not because we ever discussed anything with him, but because he has caused his portrait to be trodden under foot of half the men of America.

Once there was discussion in the press. Pro Bono Publico and Citizen fought long-drawn battles with Reader and Semper Idem, and the people read what they said. Now that valuable space is divided between the last murder trial and the demand for advertisements; and at the second round of letters the readers yawn, and the editor suggests that the discussion has gone as far as appears to be profitable.

No Time to Discuss.

Once we had discussions in our associations and conferences. We supposed that was what associations and conferences were for. Now, we arrange programs. That is a very different thing. We seek for names that will draw. We take it for granted that what the churches send delegates to these meetings for is primarily entertainment, intellectual, or in the homes of the brethren. Here and there on the program is a very brief space marked "Discussion," but that is a joke. The time allowed for it is only twenty minutes, and the program is that much behind its schedule, so the moderator says, "The program committee have provided twenty minutes for discussion, but we were late in beginning, and it is now time for the next paper. The Rev. John Winthrop Robinson, D. D., has, at great inconvenience, come here today to address us on 'The Reformation of the Universe,' and we will now listen to him."

If discussion gets a little warm in the business half-hour, the previous question is moved—an unmannerly motion in almost any religious assembly. We are afraid of discussion.

An Instance.

At the national council we meet the vice of the program maker in its worst form. Some years ago I went to the council with some resolutins in my pocket on the subject of polity. They followed some which I had introduced at a previous council, and which had been adopted. I thought the council was ready for some more—and it was. The committee to whom they were referred approved them all. But they asked me to withdraw one of them. They favored it, but "it might cause discussion," so I withdrew it. It came up three years later, however, introduced in another report, and went through unanimously. But why withdraw a resolution because it will cause discussion? What are we there for but discussion and the intelligent action which comes from it? The resolution which went through undiscussed would have been more useful if it had been thoroughly thrashed over on the floor of the council.

Caesar's Column.

Ignatius Donnelly years ago wrote a grewsome and pessimistic story called "Caesar's Column," in which civilization went down and barbarism came back, and all our pomp of yesterday became one with Nineveh and Tyre. It is really more of a possibility than some people suppose. I do not, however, believe the book. Yet it had in it some things to make men thoughtful. One of them was the answer to the question, "Did not the people see this coming? Did they not think and read and protest?" But the answer was that the people made reading a substitute for thinking; let the newspapers do their thinking for them and politicians think through the newspapers; intelligent discussion ceased; so came despotism, and after it the deluge.

THE DISCIPLES CONGRESS

SUBJECTS AND SPEAKERS.

Time:—April 16 to 18. Seven sessions. Place:—Kansas City, Missouri.

1. The Principles of Scientific Management Applied to the Work of the Local Church.
   Paper.—John Ray Ewers, Pittsburgh.
   Review.—T. W. Grafton, Kansas City.

Caesar's Column.

2. Delegate Representation in General Convention for Religious Bodies of Congregational Polity.
   Paper.—Dr. W. C. Bitting, St. Louis, Mo.
   Review.—J. B. Briney, Pewee Valley, Ky.
3. The Social Task of the Church.
   Paper.—Prof. Samuel Zane Batten, Des Moines, Iowa.
4. The Problem of Christian Union in the Light of New Testament Study.
   Paper.—Prof. F. O. Norton, Des Moines, Iowa.
   Review.—Burris A. Jenkins, Kansas City, Mo.
5. Is Christian Union Possible in the Light of History, Psychology and Logic.
   Paper.—Prof. S. M. Jefferson, Lexington, Ky.
   Review.—Prof. Herbert Martin, Des Moines, Iowa.
6. The Essential Plea of the Disciples in the light of their Origin and Aim.
   Paper.—C. C. Morrison, Chicago, Ill.
   Review.—J. H. Garrison, St. Louis, Mo.

The program committee has acted upon the belief that the platform of our Congress is preëminently the place sacred to the earnest, serious and thorough discussion of our problems. It is intended to be no exhibit of antiquities or curios, but a clearing house of ideas to which all are admitted upon equal terms if they have ideas they are willing to submit to the clearing process, and if they are willing to keep sweet in the inevitable give and take which accompanies the educational process.

The Kansas City Ministerial Association will have charge of all the local arrangements and certainly we could assemble in no better or more convenient place. More detailed announcements will be made in the very near future.

Committee.—C. M. Chilton, T. W. Grafton, L. J. Marshall, Levi Marshall, Chas. M. Sharpe, Pres. and Acting Secretary.

Recent Books Received

SOCIAL ASPECTS OF THE CROSS, by Henry Sloane Coffin, minister Madison Avenue Presbyterian church, and associate professor of homiletics in Union Theological Seminary, New York. Pp. 83. 75 cents net. New York: Hodder and Stoughton.

THE UNIFICATION OF THE CHURCHES, by Daniel W. Fisher D. D., LL. D. Pp. 93. 50 cents net. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company.

THE METHODIST QUARTERLY REVIEW, for October, containing articles by Dr. Henry C. King on "Facts that Abide," Dr. James Mudge on "Horace Bushnell," Prof. B. B. Warfield on "How Shall We Baptize?" and other articles. Nashville, Tenn.: Smith & Lamar, Agents.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Correction

Editors Christian Century: I have just read my letter in The Century [of March 7] and the editorial reply. I had read statements in other of our papers to the effect that The Century had declined to publish the denials of one or two of our mission boards, and, as I had not been reading the paper, I naturally concluded that no denials were being printed in its columns. Hence, I sent letter to the Standard and Evangelist in the same mail which carried The Century letter. This is the only explanation I can make of the implied discourtesy on my part.

Regarding the six affirmations which I have seen for the first time in this week's issue of The Century, permit me to say that, as a whole, I am not in accord with them.

1. I think it is the general belief among Disciples that people of every denomination who live up to the light they have are Christians—I would not like to think our people would rule out the devout Catholics. But I feel sure you do not represent the Disciples as a body when you affirm that Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches are churches of Christ. Why did you not add the Roman church? It has members just as good and devout as any you will find in other communions, and they have all submitted to the application of water in the name of Christ. Protestantism is a protest against the error of Romanism, and the Disciple movement is a protest against the error of Protestantism—one of which you admit in the sixth affirmation, which, unless words fails to convey meaning, undoubtedly contradicts the fourth.

2. If I understand the mission of our plea, it is that of calling Christians of every name who are members of the Church of Christ out of denominationalism and into churches of Christ. Also, I think it is, and has always been, the hope of Disciples that when the Christian people of the world shall have been sufficiently enlightened, denominationalism will disappear and the Lord's people everywhere will hold fellowship in churches after the New Testament pattern—churches of Christ.

3. In your reply to my letter, you call my attention to the fact (?) that there is not the slightest hint in the six affirmations about receiving unimmersed persons into our churches. The fourth affirmation admits the validity of what is called baptism in the Roman and various Protestant churches. And if this affirmation be reduced to its last analysis and we occupy the position it puts us in, how can we be consistent if we decline to receive the unimmersed into our churches? If there is such a thing as logic, the hint, you disclaim, is very evident in the fourth affirmation, nor is it very slight.

Pardon a concrete example. About a year ago, a gentleman, 70 years old and a lifelong member of the Presbyterian church, requested me to receive him into our fellowship without immersion. He had been sprinkled in infancy, and argued that he had been baptized. Just yesterday he told me that next Lord's Day he will present himself for immersion—stating that he is now thoroughly convinced that he has never been baptized.He is an educated man and a thinker. Had we recognized the validity of what he called his baptism, we could have done nothing else than receive him into the church.

4. The fourth affirmation misrepresents the Disciples of Christ. They do not recognize sprinkling as baptism. [Nor does the fourth affirmation.—EDITORS.] And they insist that the scholarship of the world does not recognize anything as baptism but immersion. If I am wrong, I have misheard and misread every thing that has come my way from this people for the last twenty-five years. Yours most cordially,

Philadelphia. GEO. P. RUTLEDGE.

[Some time ago The Christian Century published six affirmations concerning the Christian status of Presbyterian, Congregational and other evangelical churches the pith and substance of which was that the Disciples held that they were churches of Christ, that their members were members of the Church of Christ and therefore not without baptism. Some fifty odd names of prominent Disciples were set down as endorsing this attitude toward these our religious neighbors. Two of those whose names were cited, I. J. Spencer of Lexington, Ky., and Wallace Tharp of Pittsburg, Pa., informed us that we were mistaken in assuming that they held this view. Their disclaimers were couched in indignant terms. The fact that our use of their names was wholly without authorization from them made it obvious that an apology was due from us even though we regarded the theses as the basic and catholic presuppositions of the Disciples' plea for Christian unity. Their disclaimers and our apologies have been published in previous issues of The Christian Century.

The above communication is a third disclaimer, which differs from the other two in the apparent absence of indignation. It states calmly a divergent opinion from our theses, but we do not gather that its author, Geo. P. Rutledge, takes offense at our use of his name as did the other two. We regret, nevertheless, that his name was associated with these theses and take this occasion to give publicity to his correction. We do not wish to seem to take advantage of the situation to engage Mr. Rutledge in a discussion, and the following comments are offered simply as an additional statement of our own. We have inserted numbers before certain paragraphs to which the numbers in our comments correspond.

1 and 2. Mr. Rutledge says that The Christian Century misrepresents the Disciples when it affirms that Presbyterian churches and other evangelical churches are churches of Christ. In the next paragraph he states his conception of the plea of the Disciples as a call to "Christians of every name who are members of the Church of Christ" to leave denominationalism and come "into churches of Christ." We have difficulty in holding these two statements together: Presbyterian churches are not churches of Christ, but their members are members of the Church of Christ. A church of Christ, as we conceive it and as Thomas Campbell conceived it, is simply a congregation or assembly of members of the Church of Christ. It is not clear how the Disciples can admit that Presbyterians are members of the Church of Christ and at the same time deny that one of their congregations is a church of Christ. Nor will our esteemed correspondent be able to find in representative Disciple literature or in the New Testament any such distinction as he here seems to make.

Again, Presbyterians, says Mr. Rutledge, are members of the Church of Christ. He takes no exception to our third affirmation which reads as follows: "The Disciples know of no other way of admission into the Church of Christ except by being baptized into it." [This affirmation, like the New Testament affirmation to the same effect, of course takes faith and repentance for granted.] But Mr. Rutledge denies number IV, which affirms that baptism as administered by these churches [nothing is said in the affirmations about baptism in the Roman church, which is an entirely different matter] does actually induct men into the Church of Christ. We have no right under the circumstances to put a question to Mr. Rutledge, but we do ask our thoughtful readers this question: If Presbyterians are members of the Church of Christ, and there is no revealed way of admittance into the Church of Christ save by baptism, when were these Presbyterians baptized and in what did their baptism consist?

3. The candor and keenness of Mr. Rutledge's thought is shown in his taking exception to the statement in our reply to his former letter that there was not "the slightest hint in our six affirmations about receiving unimmersed persons into our churches." He is right and we are right. The inference he draws from the six affirmations is inexorable, just as he words it. But this inference was not even suggested by the words of the affirmations. It suggested itself to Mr. Rutledge and is bound to suggest itself to every mind that feels the historic passion of the Disciples' movement for unity. But our correspondent finds the logical basis for this practice of Christian union in the fourth affirmation. The Christian Century finds it in the first and second. If Presbyterian churches are churches of Christ and Presbyterians are members of the Church of Christ, no man can formulate a reason, satisfactory to the Disciple conscience, why the Disciples should not receive them joyfully into their fellowship. If we say they have been baptized, well and good. If we say they have not been baptized but are nevertheless members of the Church of Christ, then baptism is something entirely different than Disciples have always conceived it. But whether we say they are baptized or not, the single fact that they are members of Christ's Church is sufficient to determine our duty. The fact that they have been received into full fellowship with the Head of the Body leaves no ground whatever for a congregation of members of the Body to withhold fellowship from them. On the contrary, their membership in the Church of Christ creates a positive obligation upon the part of every church of Christ to receive them. The discussion of the baptism question is an academic discussion. The fourth affirmation may be right or wrong. But whether right or wrong, it does not affect the practical duty of practicing Christian union. The practice of Christian union is not a debatable question. It is a plain and urgent moral duty resting upon the unequivocal and positive will of Christ. No command of his is more plain nor more imperative.

4. In the last paragraph the statement that "the scholarship of the world does not recognize anything as baptism but immersion" is astounding. That such a claim could have become current among Disciples and Baptists taxes one's faith in the human intellect. Mr. Rutledge is not alone in asserting it. Alexander Campbell affords him a classic precedent. But, as we showed in the initial articles of our recent series on the "Meaning of Baptism," the claim is absolutely unfounded. A very small, almost negligibly small, portion of the world's scholarship holds that immersion is the only baptism.

In closing our comments we would revert to the opening paragraph of our good friend's communication in which he states that the misrepresentation of The Christian Century's attitude by other papers was responsible for his rushing into their pages with a denial of statements we had not attributed to him at all. The moral of which plainly is that Mr. Rutledge ought to subscribe for The Christian Century! —THE EDITORS.]

A Mild Impeachment

[See Editorial, "On Representing the Disciples," on page 8.]

Editors The Christian Century: I have been a reader of The Century for four years. Every week I am grateful that I have a religious paper that is worth reading, reading for what it contains, not as a humble Christian duty. As nearly as I remember, I have never sent you a line. I have been content to listen. Partly in the hope that my letter may help you to feel your reader's pulse, to give a word of appreciation, and partly for the pleasure of writing to you, although you may never read it, I am going to write you a letter.

The Century is my preacher, my main source of spiritual food, and it is not all milk, thank goodness. You sustain my faith in the church and in religion. But there is one point in which you are often in error. Your utterances lead me to believe you are misinformed as to the spirit of a great majority of the people, whom you are supposed to represent. At times I almost believe you consciously misstate the facts. Your courage in dealing with other matters is all that keeps me from reaching that conclusion. I refer to certain matters of opinion in the rank and file of the brotherhood.

You or Prof. Willett or Dr. Ames and your associates go out among the people, say, for a sermon or lecture. The spiritual, progressive element attend and receive your message enthusiastically, but how many legalistic persons remain away and rave because you have been allowed to come and contaminate the faithful, I fear you never know. How many narrow-minded, self-righteous sectarians never read The Century, much less register with you their sentiments, I fear you do not fully realize. You move among one element. The other you neither see nor hear from. So I appreciate how easily you could under-rate that element. You have broad, comprehensive, scholarly conceptions of Christianity. You state them fearlessly, but not as your own, or as those of the scholarly element of the church, but as if they represented the church.

I believe, Brother Morrison, that you ought to recognize more fully, that there are two branches in our church. What per cent of our ministers do you suppose would have to change pulpits inside of three months if they were to declare that members of the denominations are Christians, and that they will be saved without some special act of divine providence to rescue them. I believe half our ministers would lose their positions, and three-fourths of our churches would be seriously divided.

I know all this is not true of C. M. Chilton's and Finis Idleman's churches, but of the most of the small city, village and country churches it is, and these form the main body of our people.

Of course our people will not face the issue. Dr. Sweeney's evasions until thrice pressed, Dr. Medbury's vehement denial that he was a part of The Century's "constituency" while evading completely the very points in question are characteristic of our people as I know them.

But their hearts are infinitely better than their theology. When they meet a Methodist or Presbyterian socially or religiously they in no way indicate their theological attitude. They are ashamed of their position, yet it is a part of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints" that all who are not immersed are "lost," unless, etc., and they must stand by "the position of our fathers."

Brother Morrison, in five churches which I have attended in the last four years, I do not believe five people could be found who would publicly support a proposition to practice Christian unity. FRANK E. ROBEY.

Storm Lake, Ia.

Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Rev. Burris A. Jenkins, pastor, where sessions of Disciples' Congress will be held.

DISCIPLES' CONGRESS AND MISSOURI LECTURESHIP

At the last Congress of Disciples held in Springfield, Ill., Kansas City was selected as the place for holding the Congress in 1912. The Missouri Lectureship at its 1911 meeting, held at Mexico, decided to combine their Lectureship with Disciples Congress and hold the same in Kansas City. The date selected for this combined gathering and program is April 16 to 18 inclusive.

The Kansas City ministers have taken hold of the combination with enthusiasm, and on behalf of the 10,000 or more Disciples of Christ in twenty-five Christian churches of Greater Kansas City, cordially invite ministers, educators, editors, evangelists and laymen and women to attend the meeting. Headquarters have been established in the Linwood Boulevard church, with Burris A. Jenkins, chairman, and J. B. Hunley, secretary. Entertainment on the Harvard plan will be accorded those who so desire, and who make known their wishes in advance, to the secretary.

The Linwood Boulevard church is one of the most beautiful edifices in Kansas City, and is justly said to be one of the most costly buildings we have anywhere in the country. Kansas City itself, in addition to being the gateway to the Southwest, with upwards of half a million population on both sides of the line, is the home of some noted people among Disciples, namely, T. P. Haley, one of our pioneer ministers; George H. Combs, pastor Independence Boulevard Church, the most expensive church building in the Disciple brotherhood. W. F. Richardson, pastor of the historic First Christian Church, and member of the Board of Church Extension; Burris A. Jenkins, pastor Linwood Boulevard Church, who is chairman of the Congress Committee, and one time president of the Kentucky University (now Transylvania); George W. Muckley, secretary Board of Church Extension; R. A. Long, business man and philanthropist, probably the best known layman in the Disciple brotherhood.

Kansas City, physically, is one of the beauty spots of America. It has more miles of boulevard and paved streets per capita, than any other American city. Its modern sky-scrapers are situated upon the crests of hills bordering business cañons. A new union station and terminal, to cost $30,000,000 is now in the course of construction. Kansas City is indeed a historic town, and those who avail themselves of this opportunity to make the city a visit, will not be disappointed. Address all communications to J. B. Hunley, secretary, in care of the Linwood Boulevard Christian Church, Linwood Boulevard and Forest Avenues, Kansas City, Missouri. * * *

Resignation

Resignation is the courage of old age: it will grow in its own season, and it is a good day when it comes to us. Then there are no more disappointments, for we have learned that it is even better, to desire the things that we have, than to have the things that we desire. And is not the best of all our hopes—the hope of immortality—always before us? How can we be dull or heavy while we have that new experience to look forward to? It will be the most joyful of all our travels and adventures. It will bring us our best acquaintances and friendships. But there is only one way to get ready for immortality, and that is to love this life, and live it as bravely and faithfully as we can.—Dr. Henry van Dyke.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

PLANNING AND PLANTING

"God Almighty first planted a Garden; and, indeed, it is the purest of all Pleasures."—LORD BACON.

This department has followed the advice of the rhyme in Alice in Wonderland in its choice of topics:—

"The time has come, the walrus said, to talk of many things,
Of ships, and shoes and sealing wax, and cabbages and kings."

Not that it has discoursed exactly on kings and ships, and shoes, and sealing wax, but it has spoken its mind on things as varied and disconnected—on Missions, and Christian Union, and Woman Suffrage, and Child Labor, and Parliamentary Law, and many other subjects too numerous to enumerate.

Time to Talk of Cabbages.

The time has now come to talk of cabbages—not literally, necessarily, but of all the green growing things that come with that homely (yet popular) vegetable. And just here, the department touches on the thing dearest to its heart in the spring-time—not cabbages, but gardens. Lord Bacon says, "There ought to be gardens for all months in the year, in which, severally, things of beauty may be there in season," and it was planned to follow his illustrious example by beginning a monthly series of garden talks with the New Year. But who dared talk of gardens with such a winter as we have had! It would have seemed an insult to mention sunshine and warmth and flowers to a shivering, indignant, zero-stricken people. Even now, March first, a fine snow is falling, a northeast wind is howling and the thermometer is down in the twenties.

Faith the Beginning.

But it is March!—and the eye of faith can see the white earth turning green, the wintry blast changing to a warm zephyr, and the blessed pageant of plant and leaf and flower returning again. So the garden talks are begun, even in this unfriendly weather, remembering especially that Peter Henderson says, "The secret of success in gardening is preparation." The good gardener, therefore, plans the campaign before she puts a seed in the ground; the dream garden must blossom in her mind long before the real garden is planted in her yard—and that cannot be blighted by the fickle March weather.

First, then, let me urge that in planning for the home beautiful in this year of 1912, we be fired by the noble ambition to make our backyards as attractive as the front; and an absolute essential to that is to have both well set in good grass sod; this is written in the blue grass region of Kentucky, and the person who fails to have a well kept lawn in this paradise of green grass (for the blue grass is green!) ought to be ashamed to show her face on the public street. Taking that emerald background for granted, I would suggest three things as of primary importance in the treatment of our yards, both back and front:

Leave Clear Expanse of Grass.

I. Do not spot the lawn with plants, but have a clear expanse of grass, framed in with flowering shrubs, and hardy blooming flowers. If the grounds are sufficiently spacious, handsome shade trees in front, and fruit trees at the back are always desirable. This "don't" is meant for single shrubs, or even straggling beds of flowers. The shrubbery borders should be carefuly selected from varieties that are suitable to one's locality, with the latter kinds in the rear, and lower growing varieties in front.

The accepted time for transplanting hardy shrubs will be upon us before we realize it, and one should lose no time in making out the lists and ordering the stock. In this latitude, I should unhesitatingly recommend the snow-ball for an early kind, and the hardy hydrangeas for a late blooming variety. Both do well here, both begin to bloom when quite small, and bloom almost every season. The lilac is beautiful, and fragrant, and redolent of poetry, but here it does not bloom when young, and often fails to bloom at all; but, of course, if one can have a variety of shrubs, the absence of the lilac would leave an aching void. Spireas, syringas, weigelias, pyrus japonicas, calicanthus, and a number of others, help to make the shrubbery border a thing of beauty for a long time. A limestone soil is certain death to rhododendrons and laurel, so these most beautiful of all our flowering shrubs must be stricken from our lists in this section. When you have planted your border, by all means avoid straight lines; curving edges, with low growing plants, or hardy flowers to meet the grass add tenfold to the beauty of this frame to your lawn.

Vine-planting.

II. Plant choice vines around the porches, and utilize the base of the dwelling for flower beds. In a selection of vines for porch climbers, hardy vines like the clematis and honeysuckle are more desirable than tender ones that have to be planted afresh every year. The summer is half gone before they grow to any size, and about the time they come into full bloom, the frost lays them low. The clematis is probably the most beautiful of all hardy flowering vines; the bloom is of unequaled beauty and variety, and the foliage is handsome and suffers but little from insect enemies.

The honeysuckle, especially the improved varieties, is well suited for a veranda, its fragrant, lovely bloom is dear to all, and its foliage is nearly evergreen in mild winters, and the leaves do not dry and drop off until nearly spring. Its rampant growth, however, makes pruning necessary, or it will look ragged and unsightly. The climbing roses are peerless when in flower, but their season is brief, and the name of their insect enemies is legion. I prefer them along fences, or on a trellis, or running up a tree. The crimson rambler and Dorothy Perkins, though, are both so beautiful, that even with these drawbacks, they are worthy of the place of honor on any house.

Walk in Mrs. Harrison's Garden.

Beds of Flowers.

Beds of flowers are far more effective at the base of such vine-clad porches than in the open lawn; their beauty is enhanced by the background of foliage and bloom. Climbing annuals, like nasturtiums or cobea scandans may be planted on the inner edge of the beds, to run up on the permanent vines, and add their rich quota of color to the general effect. Many persons do not plant flower beds, because they feel they cannot afford new plants every year from the florists, and tney think they must have geraniums or coleus or cannas for color effects. There is nothing that gives a more vivid mass of red than the scarlet sage, and it is easily grown from seed. Pansies, verbenas, asters, make lovely beds, and they come from seed without trouble. Petunias, dwarf nasturtiums, marigolds, cosmos, gaillardias, and other tender annuals, can be raised by the amateur, and planted at the base of lustrous green vines, making the simplest home beautiful.

Scripture Precept for Gardening.

III. Aim to have on your place hardy flowers that will give a succession of bloom the entire season from March to November. These may be planted in spaces in the shrubbery, and along its edges, or by the fences; use any odd corners, where nothing but weeds have grown, for these old-fashioned flowers, and so carry out the precept in the good Book, "Overcome evil with good."

If one has a grape arbor, the early flowers like the crocus, or daffodil, or lily of the valley will do well there; they do not require much depth of earth, and their bloom time is over before the grape leaves come out and make the shade too dense. The hardy flowers bloom but once, but by planting the right varieties, one can have bloom from the time the crocus and snow drop come early in March, to the time when the hardy chrysanthemums make our hearts glad in November. The purple and gold of the crocus and daffodil will soon be followed by the goodly company of the rest of the hardy blooming bulbs—the jonquil, the hyacinth, the narcissus, the tulip. The lilies of the valley will be here before they are gone, and then we shall have a succession of iris in their many hues, of pinks, peonies, poppies, coreopsis, hardy gaillardias, June roses and lilies, and then the midsummer blooms of hollyhocks, perennial phlox, stately lilies—and the glory of hardy fall flowers, Japan anemones, golden glow, fall roses and chrysanthemums—fit crown and close of the floral year.

Always Something New.

When one has a succession of these flowers, there is always something to look forward to—there is always something new in the garden calendar. During the whole season, you are meeting and greeting dear old friends from whom you have been parted for many a month. There is far more sentiment about the hardy flowers that come back every year, than about the tender plants that live one brief season and then die. And it is not only because they are mother's flowers, or grandmother's flowers, but also because they have something of the tender grace of a day that is dead in our own past.

I love my lilies of the valley, not only because they are so fragrant and lovely, but because they come from the garden of a dear old friend, who now walks in Paradise, in the gardens of her God; and as they return to me after the death of winter, clothed in perfect beauty, there comes to my heart the blessed assurance, that I shall surely see her again, clothed in the beauty of immortality. When we have many plants like this, given to us by dear friends, then the garden is not only beautiful for bloom and perfume, but a place for pleasant memories, a veritable friendship garden. I. W. H.

THE TURNING

BY SUSAN HUBBARD MARTIN.

She could hear the children in the next room getting ready for bed. She sat in the shadow watching them with her hands clasped.

"Was it only a month since that dreadful telegram had come announcing Bertram's death? Her son; her only son."

By the loss of their tall, handsome father with his kind ways and merry smile, the two children, already motherless, had come to live with her. In the newness, the desolation of her grief, Rachel Jewett had cared for them in a way, had felt that toward them she was doing her duty. She had seen to their clothes. She had gotten their meals for them, but there had been never once one extra dainty, or anything particularly tempting to childish appetites.

Why should she take any further trouble for anyone in the world? Was not Bertram dead? Nothing else mattered.

Nursing her grief, with rebellion eating at her heart, she had sat at the head of her table with that stern, forbidding look upon her face, taking away what small appetites the children might have had. They, not realizing their loss, as little children never do, sat there beside her, frightened and subdued.

"Would grandmother always be like that? Oh, if they two could only get away—and yet, it was such a pretty place. Papa had lived there when he had been a little boy, and in it their childish hearts would soon find happiness if grandmother would only smile, only talk to them, only be glad that they were there."

They had made friends already with the great spotted cat that occupied the hearth rug in undisturbed tranquility. Each one of them had already selected a favorite hen from among the chickens in the barnyard. They liked the great trees, too, that shaded the house, the currant and the gooseberry bushes, and the roomy barn in which they had already made a playhouse.

But for the unsmiling woman, who rarely spoke to them, they were beginning to have a dread.

Just then, in the next room, Rachel Jewett heard little Bertram—named for his father—speak to his little sister, two years older:

"Say, Milly," he said, in his clear, sweet, little voice, "ain't there ever going to be any apple dumplings in this family?"

Rachel Jewett saw the little girl hold her finger to her lips.

"Hush, Bertram," she said. "Grandmother feels too bad to make anything like that for us. I guess (with a sigh) we'll have to go without apple dumplings as long as we live here. Papa is dead and grandmother doesn't care for us as she did him."

"But I like 'em," replied little Bertram, still unconvinced.

"Yes; so do I, but I like something else better. Oh, little brother! if she'd only smile and talk to us sometimes."

There was a wail in the voice that touched the heart of the little boy. He went closer. "Don't you cry, Milly," he said, comfortingly. "We won't have to live here always. We won't, if grandmother never smiles."

Rachel Jewett, listening in the shadow, sat with her hands still clasped. "Bertram's little children. Why, she had in her selfish sorrow, forgotten them. Apple dumplings—Bertram had used to like them, too." And then, as she sat there it was borne in upon her how wrong she had been, nursing and fostering a sorrow that God had permitted to come with her life, even though it be the loss of her only son. Under it she had sunk into a being that even little children were beginning to avoid."

"Apple dumplings." Somehow, under the wholesome recollections that clustered around that word, she began to come to herself. The dull, sluggish despair that had engulfed her these many weeks, rolled back.

Rachel Jewett rose. She went into the room where the children were. Both of them looked at her, and then something in her face struck even them. Instinctively they edged toward her with their loving little upturned faces. Bertram's little children, so ready and willing to love her.

In that moment, she realized that the love of little children was no light thing. She must be worthy, must be ready to meet Bertram, by and by, knowing that she had given these little ones her best. And Rachel Jewett's best meant a great deal. There would be no half measures.

She sat down and gathered them both in her arms and the first throb of comfort, from their nearness, came to her in that hour. The valley of the shadow had been passed. Up yonder, on the hall, was the sunlight still, bless God, and with it many years of service yet, perhaps, to these whom He had put into her keeping.

She smoothed the little clipped head with a tender hand—Bertram's little boy.

"So you like apple dumplings, do you?" she said gently, and then she kissed them both.

"We will have them tomorrow, children," she said.

Plural and Singular

We'll begin with a box and the plural is boxes,
But the plural of ox should be oxen, not oxes.
Then one fowl is goose, but two are called geese,
Yet the plural of moose should never be meese;
You may find a lone mouse or a whole lot of mice,
But the plural of house is houses, not hice.
If the plural of man is always called men,
Why shouldn't the plural of pan be called pen?
The cow in the plural may be cows or kine,
But a bow if repeated is never called bine.
And the plural of vow is vows, not vine,
And if I speak of a foot and you show me your feet,
And I give you a boot, would a pair be called beet?
If one is a tooth, and a whole set are teeth,
Why shouldn't the plural of booth be called beeth?
If the singular's this and the plural is these,
Should the plural of kiss be nicknamed keese?
Then one may be that, and three would be those,
Yet hat in the plural would never be hose,
And the plural of cat is cats, not cose.
We speak of a brother and also of brethren,
But though we say mother, we never say methren,
Then masculine pronounces are he, his, and him,
But imagine the feminine, she, shis, and shim.
So the English, I think, you all will agree,
Is the most wonderful language you ever did see.

—Penny Pictorial.

How They Made Up

Two little girls were playing together and fell to quarreling. One of them had snappy black eyes and the other had twinkly blue ones.

All at once the one with the twinkly eyes stopped and said in the funniest way, "Essie, I'm sorry you were cross!"

Then the one with the snappy eyes laughed and said, "And I'm sorry you were!"

And that was the end of the quarrel.—The Child's Hour.

"The remains of that mastadon," said the scientist in the museum, "were found buried in an iceberg."

"H'm," responded the man from Chicago, "that cold-storage idea isn't so new after all."—Washington Star.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Eureka College Glee Club will give an entertainment at Taylorville March 15.

The pastorate of Detroit church has been accepted by L. M. Mullikin, formerly of Paris.

H. H. Williams has closed a successful meeting at Sidell. There were seven confessions of faith.

Grayville church, of which W. H. Kern is pastor, has engaged E. E. Violett for a summer campaign.

Pana church has just closed a three weeks' meeting, conducted by Evangelist C. D. Hougham, with ten additions.

R. V. Calloway of Havana and E. P. Gish of Kilbourne exchanged pulpits on a recent Sunday evening.

Lovington church, Gilbert Jones minister, has closed a meeting conducted by home forces, with twenty-three accessions.

Secretary McCash and President C. M. Chilton held an American Mission Parliament in Bloomington, Saturday, March 9.

A meeting was conducted recently at Edwardville, by Evangelist F. F. Walters. At last report there had been eight additions in the meeting.

Miss Mary Kelly of China recently held a devotional service with the young people of Ancona church, which is ministered to by Guy L. Zerby.

George W. Wise, formerly of DeLand, has taken up the work of First church, Lincoln. Plans are being made for an evangelistic meeting this fall.

First church, Danville, W. E. Adams pastor, closed the meeting conducted by T. L. Lowe of Columbus, Ohio, with thirty-one added to the membership.

Carmi church is supporting royally a Monday evening Men's Union Prayer Meeting. The attendance at a recent meeting reached one hundred seventy two. L. A. Chapman is the Disciple pastor.

Within the last few years, Maroa church has acquired a church building and parsonage worth approximately $24,000. All bills are paid and a small sum is left in the treasury. E. W. Sears is pastor.

The meeting at Breckenridge, held by district worker J. D. Williams, closed Feb. 26, with twenty-eight additions. At the conclusion of the meeting a new set of officers were chosen, and the outlook for the church seems bright.

A series of meetings with Mount Morris church has just ended. These services continued over fourteen evenings, with seven added by confession. Elmer E. Rice, singing evangelist, of Dixon, this state, conducted the music. W. T. Hacker, the pastor, did the preaching.

J. C. Reynolds has closed his work with Arrowsmith church, and has accepted the pastorate at Winchester. As a farewell to Mr. Reynolds, union services were held at the Disciple church the last Sunday evening of his pastorate.

One of the oldest and most wide-awake Disciple churches in the state is that at Armington. In order that every member of the official board might attend a recent important business meeting, many of the members planned to take their dinner at the church. R. B. Doan is the pastor.

Atlanta church is in the process of planning for a modern church building. The first voluntary subscription to the enterprise has already been made. $30 has been received so far in the offering for foreign missions, but the offering will be held over several weeks and it is expected $50 more will be raised.

C. H. Hands will close his work with Fairbury church in the near future. Fairbury profited greatly by a visit from Miss Mary Kelly of Nankin, China. During her stay she spoke to several rooms of school children, as well as delivering a church address. Her address to the high school was on "Present Conditions in China."

R. H. Robertson, after a five years' ministry at Shelbyville, has gone to Indiana, where he has accepted the pastorate at Salem. The missionary offering of the church for the past year amounted to more than $500, and the church attendance for the past year has been greatly increased. In recognition of the high esteem in which he was held by the citizens of Shelbyville, a public reception was tendered him before his departure.

Stuart Street church, Springfield, has called as its pastor, Gifford Ernest of Angola, Ind. He and his wife are graduates of the Tri-State College at Angola. Up to the last few months, Mr. Ernest was preaching on the Pacific Coast, where he spent about four years. The Christian Century takes especial pleasure in welcoming Mr. Ernest to this church, and extending to him every good wish in his new work. This church was organized by one of the editors during his pastorate in Springfield.

The owners of motion picture shows in Bloomington have secured 1,500 names to a petition asking the voters to decide at the next election whether theaters and other places of amusement shall be open on Sunday. For many months they have sought futilely to obtain the passage of a city ordinance permitting them to open their houses on Sunday. According to Attorney General Stead, the council is not compelled to follow the wishes of the majority, even should the vote be in favor of granting the petition. This is said to be the first time this question has been placed on an Illinois ballot; and ministers of Bloomington are showing a deep interest in the situation.

Secretary's Letter.

F. B. Thomas of Mattoon held a fifteen days' meeting for the Toledo church with 93 additions, 41 the last night. The church has not had preaching for some time. Fifty men were added, many of them among the substantial men of the town. They will employ a minister at once and their prospects are bright.

C. L. Organ's meeting at Rock Falls is reaping a splendid harvest, 42 the first two weeks. After this meeting he goes to Christopher.

G. P. Crawford of Odon, Ind., preaches half time for Metcalf.

The church at Niantic extended a unanimous call to Robt. E. Henry to remain with them the third year. The work is in good shape.

F. B. Jones of Decatur has been called to preach for Assumption half time.

The church at Noble, in Richland county, wants a good ham half time.

J. M. Francis of Newton takes the work at Knoxville March 17.

Albert Schwartz of Galesburg supplied the pulpit at Knoxville three Sundays recently, and will supply for F. L. Moore at Abingdon March 17 and 24.

The church at Lomax holds on to W. T. King for another year, which will be his seventn year with them, and that is right. The town of Lomax has a big boom on and it is likely to become a great city in the next few years.

C. B. Dabney of Barry has engaged to preach for the Independence church near Pittsfield half time. He has one-fourth time open.

J. J. Hudson of Oakland is open for a half time church.

Sister Vera Morris, singing evangelist, Stanford, is available just now for meetings.

We desire to make this column helpful to preachers, churches and singers in every way possible, as well as to give the news. But once in a while we find a man who does not want the fact published that he is available for work. We will be glad to respect every man's feeling in this matter if we are informed to that effect. And the same is true with churches. We will not knowingly annoy any one.

The Windsor folks, E. U. Smith, pastor, are planning to build a parsonage this spring.

The same is true of the church at Shirley, F. L. Starbuck, minister.

Beginning on Easter Sunday the First Church, Bloomington, will enter upon a three weeks' celebration of their seventy-fifth anniversary. The first week will be "fellowship week," when will be heard strong representatives of different religious beliefs, as Jewish, Catholic, etc. The second week will be "anniversary week," being given over to many strong addresses on the history of the church, reminiscences, honored names, struggles and victories. The third week will be "decision week," evangelistic in character, when the pastor, Edgar D. Jones, will preach each night. This series promises to be one of the most elaborate anniversary celebrations we ever had in Illinois.

The plan of enrollment of preachers adopted by the Illinois Christian Missionary Society has lately received very warm endorsement by the American Christian Missionary Society and W. R. Warren of the Christian Board of Publication. It would be a good idea if all the states would adopt some suitable uniform plan of ministerial enrollment. Let us get together, brethren. Here is an item that the State and National Secretaries' Association might take up with great profit to the cause.

State offerings are coming in very slowly the past few weeks and we feel more than ever the necessity of urging our delinquent churches to send us their offerings soon as possible. Our mission churches and workers must be supported and the general fund has a $1,400 deficit. This ought to be argument enough to bring a good offering from every delinquent church. We do not wish to startle any one into acting rashly, but we do wish we could induce about one hundred of our strong churches and about three or four hundred other able churches to send us their offerings this week. Come on, brothers. Surely our Lord's great commission includes Illinois.

Every Illinois preacher should heartily support Illinois missions on the ground of reciprocity. This society does more for our preachers than all the other societies and secretaries combined; yet many of our men give it the smallest support and encouragement. People generally stand by their best friends, but a good many preachers are exceptions to the rule.

Chas. E. Dunlap preaches for Tower Hill half time and is available for another half time church. Address him at Tower Hill.

The State and Home Societies will combine this year in gathering the annual statistics, so the one call for statistics will answer for both. The blanks will be mailed from this office in the form of a double post card, with the return postage prepaid.

We would like our preachers and clerks to send us card reports of your local work, what you are doing and what you hope to do. Also we are anxious to help preachers and churches to get acquainted, looking toward employment. We are glad to serve you freely, without even a "tip." Command us at will, and report all changes promptly.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.
W. D. Deweese, Office Secy'.-Treas.
Bloomington, Ill.

Chicago

The vacant pulpit of Monroe street church was supplied on a recent Sunday by C. C. Cross of Hammond, Ind.

The Parliament on American Missions conducted by Secretary I. N. McCash at Jackson Boulevard church, Monday, March 11, was extraordinarily interesting and helpful, although but poorly attended. It is difficult to enlist the attendance of laymen and women at a week-day religious meeting in this city. The ministers were present, however, representing not only the city churches but those of the vicinity as far as Kankakee, sixty miles away. Dr. McCash had prepared a program of subjects and speakers as follows: "God's Program," by W. O. Livingstone of Kankakee; "The Practical Side of Raising Missionary Funds," by C. G. Kindred of Englewood; "The Strategic Relation of America to the World," by E. S. Ames, of Hyde Park; "Unmet Needs," by Claude E. Hill of Valparaiso, Ind.; and "The Stranger Within the Gate," by Basil S. Keusseff, missionary to Chicago's Slavic population. These numbers constituted the afternoon program. After dinner speeches were made by O. F. Jordan, pastor at Evanston, Asa McDaniel, pastor at Harey, C. C. Morrison of The Christian Century, C. M. Chilton of St. Joseph, Mo., and Secretary McCash. Austin Hunter of Jackson Boulevard, acted as toastmaster. Mr. Chilton's address in the evening was a strong presentation of the problem of immigration in its aspect of Christian opportunity.

Church Life

John W. Marshall is in a meeting at Seymour, Ind.

The Southeast District Convention of Iowa will meet at Albia, April 8 to 11. The district comprises twenty-two counties.

Russell F. Thrapp writes us that the foreign offering of the First Church, Los Angeles, Cal., will reach $1,300, the largest in the history of the church.

Graham Frank, pastor of Liberty, Mo., Church, writes us that the continued support of Dr. Paul Wakefield is assured, the offering on March 3 amounting to $527.

J. W. Holsapple has resigned from the pastorate at Hillsboro, Tex., and will engage in evangelistic work, with headquarters at Sherman, Tex.

J. H. Goldner, pastor of Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, O., sailed on the "Canopic" March 16, for Naples and the East. He expects to spend some time in Palestine.

Joseph L. Garvin, pastor of First Church, Seattle, Wash., has been elected president of William Woods College for Girls at Fulton, Mo. He will assume his duties in May.

A. E. Dubber has just closed a meeting with his home church at Bedford, Ind., with ninety-nine additions, most of them confessions. F. E. Truckeess led the singing.

Wright and Saxton will begin a meeting shortly with Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., B. S. Ferrall, pastor. Mr. Ferrall writes optimistically about the progress of Christian work on the Niagara frontier.

Mrs. J. L. Garvin recently spoke in the pulpit of First Church, Seattle, Wash., on "The Mission of the Church." The address was greatly enjoyed by the congregation and was reported in the daily press.

John Slayton, of Minneapolis, Minn., has accepted the pastorate of the East Dallas, Tex., church, which Cephas Shelburne resigned to devote his full time to the editorial management of the Christian Courier.

M. J. Maxwell, who has been minister of the Church of Christ at McComb, O., for more than nine years, has accepted a call to Gibsonburg, O., where he will commence his work the first of next month.

J. H. McCartney, pastor of West Creighton Avenue Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., has resigned to accept a call to First Church, Waynesburg, Pa., from which church F. A. Bright has resigned to accept a call to Bellevue Church, Pa.

Miss Virginia Hearne, state secretary for Missouri, of the C. W. B. M., was one of the speakers at the woman's meeting of the federated societies on Jackson County at Independence, Mo. Two hundred women were present.

B. H. Haden writes us that Herbert Yeuell is attracting great throngs in London, Ont. There were fifty additions on March 10. The meetings are held in the building of the First Congregational Church, which is co-operating in the services.

Walter B. Zimmerman and Miss Carrie Sample were married at Muskogee, Okla., March 5, Charles Reign Scoville officiating. Mr. Zimmerman united with the church under the preaching of Dr. Scoville several years ago. He is now the pastor at Savonburg, Okla.

Makes Home Baking Easy
ROYAL

BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure
HAS NO SUBSTITUTE
A Cream of Tartar Powder, free from alum or phosphatic acid

According to the latest government statistics, the Disciples of Christ rank fourth among the Protestant bodies of the Anglo Saxon race, and sixth among all of the religious bodies of the United Stataes. During the past ten years they have moved from eighth to six place.

J. W. Bicknell recently closed a meeting with the church at Okmulgee, Okla., with thirty-five additions. R. W. Clymer, pastor of the church, writes appreciatively of the work that the evangelist performed. Mr. Clymer is the leader of a large union Bible training class in the city.

L. B. Haskins, of Baltimore, Md., has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Palestine, Tex. This church was ministered to by L. D. Anderson for nearly nine years. Mr. Anderson has recently begun his pastorate at First Church, Ft. Worth, Tex. Mr. Haskins will begin his new work in April.

Along with republicanism in China there seems to be a remarkable turning towards Christianity. Dr. John L. Barton, one of the American Board missionaries, reports that during each month of the last year more Chinese have united with Christian churches than during the whole fifty years of missionary effort ending with 1910. Dr. Sun, first president of the Chinese republic, is a Christian, and one of the first acts of the new republican government was to adopt the Christian calendar. Surely a great door of opportunity is being opened to the Church of Christ, a door which we pray she may by God's grace be enabled to more fully enter.

R. W. Abberley's meeting at Hutchinson, Kan., O. L. Cook, pastor, resulted in 115 being added to the congregation, eighty of whom were by confession of faith. The large majority of the converts were adults. Fully half of those responding to the invitations were men and boys. Hutchinson is a thriving city of 20,000 and one of our best western churches is there. O. L. Cook has led the congregation successfully in the erection of a magnificent building, and they support two missionary living links. Many of the substantial men of the city are active leaders in the various enterprises of the congregation. William Leigh of Akron, O., led the music, his solos and leadership being most efficient. Mr. Abberley and Mr. Leigh are now in a short evangelistic meeting with Pastor Earle Wilfley at Garfield Memorial Church, Washington, D. C.

C. C. Smith has written a delightful biography of Jacob Kenoly, the negro lad who went out to Liberia to preach to the natives, and whose tragic death occurred while he was trying to provide food for his little flock. The price of the book is fifty cents, and it is worth the investment several times over.

One of the most significant things in connection with the chosing of Dr. Sun as the provisional president of China was his adoption of the calendar of Christendom and the rest of the world. It is hardly possible to measure the influence and significance of this change from the age-long date system of China to that of the outside world.

E. E. Elliott, secretary of the Brotherhood of Disciples, urges that all ministers and leaders of church activity, should be interested in the Conservation Congress in New York, April 19 to 24. He thinks there should be an attendance from the ranks of the Disciples of five hundred workers. He writes: "There has been no more important announcement recently made."

Bernard Gruenstein, who ministers to the First Christian Church at Selma, Ala., has resigned to take effect not later than June 15. In the year that he has ministered, he arranged for the payment of a $1,000 principal note that had been overdue for five years, and has just raised the highest foreign mission offering in the history of the church. He has not yet decided his next field of pastoral labor.

Paul Mbula, who was baptized by Ellsworth Faris at Bolengi in 1902, and who became an evangelist of the Bolengi Church, fell heir recently to the slaves and wives of his father, who was one of the chiefs of the village. The widows and slaves were all consigned to the mission, whose wards they become. Thus one of the most difficult problems of the mission field is being solved.

The executive committee of the Missouri Christian Missionary Society, composed of R. G. Frank, W. F. Richardson, and L. J. Marshall, passed strong resolutions commending the work of D. Y. Donaldson, who has just resigned from the position of corresponding secretary, after eighteen months of service. They commend the work he has done and regret that he is compelled to relinquish the duties of the office.

There were twenty-six additions in a meeting held at Joplin, Mo., by Chancellor William Oeschger of Cotner University. G. J. Chapman is pastor of the church, and writes that the preaching was of the highest quality. There will be no reaction after the meeting. J. G. Olmstead led the song service and performed his duties most acceptably. Eighty-six have been added in the past sixteen months. There were 253 in the Sunday-school March 10.

Guy W. Sarvis has been in China three months. He was examined in the language by W. Remfry Hunt and passed most commendably. Mr. Hunt writes of Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis: "They are fine young people. They have come to China at a pivotal time. With their lives gauged to the regeneration of China and with the message of life interpreted in the terms of living truth, true to the redeeming meaning of the cross, they have an opportunity which angels might well envy."

An important step in the right direction was taken recently when the Baptist and Christian ministers of Washington, D. C., voted enthusiastically to hold joint meetings every two weeks. This happy decision was the direct outcome of an address which Earle Wilfley, pastor of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, delivered before the Baptist Conference. At the first meeting of the two bodies, Mr. Wilfley was elected president. It is anticipated that great good will come from this fraternal relation.

The itinerary of the team of the American Christian Missionary Society, consisting of I. N. McCash, O. P. Spiegel, and J. V. Baird for the last part of their trip is as follows:

March 18, Memphis, Tenn.; March 19, Little Rock, Ark.; March 20, Oklahoma City, Okla.; March 21, Sherman and ennison, Tex.; March 22, Fort Worth, and Dalas, Tex.; March 23, Waco, Tex.; March 24, Austin and Hillsboro, Tex.; March 25, Lockhart, Tex.; March 26, Houston, Tex.; March 27, Palestine, Tex.; March 28, Shreveport, La.; March 29, Fort Smith, Ark.

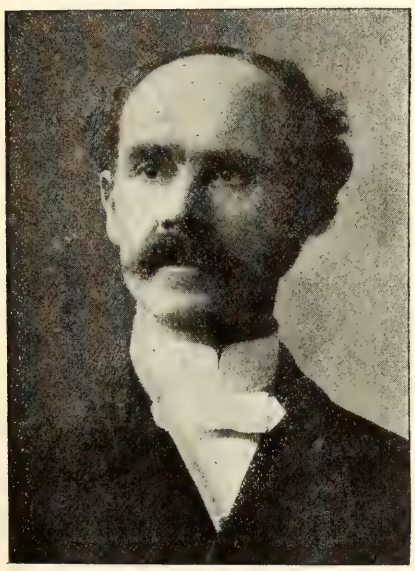
There has been an epidemic in Texas of spinal meningitis, which for a time paralyzed business, closed the schools and theaters, and greatly interfered with church work. All public meetings were for a time forbidden. While there are still a few cases, and some are reported every day, yet the worst of the trouble is over, and normal activities in churches and schools have been resumed. Much good was done by the Rockefeller Foundation expert who came to Texas from New York to assist in fighting the scourge.

The National Association of Evangelists of Churches of Christ is the title of an organization that was formed at the Portland convention. The object is to secure the cooperation of all evangelists, singing evangelists, and evangelistic pastors for the purpose of furthering the interests of evangelism in this country. The annual dues are $2, and all who are eligible may join by sending their names and the amount of the dues to the secretary, E. E. Elliott, 420 R. A. Long building, Kansas City, Mo. W. T. Brooks is the president of the association and James Small is the field secretary.

W. Remfry Hunt is evangelizing among the troops of the republican armies. He has had a free grant of 5,000 copies of the Scriptures in Chinese for the officers and men. He thinks the political conditions more assuring. He looks, however, with serious concern upon the tremendous change that lifts 400,000,000 of people out of old conservatisms into the liberties and enfranchisement of a new life. Mr. Hunt is one of our pioneer missionaries in China and has a splendid body of evangelists who have grown up with him in the work in Chuchow.

Sixty Years the Standard
DR. PRICE'S CREAM BAKING POWDER
A Cream of Tartar Powder Made from Grapes
NO ALUM

ITINERANT MESSENGERS OF AMERICAN MISSIONS



Secretary I. N. McCash.

Rev. O. P. Spiegel.

President C. M. Chilton.

Last Sunday the evening service at the Creston, Ia., Christian Church was conducted by the men. The special features were a male chorus, a male quartet, and addresses by several laymen. A great Men and Boys' Day is planned for April 28. The church is well organized for work, and every department active. Additions to the church are frequent. Since January 1, ten were received at the regular services. Four of these were fine young men, who came by way of the Men's Bible Class, organized and taught by the pastor. O. W. Winter is in his second year as pastor of this church.

C. M. Howe of Perry, Ia., recently assisted in a meeting for the church at Lawton, Okla., where A. R. Spicer is pastor. There were forty-eight additions. The pastor did the preaching, and he reports to us that, in the past twenty-two months there have been 250 additions at the regular services of the church. This is certainly a good record. The Lawton Church raised $4,488 last year, of which $100 was for missions. The Brotherhood of the church recently gave their second annual banquet. James Challener and W. W. Phares were among the speakers.

Great interest attaches to the Christian Conservation Congress to be held in New York City, April 19 to 24. The purpose of the congress is to devise means of continuing the work started by the Men and Religion Forward Movement. It is felt, and rightly so, that careful and wise planning will be necessary to prevent the good that ought to result from the awakening from being dissipated. The Disciples of Christ will have headquarters at the Hotel York, 36th street and Seventh avenue. The men will gather there on April 22, and will confer during the forenoon of the day.

It is announced that four prominent preachers of the Disciples are engaged for a campaign in Kansas for the candidacy of Speaker Champ Clark for the Democratic nomination for the presidency. They are: C. E. Hill of Valparaiso, Ind.; Creighton S. Brooks, of Portsmouth, O.; J. H. O. Smith, of Oklahoma City, Okla.; and F. A. Mayfield, of St. Louis, Mo. It is a thoroughly appropriate task for a modern prophet to perform, this taking an active part in the selection of the ruler of the people, and the Disciples all over the country are, naturally, very much interested in the candidacy of Speaker Clark.

The missionaries at Bolengi, Africa, report thirty-three more baptisms at Monyeka, January 12. It will be recalled that Monyeka is the station some 500 miles from Bolengi, up one of the side rivers that run into the Congo. The station has never had a missionary in residence, though frequent trips are made to the place by the men on the field. A. F. Hensey has long desired to take up his residence there, but is unable to do so on account of the lack of forces to hold the work on the older stations. The message reporting the new baptisms says that they are anxiously awaiting reinforcements. Surely there is a great field for some talented young man.

Beginning March 9 and continuing until April 6, the World's exposition known as "The World in Cincinnati," which will occupy the whole Music Hall and the adjoining buildings used by the Cincinnati Exposition, will be the great attraction of the district within reach of the city. It will require 5,000 stewards and many thousand other helpers to present it. The attendance in Boston totalled close to 375,000 and reached as high as 35,000 in a single day. As large an attendance is expected in Cincinnati. It will converge in Music Hall the life and problems of the world. It will not simply appeal to those interestd in missions, but to all.

The churches of Lincoln, Neb., are thoroughly organized for the work of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. Eleven different teams spoke on a recent Wednesday evening in the different churches. They are planning to reach all the county seat towns in the South Platte country with the influence of the movement. H. O. Pritchard is the chairman of the committee on Social Survey, which has just finished its investigations into the questions of population, social conditions, municipal administration, saloons, dance halls, death rate, social service agencies, sanitary conditions. The reports from forty churches were summarized and sent to the New York office, where the material will be tabulated and made into sixty great charts to be sent back and used during the Eight Day Campaign.

A new congregation was organized in Wichita, Kan., March 3, by the help of Walter Scott Priest and the members of the Central Church, of which he is pastor. Central Church dismissed fifty-six members who are to go into the new organization. The new church will be known as the Fourth Christian Church, and will be supplied for the present by the ministers of the other churches in the city. A year ago Central Church dismissed eighty members that a new congregation might be organized on the North Side of Wichita. Besides the four churches in Wichita, there is one congregation which does not co-operate with the others on account of differences about missions and music. The Fourth Church will not be ready to employ a minister till next fall.

On Sunday, February 4, the new church at Rockwell, N. Y., was dedicated. The building and ground represent an outlay of $2,500. The location is the very best in that rapidly growing suburb. One year ago, Arthur Braden, assisted by Mr. Stauffer, of the South Geddes Street Church, opened a meeting in a hall, which resulted in twenty-seven additions, and the church was organized. During the summer this congregation showed its stability by worshiping in the third story of the same building in which it was established. After many trials, the lots were secured and the building erected. On dedication day an even $1,000 was raised which was sufficient to begin work on. Following the dedication, Mr. Braden began a second meeting, which resulted in twenty-one more additions. Considerably more than one hundred people have responded to the gospel in Syracuse under the ministry of Mr. Braden during the past twelve months.

G. A. Faris, formerly editor of the Christian Courier, writes of the Gypsy Smith meetings in Dallas: "He is a good preacher, does more real preaching that the average evangelist of his class, though not so much better. His sermons were all on the duties of man in the everyday life, something badly needed, and something the people want. He has no sensationalism nor claptrap; speaks of himself a good deal, but not in a boastful spirit. His personal references are usually in his illustrations. He has about the same extravagances that are usually found in the popular evangelist. He puts the standard high—not too high, but higher than the people are accustomed to hear. He sings well, has a good tenor voice, and there is no affectation about him. With him a spade is a spade, though his speech is chaste and free from slang. The big building where he spoke seats over 5,000 people, and on Monday night, at a pay lecture, "From Gypsy Tent to Pulpit," it was full to overflowing at

The Best

The Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 are in The Life of Christ. You want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

The New Christian Century Co.,
700 E. 40th St.
CHICAGO

25 cents and 50 cents each, and some 2,000 people were turned away. This shows how he got hold of the people."

George Fitch, whose prolific fund of real humor marks him out as the most likely successor to Mark Twain, recently produced a clever "vest pocket essay" on the churches. He began by saying that churches are buildings in which people gather for the purpose of being good. "Most of them are open one day a week." He then continues: "Churches are not built by stock companies, but by voluntary contributions helped out by concerts, lawn parties, suppers, cantatas, fairs, bazaars, rummage sales, steamboat excursions, ice cream fetes, watermelon gorges, oyster hunts, and chicken pie soirees. Most of these events are pulled off by the Ladies' Aid Society, which usually takes up the burden after the men have given it up, and pays off the church debt. By working eighteen hours a day for a week, fifty women can easily clear $17.45 at a church supper and by giving one affair a week, they can pay for a medium sized church by the time it needs repainting, reroofing, and recarpeting. Most of our churches rest on the backs of tired women."

Bethany College Notes

President and Mrs. Cramblet left a few days ago for a month's sojourn in sunny Florida. The president has been busy with the work of the college, and it is hoped his well-earned vacation may be one of relaxation and enjoyment.

On Tuesday evening of last week, the English department gave, in the college chapel, the old morality play, "Everyman." The hall was filled with enthusiastic students, members of the faculty, and citizens of the town, all of whom were loud in their praise of the success of the play, particularly commending Mr. George Owen, who so successfully played the part of Everyman, and Mr. E. H. Wray, who took the part of Death. The play opens with the summoning of Everyman by Death to render an account to God of his record and deeds on earth. In his effort to persuade his friends, Good Deeds, Fellowship, Kinsman, Strength, Riches, Beauty, Five Wits, Knowledge, to accompany him on his journey, he finds that Good Deeds is the only one that will go with him. The lesson acquired was more helpful than many sermons, and the nature of the old morality play is better understood. Professor Bourne is to be commended for the successful staging of this play.

Professor W. Hein of Waynesburg College, Pa., will become one of the Bethany faculty at the opening of the spring term in April, and will teach horticulture and biology. Professor Hein comes to us very highly recommended.

The following Seniors have been chosen as commencement orators: Mr. William S. Wilkin, valedictorian; Mr. Ferdinand A. Poffenberger, salutatorian; Mr. Enoch C. Smith, Miss Hazel Mercer, Mr. H. L. Ice, Mr. George Owen, Miss Mabel Eberly, Mr. Edgar A. Johnston, Miss Mildred Stewart, Mr. James Wilkin.

GEORGE C. NEIL.

AMERICAN SOCIETY NEWS

There is great interest manifested in the spring campaign for American Missions. The offering day comes the 5th of May. New literature has been prepared. These leaflets deal with the different phases of the work in Home Missions. The problems of the country church, the city church, the pioneer field, the immigrant question, our Russian work, and suburban opportunities are all treated in a concise way. The pastors will find this literature exceedingly helpful. Order supplies immediately.

The apportionment letters for all America are leaving the office this week. We earnestly desire the pastors to think over the matter of our request for a definite sum from each church and write us about it. It relieves the tension on anxious nerves to be assured that the offerings will be taken and that an earnest effort will be made to reach the amount requested. It is hoped that in every case where the apportionment is not satisfactory, correspondence will be opened with the office.

Secretary I. N. McCash has been in the field since the 3rd of March. In his itinerary of Parliaments he is accompanied through the Northern States by President C. M. Chilton. Everywhere good attendance obtains and great interest is manifested. This week, on March 18, the itinerary crosses the Ohio River. Through the South and Southwest Mr. McCash will be accompanied by O. P. Spiegel. In all this itinerary J. V. Baird, of the Scoville Evangelistic Company, is present to lead the music. The McCash-Spiegel itinerary is as follows: March 18, Memphis, Tenn.; March 19, Little Rock, Ark.; March 20, Oklahoma City, Okla.; March 21, Dennison, Tex.; March 22, Ft. Worth and Dallas, Tex.; March 23, Waco, Tex.; March 24, Austin and Hillsboro, Tex.; March 25, Lockhart, Tex.; March 26, Beaumont, Tex.; March 27, Houston, Tex.; March 28, Shreveport, La.; March 29, Ft. Smith, Ark.

A comparative statement of receipts to the American Society for the five months of the current fiscal year shows a gain of $29,525.78. We are led to cherish the hope that the Disciples of Christ will yet awaken to the demands and opportunities presented by all America for the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

K. T. Williams is one of our evangelists on the pioneer fields of Montana and Wyoming. He is doing a great work in laying foundations. In the month of February he closed a meeting for the new church at South Billings and preached at Gilt Edge and Valley and is now in a meeting at Red Lodge. His next meeting will be at Basin, Wyo. In some of these meetings his entire expenses, including salary, are raised by the local offerings. No man can make better investment than to help the American Society support such effective servants.

Evangelist Henry F. Lutz is at Gloversville, N. Y., in a meeting. Mr. Lutz serves the entire Atlantic Coast states. He is one of the most successful evangelists in our brotherhood. At a recent Sunday service the largest Bible-school and communion meeting in the history of the church was held. There were not seats enough for the services and the theater building at night was filled to overflowing to hear the gospel preached. Mr. Lutz is supported by the M. A. Bull Named Memorial Fund, the income from which enables us to employ his services largely in mission fields.

J. Martin Rhodes is the living link supported by the Mansfield, O., Church, of which Chas. R. Oakley is pastor. He gives his entire time as pastor-evangelist at Bonars Ferry and Sand Point in North Idaho. At Bonars Ferry the church building is almost paid for. Recently they had 190 in the Sunday-school at Sand Point. The growth is gratifying. There are many churches in the central states that should raise their offering to $300 and $500 and become living links under the American Board.

J. W. Baker, our superintendent of missions in West Washington, reports more than 300 additions for the missionaries serving in his field during the months of January and February. He himself found time to hold a meeting at Raymond, where recently our meeting house was built and dedicated in which there were forty added to the church. Mr. Baker is now in a meeting at Camas. In West Washington we are employing such successful evangelists and preachers as M. R. Ely, J. E. Denton, Marion F. Horn, J. B. Lister, O. E. Ames, A. D. Scaggs, N. M. Field and B. H. Lingenfelter.

John a Stevens is making remarkable progress in our work at Baton Rouge. He is the living link representative of a business man belonging to the church at Columbus, Ind. Mr. Stevens writes that they are having better audiences, better Sunday-school and better services in the third story of a high school building than they had down on the river at the old church before it was sold. This shows what location will do. More people will climb three flights of stairs in an inconvenient school house located right, than would go to a well furnished church in a poor location. The location is more than half the battle in planting a church.

F. F. Grim, our superintendent in New Mexico, is doing his best to keep up with the remarkable progress of this great country recently come to statehood. He has spent nearly three months of labor this year in the southern part of the state. Among other places he visited was El Paso, where our second congregation is forming, the Sunday-school being already in a thrifty condition. This is where P. J. Rice is minister.

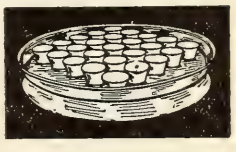
The American Board recently appointed a committee to see what could be done toward enlarging the quarters for our mission work in New York City. It is hoped means can be found for building an industrial plant at Greenpoint, Brooklyn. The same kind of a plant is needed in the heart of the East Side district where our Russian church is established. We need a $60,000 building fund for these two places immediately.

L. E. Sellers of the East Pennsylvania Board dedicated on Sunday, March 17, the new building at Wilkesbarre, Pa. This is a mission of the American Society. The building is a combined church and parsonage property situated in the heart of the rapidly growing residence district. This is the only congregation in the neighborhood and its outlook is exceptionally good.

GRANT K. LEWIS, Secy.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
CENTRAL CHURCH
New York, 142 West 81st St.
Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE INDIVIDUAL
"Noiseless"
CUSHIONED TRAYS


4 Different Features
WHY?
1st—"Noiseless"—As all cup holes are cushioned.
2nd—Dust-proof—The Trays interlock.
3rd—A short glass—no need of tipping back the head.
4th—Automatic Filler—Fills rapidly and evenly.
Does not mar the sacredness of the service.
Write for booklet. Outfit sent on trial.
DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
107 No. Dearborn St., Dept. T., Chicago.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS. THE WINTER OF 1912 SURPASSES ALL RECORDS

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

VOL. XXIX MARCH 28, 1912 NUMBER 13

Photograph by Permission of Home Field.

SEE ORVIS F. JORDAN'S DISCUSSION OF THE COUNTRY CHURCH'S OPPORTUNITY.

The Book World

CHARLES DARWIN AND OTHER ENGLISH THINKERS. By S. Parkes Cadman, D. D., pastor of the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. In our day when a pastor in a city like Brooklyn adds 2,000 members to his church in ten years we are anxious to know something of the man and of his thought. As a preacher, if he has liberal tendencies, we are anxious to know whether they have made him colorless; whether his charity is a polite indifference to the varying issues of his day. It is a delight to find a scholarly preacher who distinguishes between things that differ; who speaks out, and is not afraid; who can preserve his Wesleyan fervor while acknowledging his indebtedness to Darwin and Huxley; who can accept the conclusions of the evolutionist and yet preach with power from on high that men must be born again. Such a man is Dr. Cadman. His volume sets for itself the task of appreciating the labors of these English thinkers whose investigations and conclusions have produced an upheaval in the religious and scientific world. That part of the work is well done. The book is scholarly, and, of course, fascinating with that clearness of expression which has made the sermons of Dr. Cadman acceptable to all classes of people. Another task of the book is to help those modern men and women to whom former statements of religious truth have lost their freshness and their power; to help men dissolve the doubts which the philosophical skepticism of the nineteenth century has sown. That it will achieve its object wherever it is read in numerous instances we have no doubt whatever. It is a satisfying book. It deals with Charles Darwin, Thomas H. Huxley, John Stuart Mill, James Martineau, Matthew Arnold. With these scientists, the preacher, the poet and the philosopher, the author is on intimate terms. This is a valuable book which we can cordially commend. [Boston: The Pilgrim Press, 1911. Pp. 277. $1.25 net, postage 10 cents.]

AN EIRENIC ITINERARY is the modest title of an acount of the journey of its author, Silas McBee, editor of the Churchman, and John R. Mott, to all ecclesiastical capitols of Europe. They went at the behest of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference in the interest of the unity of the churches. They held interviews with all the mitred and crowned heads of England, German, Russia, Italy, Egypt, Palestine and Constantinople. Most interesting is the chapter on Russia and again on Palestine. The tour came to its climax in a World's Student Christian Federation meeting in Constantinople.

Mr. McBee has resisted the temptation to digress and sticks closely to his theme—the bearing of the tour on unity. This is conceived by the author and his associates as not merely the union of Protestant denominations, but as a unity of the divided body of Christ entire. He recognizes that this grand purpose will not be realized in the immediate future, but that it is the duty of our generation to build roads to unity. His method is that the church should co-operate in missions and the advancement of the kingdom rather than agree upon a platform of faith and order.

The book is well worth the reading of every student of the problem of unity. [Longmans, Green & Co., New York. Pp. 225. $1 net. Postage 10c.]

THE TWELFTH CHRISTMAS, by Marjorie Benton Cooke. This little drama is issued in even more attractive style than the sonnet-sequence, "To Mother," by the same author; the rich coloring of the cover, and the graceful green border around the text make a most lovely gift book. It tells, in blank verse, of the twelfth birthday of the Christ Child, and of his mother telling him of his mission and his doom. The shrinking of the mother heart from her task, and her appeal to her son are touchingly told:

"Thou, Son, must make me worthy of my charge,
And brave enough to sacrifice mine all.
Together, must we learn the scroll of pain
Thou, for the world's sake, I for thine, my Son."

The shock of surprise and fear in the Child passes at her appeal, and for the first time the Christ-look dawns upon his face, as he accepts his work. Mary says at the end,

"The love that passeth understanding Hath come unto the Holy-Born this night."

(Chicago, Forbes & Co. Fifty cents.)

STUDIES IN THE HIGHEST THOUGHT, by Dr. A. T. Schofield. This is another book in the widely disseminated series that have gathered themselves about the "Emanuel Movement." The demand for these books indicate the coming revival of idealism in our American life which seems destined to supersede the materialism from which we are just beginning to emerge. Dr. Schofield distinguishes between thought, Higher Thought and the Highest Thought. In the first he classifies the work of scholars. In the second classification is a certain group of philosophers who would reconstruct life from philosophy. Dr. Schofield claims the term "Highest Thought" for his application of mystical Christianity to human needs. We would regret the dogmatism that has characterized all who would cure our ills by psychic processes. Some of us would like to modify mysticism by asking the reason why. [New York: Hodder and Stoughton. Pp. 150. 75 cents net.]

THE EXPERIMENTAL NOTE, by Wilbur Fletcher Sheridan. The author of this book leaves no doubt of his denominational connection, as he mentions it in about every chapter. He is a Methodist. The book is written to exalt religious experience. With this laudable purpose most religious leaders of the present day would sympathize. However, when we note that he would make the kind of religious experience developed in the Wesleyan revival the supreme form by which other forms of religious experience are rebuked, we find ourselves unable to follow. The book is naive in confusing the tendencies of modern thought as confirming the Wesleyan position. To make James in his Pragmatism furnish a basis for the typical old-time Methodist experience is not to understand either. The book, however, gives needed emphasis to the idea of exalting true religious ideas in our ministry above the auxiliary devices. (Cincinnati: Jennings and Graham. Pp. 334. $1.25 net.)

THE MODERN MAN AND THE CHURCH, by John F. Dobbs. The Men and Religion Movement has called out a number of books that devote themselves to the task of studying the religion of men and the reasons of the estrangement of the men from the churches. The author states the astonishing fact that there are three million more women in the American churches than there are men and that among the men who do belong, there is a smaller percentage of attendance. The book is not the straight-forward attack at the problem that we wish to see in such a book but has much of the preacher habit in its composition. It often fails to hitch up with practical suggestions. Yet in certain statements there is much helpfulness. It was worth while to say, "The Church for Man and not Man for the Church." On the whole the book brings facts that will help men everywhere to organize a point of view toward the problem. (New York: F. H. Revell. Pp. 268. $1.26 net.)

PUBLIC WORSHIP FOR NON-LITURGICAL CHURCHES, by Arthur S. Hoyt. Dr. Hoyt is a professor in Homiletics in Auburn Theological Seminary and has already placed us deeply in his debt for books written in his particular field. This book rebukes the irreverence of much of our evangelical worship and pleads for a form of worship in which the preacher will not be the only worshipper. The book does not deal with forms but the underlying principles. It should be stimulating to ministers in all denominations in developing forms. We could wish now that the professor would gather together some of the best efforts of the evangelical churches to realize in practice what he has taught in theory. [New York: Hodder and Stoughton. Pp. 164. 75 cents net.]

THE GIRL IN HER TEENS, by Margaret Slattery. The author is a charming writer for young women. This book deals with the problems of the adolescent girl as only the insight of a woman might deal with it. We might have wished that something of the concreteness of the physician might have entered into the chapter on the physical life and that something of the definiteness of the teacher had contributed to the chapter on the mental life. In all that deals with the "eternal feminine," however, the book shows wonderful discernment and cannot help but assist puzzled parents the world around. [Philadelphia: The S. S. Times Co. Pp. 127. 50 cents net.]

GIRLS AND EDUCATION, by Pres. LeBaron Briggs. LeBaron Briggs is the president of Radcliffe college, the college for women associated with Harvard University, and Dean of the Harvard faculty. He has gathered together here some charming essays for young women, well-written and helpful. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin & Co. Pp. 162. $1 net.)

Kipling's Tribute to Evans

Rudyard Kipling had a fine opinion of the late Rear Admiral Evans, and the author's tribute to the "first class fightin' man" is of the kind which falls to few men. Kipling thus told what he thought of the American naval leader:

Zogbaum draws with a pencil.
And I do things with a pen.
But you sit up in a conning tower
Bossing eight hundred men.

Zogbaum takes care of his business.
And I take care of mine:
But you take care of ten thousand tons
Sky-hooting through the brine.

Zogbaum can handle his shadows.
And I can handle my style:
But you can handle a ten-inch gun
To carry seven mile.

To him that hath shall be given.
And that's why these verses are sent
To the man who has lived more stories
Than Zogbaum or I could invent.

The Christian Century
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

New Revelations

Only when the entire sweep and content of the idea of revelation is gained is one able to perceive in how unique a sense the Bible contains a message from God. The more one accepts the attitude of hospitality to the great truths that find enshrinement in the ethnic faiths of the East, the philosophic systems of classic ages, and the scientific adventures of ardent searchers for light, the more is he convinced of the unique supremacy of the Word of God among the literatures of the religious life. The Bible is in no danger of losing its true place so long as all the facts regarding its relation to other disclosures of the divine will are given their full value.

But the recognition of this supremacy of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures makes it the more imperative that the other forms of enlightenment by which God is continually revealing himself to men, shall be recognized and understood. It is not enough that the new truth that is constantly breaking out from holy Scripture should be seen and appropriated. Each new generation perceives hitherto hidden treasures in the Biblical literature. But it is also true that quite outside the Word of God, in the past history of the Christian society, in the providential movements of universal history, and in the present transformations which are being wrought in national and individual life, fresh revelations of the character and will of God may be perceived. The word of God is not limited to parchments or the printed page. In fact, there must be human documents before there can be written messages. The prophets spoke the word which was first organized in their own lives, and none of them ever uttered a message greater than that of his own experience. The word first becomes flesh, and later on some part of it is given permanent form as human literature. But it is the living word of human character, whether of prophet, apostle or Christ, that is of vital significance.

There is neither logic nor truth in the contention that God has limited his impartation of light and life to a few documents whose origin falls within a period of not more than a thousand years of human history, and that thousand years at least two milleniums in the past. It is true that the events of that period have had greater influence upon the religious life of the world than those of any other period, and we do well to hold in peculiar reverence the literature which records those events. Nor need we be concerned to look here and there for fresh revelations such as pretenders, some fraudulent and some deluded, have professed to deliver. It is not in this manner that the new values of God's life are made manifest. And it is a singular fact, not without deep significance to the student of revelation, that the voices that speak most convincingly to the world in this and every earlier generation have been those which affirmed their unvarying indebtedness to the Bible as the source of their noblest ideals and most efficient activities.

It is this two-fold aspect of the fact of revelation, its continuity and persistence through the centuries, coupled with its marvelous harmony with the supreme religious literature of the world contained in the Bible, that makes impressive one phase of the modern missionary movement not generally considered in popular reflection upon the subject. This is the fact that as Christianity penetrates farther into the non-Christian lands and deeper into the character of the non-Christian peoples, there will come fresh disclosures of the life of God as marvelous and convincing as those in the Christian history of the past. The great names of the church we know and reverence. But who shall say under what strange and unexpected conditions the heroes of the faith in the future are to arise?

It must be confessed that the story of Christianity in its achievements has been confined to a relatively small section of the world and a conspicuous minority of the human race. The type of thinking and of activity thus far developed in the church has been distinctly occidental. No one can deny the beauty and impressiveness of the results thus far attained. But how limited they are as compared with that fullness of Christian life which is yet to be made manifest in the continental spread of our holy faith. We know something of the theological tendencies, the aesthetic enrichments, the institutional activities which have been developed in that small section of the world where Christianity has been the ruling force, and we have satisfaction, not unmarked by humility, at the progress thus far achieved.

But what are to be those qualities of the Christian life which are yet to appear as the peculiar virtues of the nations beyond the narrow limits of traditional Christianty? We have only just begun to appreciate at something of their true worth the rich cultures and deeply religious natures of the East. What will not Christianity accomplish in the enrichment of these characters? And what in turn may we not expect with confidence as the new disclosures of the glory of humanity when regenerated and inspired by the gospel of Jesus Christ? If English, German, French, Italian and American Christianity have wrought marvelously in their revelations of what human nature may become under the touch of the spirit of God, what may we not hope to see when Chinese, Japanese, Korean and Indian Christianity have given us their new interpretations of the faith of Jesus?

In fact Jesus himself can only be understood in the light of what he can achieve through the lives of all his followers. His is therefore an ever-growing message, as each new race and generation makes its contribution to the world's total knowledge of his character and message. Surely Christianity, which is still in its infancy as a world wide faith, has a future of tremendous importance; and no aspect of the missionary problem is more inspiring than this of the new revelations of divine truth which are yet to be made within the circle of Biblical influence among the nations in the mighty family of God.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

A Patron Saint for the Country Minister

The call to the work of the country church grows more interesting to thoughtful men every day. Much of the work of social regeneration is being done in the cities by other forces than the church. In the country is a unique and untried field for social experimentation. A recent book has called our attention to some ministers who have immortalized themselves in country parishes. We might mention Keble, the poet and man of letters and honor man of Oxford, who was called at times from his country church to lecture at Oxford. In this retirement he helped in the direction of the Oxford movement which shook all England a century ago. He has put all Christians in his debt through hymns of singular beauty and spirituality. His Christian Year is a collection of lyric poems that are still read by countless numbers of people.

A greater type of minister than this, however, was John Frederich Oberlin. He was a doctor of philosophy but chose to settle in a rural district in Alsatia. Here he read all the latest books and set to work to regenerate a district which was in the direst poverty. His new methods of agriculture made the district one of the richest in all France in half a century. His schools anticipated the methods of Pestalozzi and Froebel. So great was his service to the district that the king of France made him a member of the Legion of Honor. When Oberlin College was founded in the wilderness, it was named after this great man. A recent volume giving the life of Oberlin written by a professor of that college would furnish every country minister in America with a worthy conception of the service which a country minister might render if he were aware and his heart on fire with the love of God and the love of humanity. The task of the country church must be conceived in terms that will attract strong men for the country ministry, which has deteriorated with the growth of the cities. There will be no great country churches without great rural ministers.

A Point of View for the Rural Church

The rural church will never go far until it realizes its functions in this modern age. It is well to talk of the minister as "The Sky Pilot" but unless he is still more "The Earth Pilot" he will not fulfill his complete function. The rural church should undertake to be a center from which radiates every influence that enriches human life. It might furnish a platform for an occasional lecture on scientific agriculture, which the minister might deliver himself if he had had some training at a school of agriculture. One winter's training of the minister at the state university might do more to establish his authority in the community than almost any other device. The country church will mistake its function if it conceives itself to be doing an entirely different work from that of the city church. The country has slums, as we are just now learning by the judicial murder in Virginia. The country faces the immigration problem just as the city does. The country neighborhood suffers from shifts of population just as the city neighborhood. The country problem is not the same as the city problem, but it is parallel to it.

The country church must first know its community. The minister and his aware helpers should make a survey of the neighborhood just as it is done for the city neighborhood. The survey will tabulate the population with reference to sex, age, race, education, religion, employment (working for self or others) and with regard to many other interesting features. This tabulated survey of socially significant facts must be secured from friendly visits and not from mere census-taking calls.

When the facts are all in, the social needs can be measured up and the church can then intelligently plan the contribution it is to make to progress in that community. In many communities the poverty of a renting class, the division of the community on racial and national lines, the mixture of educated and uneducated, will complicate the problem. The regeneration of the community may take the first years it took Oberlin, but some time, somehow, the task must be done.

An Institutional Church in the Country

It is evident that to transplant a modern city institutional church into the country would be the height of absurdity. Country boys who follow the plow have no need of Indian clubs. Many of our other city devices would be entirely out of place in a country church.

Upon reflection, however, one sees that there is a larger field for social work in the country than in the city, for fewer things are done for the people by other agencies. The city has a public library. The country has none except perhaps a Sunday-school library with stories of good little Willies that died and went to heaven. It would be a great thing to have a well-selected library in each country church of red-blooded books that fit the modern need. The country boys of the community need direction in their amusements. The gangs that rove around on Sunday instead of being in church might better be under adult supervision in a proper amusement place, or parish house, some time through the week. If there be no parish house, then a home of the community should be open with appropriate amusement. Nothing so entices the country boy to the city as the amusement possibilities of the large city. The girls of the country often grow into old women without ever having had any proper youth. They are a problem as well as the boys, though in the country a different one from that of the city girl. Their life is apt to be narrow and sordid without the social intermingling. The party and the social life for these may at times be as truly a means of grace as some other things.

An "institutional church" is often stereotyped. A socialized church is one that grapples with the local situation and devises means to meet the need. It is impossible to prescribe a rural social program which will be a panacea for all social problems. It is possible, however, to get a point of view which will make the church useful and effective in every situation in which it finds itself.

The Religion of the Country Church

The hard-headed practicality of the typical farmer exempts him from following the various religious "crankisms" that flourish in the city. He judges the message of the church on the intellectual side and demands that it be rational. It was a wise theological professor who advised his young men to take their best clothes when on trial in a city parish and their best sermons when on trial in a country pulpit. In spite of this practicality of the farmer, there is still a rural ministry that preaches a mechanical salvation. One of the ungodly recently asserted of this ministry that they taught that those who were baptized right and never played cards would go to heaven. Even though this characterization was not fair, it indicates a way of viewing some of this preaching.

The religion of the farmer must contain a strong ethical element. "The honest farmer" is more than a phrase. There is a strong sense of justice among country people that visits wrath upon the dishonest. There is no surer way to discredit religion among them than to show that it is barren in ethical results. The glory of religion among these people will be in the rectitude of the men who claim the religious experience.

The religion of the farmer must not be denominational in any narrow sense. The division of communities on credal lines has been a curse to the church since before the days of Thomas Campbell. Duplication of church plants and the cultivation of narrow sectarian prejudices runs counter to the neighborhood consciousness which is necessary for successful coöperation in industry, not to mention how counter all this is to the broad and tolerant spirit of the Founder of the Christian religion.

In short, the religion of the country must be broadly human. It must make its beginnings in the every-day life of the people, until they, freed from their economic burdens, may have time and energy to devote to the larger life interest. Then we may find that as God in times past more often chose shepherds and country men to be his prophets, so in modern times his word shall come to them with greater clearness and power.

—A "House of Prayer" has been organized in New York City by the young men of the Protestant churches, fashioned after the houses of retreat in the old world. The present membership, it is claimed, is 40,000, and is being recruited from the evangelical churches. Instruction is given by some of the most prominent Christian leaders. The aim of the organization is to deepen the spiritual life, and to realize, as far as possible, a practical and aggressive Christian unity. In our busy age, a "House of Prayer" is a monument to a living faith and a sincere piety.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Dr. Broughton and His Ambitions

If we may believe the Advance (Congregational), the path of Dr. Len G. Broughton of Atlanta, Ga., who has recently gone to a Congregational pulpit in London, will not be strewn with roses. The Doctor has been a successful warrior against the powers of evil, and many a time has set up the standard of victory upon their ramparts. He can do the same in London with much greater ease than he can work any reforms in the constitution of John Bull. We have our doubts about the ability of any man to rattle the ribs of J. Bull, seeing that those ribs, as an Irishman would say, have their roots in the everlasting hills. We think the Advance takes the pretensions of the Doctor too seriously, but as it affords good reading we give the article in full:

Dr. Len Broughton has become a man of fame on both sides of the Atlantic. He has made a great name in Atlanta as pastor of its leading Baptist church, and now he is to be head of the famous Christ Church, Westminster Bridge road, London, the church which the great Newman Hall once led along evangelical lines. Last year Dr. Broughton dedicated a vast tabernacle for his work in Atlanta, a picture of which, with a write-up, appeared in The Advance at the time. Now Dr. Broughton says that his health would be "absolutely wrecked" if he had to continue "under this load and carry this work." This sounds strange. Why did he load himself down with a big tabernacle and work which he could not carry? To use a homely expression, especially one which the man on an Atlanta street would readily understand, it is not wise for any man to bite off more than he can chew. Dr. Broughton, to change the figure, would probably feel disposed to lecture a driver whom he found loading his team down with more than the horses could haul. But is not that what he has done to himself and his successor? Is it going to be necessary to start a society to prevent cruelty to preachers who overdo themselves and their churches?

But there is still another strange chapter to this affair. Dr. Broughton was interviewed by an enterprising young reporter from the Atlanta Constitution, with the result that the American preacher was represented as going to "startle John Bull," take him by the horns, as it were, and make his ribs rattle. There will be "no flies on him" when the doctor gets through. "Everything and everybody," said the man worn out at Atlanta, "that comes within the range of my guns is going to get hit, if they deserve it. And from the king down to the meanest subject in the realm, England is going to stand a clear field before my batteries. I don't care who they are, I'm going to pay my respects to them." He proposes also to build a hospital, with a nursing force of from twelve to twenty-five. "There isn't a Christian hospital in the entire United Kingdom," he is made to say, "but we're going to have one." His chief aim at Christ Church will be to demonstrate applied Christianity—applied "to everything under the sun, theological, political, social, economical."

For a man who is crawling out from under his crushing burden at Atlanta and fleeing across the Atlantic for his health, all this looks like a pretty big program. Perhaps the great preacher knows how to bind up the apparent lesion between the two statements.

The Soft Pedal on "Distinctive Principles"

In a speech at one of the enthusiastic men's gatherings which characterize the present United Presbyterian "million dollar campaign," Dr. McCulloch of Pittsburg remarked to his fellow church men: "For what do we stand as a church? For what are we specially distinguished? My brothers, let us be candid enough to say that the old-time emphasis upon distinctive principles is practically gone. Distinctive principles are no longer live issues. You know, and I know, that in a multitude of instances they are coolly and deliberately ignored." With this cold comfort for psalm singing and the anti-secret society idea, Dr. McCulloch went on to say: "If we are to preserve our denominational identity, with sufficient reason for so doing, we must lay hold on bigger distinctives—distinctives that are abundantly worth while. Here are two of them: 1. Extraordinary evangelistic zeal. 2. Unparalleled missionary devotion." To this the Continent replies with shrewd insight:

This is all strong and fine. While the United Presbyterian Church moves in that direction, it is moving toward and for the kingdom. But truth obliges a faithful observer to say that it is not moving toward preserving the identity of the denomination. These two "distinctives" are good enough for all churches, and when all of them achieve both there will infallibly be church union that is union."

There was little hope of the churches getting together so long as the differences among them were made prominent. When the era came in which the points of likeness were emphasized, a better feeling began to be noticed. For Disciples there ought to be two notes in all our thinking which should be distinctly heard, that of the debt we owe to ourselves and the debt we owe to our denominational brethren. To be deaf to the one destroys our identity which must be preserved until our mission is fulfilled. On the other hand, a religious body becomes a rebel in the ranks when it forgets the debt it owes to those among whom it lives. The chances are it will die of isolation. To balance these two obligations requires talents of no mean order. How much do we owe our fathers and our brethren, and how much do we owe those whose interests in the Kingdom are as great as our own, though they walk not with us? are two questions which should be on our lips whenever the subject of Christian union is up for discussion.

A Romanizing Rector

While the average Protestant feels that the differences between Episcopalian and Romanist are as thin as a shadow, Episcopalians feel that any leanings on the part of their clergy Romeward are a menace which must be resisted; and yet the leanings are conspicuous in the High Church party. For many decades that party has created no small stir among Low Church adherents. Some one has said that Episcopalianism was divided into three branches, Latitudinarian, Attitudinarian, and Platitudinarism. The prospective suit in the courts may settle the question, for a time at least, to which branch the Staten Island congregation belongs. We clip the following from the Continent (Presbyterian):

St. Paul's Episcopal Church is the oldest of that communion on Staten Island. It worships in an edifice donated by a prominent family of the neighborhood on terms that confine its use forever to religious services conducted according to the laws of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Its congregation is principally made up of persons who would emphasize the term "Protestant" in that ecclesiastical title. Its rector, on the other hand, Rev. G. L. Wallis, is the sort of Episcopalian who glories in calling himself a "Catholic." According to charges formulated by members of his parish, which he confesses true, he is accustomed to "elevate the host" at communion; he allows the people to receive only the bread of the sacramental elements; he teaches transubstantiation; he requires members to come to him and confess their sins before they are allowed to participate in the communion; he keeps a basin of holy water in the vestibule and has "stations of the cross" along the walls of his church.

Evangelization and Education

Methodism has been a wonderful gospel propagandist. Congregationalism has subordinated her evangelistic gifts to the work of education. It is safe to say that the genius of each body will never be changed; each will continue as it has begun. Both methods of propaganda are essential, each the supplement of the other. Congregationalism depended largely on education to win converts to its cause; Methodism depended on its evangelizing power for results. One had an immediate showing; the returns to Congregationalism are slower, but they are sure when they arrive. If in Methodism we like to see the early harvest, in Congregationalism we rejoice in the substantial character of the oak. From the early days of Congregationalism in this country, there has been something solid about it. There is something suggestive of fixedness in the name of John Harvard; he seems to stand squarely on his feet. There is granite in a name like that. Possibly the combination of the scholar and evangelist and organizer in John Wesley has done much to shape the entire history of Methodism. In the long run, we believe a truer type of evangelism will come from the colleges, and that a more earnest desire for education will result from the newer evangelistic types. The Methodists will never know how their extremes have been refined through contact with the college, and the college will never know how many converts have been won to her through the voice of the evangelists. These are forces that act and react upon each other. A fair race between the two methods is thus described by The Congregationalist with the state of Nebraska as the field:

Fifty odd years ago the Methodists and the Congregationalists began work in the state with equal chance. The Methodists placed the emphasis on organizing classes, building churches and preaching the gospel in every community, and secondarily on building up a Methodist college. The Congregationalists did home missionary work in a creditable manner but, true to the historic ideals of the denomination, at once began the building of colleges and academies. At the close of the first half century the Congregationalists were graduating more students from the full college courses than were the Methodists, but the Methodists had four times as many church members in the state. When they got a strong church constituency then they began to place the emphasis upon their college. Today they are graduating more men and women than are the Congregationalists, have centered all their educational work in one place and will make Wesleyan University one of the strong institutions in the Middle West. The Methodists develop a system which, to be sure, their centralized government makes possible.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN. ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

The Resurrection

The place of the resurrection in Christian experience appears when it is discussed in connection with the cross. "The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again." It was impossible that Jesus should live at peace with the representatives of the established religion. They recognized him as an enemy of their kind of life. His death was their temporary triumph. His resurrection was their defeat.

The Christian seer learned that those who stood before the throne of God had come out of great tribulation. They had won the victory of faith after a great conflict. In this respect the disciple had been as his Master. The resurrection is misunderstood if the quality of the life that continues is disregarded. It is not mere continuance of life that is assured to the Christian but the continuance of a worthy life. The life that harmonizes with belief in the resurrection of Jesus is the kind the present world needs. Faith in the risen Jesus detaches itself from local and temporal supports. The universality of a spiritual view of the universe and of man forces itself upon the most reluctant mind. We try to find an exclusive place for ourselves and to deny to some persons and races the benefits of the highest religion but the effort is certain to fail where there is honest and persistent thinking. The disciples of Jesus went out to gather converts "out of every nation and of all tribes and peoples and tongues." We cannot tie up the faith of a Christian to any particular theory of government or of economics. Hence changes in the form of government are not in themselves indications of loss or increase of faith.

The appearance of Jesus to his disciples was an emancipation proclamation. It was a declaration that all men ought to be and may be made free from all enslaving habits of body and mind. Individuals may refuse to accept their freedom and groups of men may resist the growth of the conviction that men were made to be good and not bad: the priests and scribes who live on the sins of the ignorant and degraded may denounce as blasphemous a hope so daring: the hope is most reasonable if the world has any good reason for existing.

There is definite work for the believer in the living Christ. He leaves it to men without faith to preach the impossibility of correcting the evils that afflict humanity. There are men who do not bother their heads about human rights, who are willing to give the right of way to laws and customs that ruin the virtue and happiness of multitudes of their fellow creatures. Such men may even profess to be Christians. They have not the faith of Christians. General Booth saw the darkness of London. He knew, as few men knew, the sin and shame of the great city. He did not, however, turn away from the wretched people with the feeling that they were hopeless. The evil condition was a demand upon him to do something for them.

It has been said that some men have faith and other men have reasons for faith. Doubtless the most satisfactory experience is that of the man who has both the faith and the reasons for it. The world does not seem to have any intention of granting us the privilege of passing through it without having our faith challenged. The faith of the ignorant is often beautiful but it will not solve the problems of an age of religious unrest. The logic of a theological Hercules excites admiration but it alone cannot resolve our difficulties. Now, as always, we need the leadership of men whose deeds testify to their faith and intelligence. It is easy to act without knowledge or to argue without acting. We feel that our feet are on the solid earth when we strike hands with those who know the heart of man and who still believe in man's greatness, and act upon that belief.

The practical question for us all to consider is whether the world is finding in our lives any ground for faith in the living Christ. Does our speech testify to a clear apprehension of the problems that human beings encounter every day, or does it indicate that when we thought we became Christians we simply lost our sense of reality and are now moving in a dream world? Are we making the right of faith with enough seriousness to command the respect of anybody whose judgment is worth taking into account? Our Easter sermons and speeches and songs need the support of much honest and carefully considered work. [Midweek Service, April 3. Mark 8:31; 18:1-8; I Cor. 15.] S. J.

Treasuring the Results

The present season is one of great significance in the history of the church. The great enterprise known as the Men and Religion Forward Movement has been under way since the early autumn. Several "teams" have gone about the country bearing a message to the men of the churches, with special emphasis upon social service, the boy problem, Bible study, evangelism and missions. In more than seventy cities conferences of long or shorter duration have been held, either with the direct assistance of one of these "teams" or in accordance with the general plan but under local leadership.

The reports indicate that the movement has had unique value. It has enlisted the men of the churches to an extent hitherto unknown. It has awakened a desire for greater efficiency in church work and in the broader enterprises of the kingdom of God. It has brought the experience of the most successful churches to multitudes waiting for suggestion and example. It has capitalized the successes which were merely local, and has made them the instrument for larger effectiveness wherever similar methods are tried with similar earnestness.

More than this, it has gathered up the scattered threads of the Laymen's Missionary Movement and tied them up to the larger cord of general Christian work for men. It has been a comfort to know that the enthusiasm generated by the Laymen's Missionary Movement of two years ago has not passed away. It would be pathetic if any enterprise so noble in conception and so effective in operation could vanish and leave the churches without permanent benefit.

And now this is precisely the problem which thoughtful observers of the present movement are confronting. What is to be its permanent value? Will it pass away like the outflowing tide, leaving the churches only temporarily a little higher up on the shore of modern life? Or will there be some other movement of similar character that will follow it at a suitable distance and conserve its results, even as it has brought to expression some of the latent forces of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Only time and the consecrated efforts of Christian men can determine what the result is to be. We may hope for even greater results than those yet achieved, for the great conferences in this city and in New York are yet to be held.

But there is one feature of the movement which should receive constant consideration, and that is the work of conservation and continuance which must follow the local conferences and must be kept going without relaxation. An enterprise of this sort is precisely like a bank. The individual, the local church and the community, get out of it exactly what they put into it. There is no magic of blessing that can follow luke-warm and negligent performance. In every community where the Men and Religion Movement has found expression in local activity or in formal conference, some organization should be charged with the duty of carrying on the work. Wherever there is a Federal Council of the churches it should be given the task of conserving the results of the Men and Religion Movement which are so likely to be lost otherwise. Indeed, we can conceive of no nobler task for church federation to accomplish in any community than this of following up the efforts made during the present season by the men of the churches.

And where there are no formal groupings of the churches such as the plan of church federation so admirably provides, efforts should be made to keep the committees of the Men and Religion Movement at work. There is still the opportunity for consecrated men to render significant and continuous service in the stimulation of Bible study, work for boys, social service, evangelism, and missions. The churches must see to it that the results of this winter's work, so admirably planned and so faithfully executed, shall not be lost.

Christians, But in a "Corrupt" Sense

A more tangled-up piece of writing has hardly appeared in recent Disciple discussion than the essay of I. J. Spencer in The Christian Evangelist of last week. Mr. Spencer, it will be recalled, denied in toto The Christian Century's six affirmations concerning the Disciples attitude toward Presbyterians, Methodists and others. He denied that Presbyterian churches are churches of Christ in the strict New Testament sense, and denied also that members of those churches are members of the church of Christ in the normal, adequate and apostolic signification of the phrase "Church of Christ." The words in italics, but not the italics, are Mr. Spencer's.

The Christian Century responded that such a phrase as "in the strict New Testament sense" was irrelevant because "there was no other sense except a New Testament sense in which an institution could be a church of Christ. The Church of Christ is a New Testament institution. If an institution is not a church of Christ in the New Testament sense it is inconceivable that it should be one in any sense outside the New Testament."

To this Mr. Spencer rejoins: "Here then is the issue: Is there any other than a New Testament sense in which the word 'church,' 'Christian' or 'baptism' can be used?"

Now any one who reads the above words can see that that is not the issue at all. We do not call in question the fact that the word "church" is currently used in other than New Testament senses. The issue is not whether the word "church" is currently used in any other sense than the New Testament sense but whether the thing "church of Christ" can exist in any other than the New Testament sense. We affirm that the First Presbyterian church of Lexington, Ky., is a church of Christ in the New Testament sense. Mr. Spencer denies that it is. He adds, however, "that the word 'church' is used in a modern, popular, but corrupt, sense more frequently than in its New Testament sense," and says that he "cheerfully concedes and has never denied," that according to this "corrupt" definition of the word "church" the First Presbyterian church of his home city is a church of Christ.

Does it not all come to the same sorry thing as if Mr. Spencer had altogether omitted the words "in the New Testament sense" from his denial? From Mr. Spencer's point of view Presbyterians have no right to call themselves Christians nor their churches churches of Christ in the only sense in which they could possibly care to use the terms. They, of course, would not thank him for his "cheerful concession" of their right to use the titles in their "corrupt" sense. They would look with scorn, or more probably with pity, upon the man who would "concede," whether grudgingly or "cheerfully," that they were Christians and their churches churches of Christ in an extra-New Testament sense of these terms! How Mr. Spencer, member of the Disciples' Commission on Christian Unity, can imagine that there is the ghost of a chance for the success of a plea that assumes an attitude of patronage like this, passes our comprehension.

However, rather than to discuss the point further we submit the following questions to Mr. Spencer, to which we and, we believe, our readers, will be grateful to have him reply.

1. What is the connotation of the term "church of Christ" in the sense cheerfully conceded by Mr. Spencer to apply to the First Presbyterian Church of Lexington?

2. What is the connotation of the term "church of Christ" as used in the New Testament?

3. What is the connotation of the term "Christian" in the sense allowed by Mr. Spencer to apply to Presbyterians, let us say to Robert E. Speer?

4. What is the connotation of the term "Christian" as used in the New Testament?

5. What is the connotation of the term "baptism" in the sense allowed by Mr. Spencer to be applicable to one to whom it had been administered by sprinkling?

6. What is the connotation of the term "baptism" as used in the the New Testament?

Mr. Spencer's article dwells at length upon these two "senses" in which the three words are used, but he does not give a hint as to the connotation of any of them. He exhorts the editors of The Christian Century to study "the clear, comprehensive, New Testament definition of the words 'church,' 'Christian,' and 'baptism.'" We gladly accept his wise counsel and request him to give us for our first lesson the definitions asked for above.

In addition, it would help us to discriminate the definitions more clearly if Mr. Spencer would reply to the two questions we asked in the article to which his present statement is a reply, viz.,

1. Are the churches of the Disciples [The Central Church, Lexington, for example] churches of Christ in the strict New Testament sense?

2. Are the members of Disciples' churches [of Central Church, Lexington] members of the Church of Christ in the normal, adequate and strict New Testament sense?

We do not wish to seem to lay upon our good friend the burden of making an ecclesiastical dictionary, but we believe there will be thousands of Disciples, not to mention those of other bodies whose status we are discussing, who will join with us in a sincere request for a clean-cut discrimination of the divergent senses in which Mr. Spencer uses these important words.

The Problem of the Minister's Time

Before any minister gets very far along in his career he is confronted with the problem of husbanding his time. He finds that a day can go by, possibly two or three a week, and nothing be accomplished that is worth while. Friends drop in for a chat; others invite him to take a ride into the country; he must consent to be detained in the store or on the street, awaiting the convenience of his friend; and in a score of ways too well known to every minister the time goes by until its waste becomes an issue in his life. To have a daily program, a time for study, to visit and to be visited, is difficult to live up to, but it must be done if the minister is to make full proof of his ministry. There is often as much sacrifice in the minister's guarding his time as in contributing to the world's redemption on special days. To have a stated program and live up to it may be expensive; to have one and not live up to it may be ruinous.

The time honored custom of pastoral visiting is a great consumer of time, and, on the whole, the returns from it are meager. Almost every pastor passes through a state of mental siege with reference to it. He has been taught that there can be no success without it; and by test he begins to wonder how there can be any success with it. But he nerves himself in favor of the traditions of his office, and ignoring his convictions, takes a fresh hold on the practice.

His tenacity may be due to the natural desire to preserve the uniformity of a pastor's duties; he wants to do what his brethren do. But more likely his inspiration comes from the result of the congregation's having been taught the necessity of pastoral visiting as thoroughly as he, and his absence from their homes is penalized by their absence from church, a silent resentment of his failure to do his duty. Again and again he girds himself for a cycle of visits. He began his ministry with the desire to be an acceptable preacher, a pulpit power, if that were possible; he finds himself becoming an expert door-bell ringer. Instead of having the time to learn and impart the great verities of the Christian religion, his time is spent in a round of formal pleasantries. Friday comes and even Saturday—the sermon barrel was relieved of its best treasures long ago—and in great haste something must be made ready for Sunday.

From the preacher who earlier desired to be among the number who had something to say he has been compelled to join the ranks of those who had to say something. Nor will it be found true that "a house going parson makes a church going people," unless there be something more than a formal utterance of well worn platitudes in the pulpit. The man with a message must be there. And thus the pastor finds himself on one horn of the dilemma on Sunday, and on the other the remaining days of the week.

There are men who would rather be on the streets jollying the people than in the study or in the pulpit. They have their reward. Such do a great amount of good in reaching a class on whom their pulpit could have no influence. But these ministers as a class feel no sense of loss if they are deprived of their liberty a week or a month. The world at large has little interest for them. The daily paper and the denominational weekly supply a void that never aches from over consumption. A round of domestic duties in the morning, a dozen visits in the afternoon, and a rush for the sermon barrel early Sunday morning, comprise the activities of their careers. It can hardly be said that they lead the intellectual life, though they read a book now and then. To them, getting close to the people is the one thing needful. These are good men and they perform a useful work, but their preaching has never been known to inspire the quick or to arouse the dead.

It is this class that is always referred to by the crowd as "good men." I presume we have all noticed the distinction between the preacher who can preach and the preacher who can't. One is an able preacher, the other is a good man. No one means to say that the acceptable preacher is not a good man; he may be even a better man than the one whose goodness is announced. But in estimating ministers human nature tends more to flattery than to total depravity. It sets its seal of approval on pulpit failure by proclaiming the goodness of the failure. The sermons pass out of mind while their author is embalmed in odor of sanctity.

Another type of preacher faces this problem of tread-mill time first with anxiety and later with desperation. As he grows in knowledge and has a wider acquaintance with men and books, the time element becomes a more serious factor in his life than he could have imagined ten or twenty years before. His reading has opened up new fields to him in which he walks with perpetual delight. Almost any great book that has come into his hands will compel him to go abroad into other lands of profit and enjoyment, one book demanding another and widening his view as certainly as the progress of the ship lifts the horizons for the sailor.

Once he sets foot into the student's world he can never turn back; he faces the illimitable and never again can be content in the narrow tenantry of earlier days. The great preachers find him with their tongue of fire; the poet charms him by the music of distant worlds; the historian brings the past again before his eyes, and points him to see that the race is living the same life in all ages only on different levels; the philosopher helps him to an understanding of the problems that make life the complex entity that it is. No longer need the lover of books seek the delights of travel in India or in far-off Cathay, for the world with its treasures of every name is at his door. He can realize if he will the peace for which ardent souls have longed, as told by the immortal preachers; he can find the music of the poets in the world that lies under his own roof; he may embody the principles of truth, honesty, and justice, the triumphs of which glorify; and it is possible for him to have a simple philosophy of life that will keep him in harmony with whatever is true, and beautiful, and good in the whole world of being. Add to this the knowledge of what God is doing today, as surely working among the children of men as when he spoke from smoking mount or burning bush, and he has an enjoyment and a profit that cannot be surpassed among the employments of mortal man.

Now such a preacher will find it a source of joy to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction. He will spend and be spent in behalf of those to whom life has become an intolerable burden, and whose music is a cry. He will not count any time lost that is spent in comforting the sad, relieving the distressed, encouraging the faint-hearted. He will count it a privilege to put his shoulders under burdens that must be borne, and to make his heart as free as a well-spring to the weary. Time spent in any helpful service is never wasted. It is because it is the minister's privilege to be a real helper, a son of consolation, a soldier of the common good, that his is a holy calling.

But alas! we are all suffering from the tyranny of customs that have persisted in spite of all efforts to abolish them, and pastoral visiting of the routine type is one. If the pastor does not call regularly his polite parishioner concludes that his love has waxed cold; another family must be coddled lest they perish in the winter of neglect; others must see the pastor regularly, for no reason in the world, except that such has been the custom, and should he not appear they would suffer a decline that would prove fatal—for him. Others have been taught to regard the pastor's visits as a season of hilarity, he must force his good humor to work over time in some homes or suffer the charge of being in poor health, fast tending to pessimism, or some other accusation that if not corrected will make his doom as certain as the doom of Babylon. For all these types among the membership, and others too numerous to mention, may be found in almost every community. We are even sacrilegious enough to report that we have known godly men who went on such rounds with a smile on the face and rebellion in the heart.

We believe the ministry ought to join hands for a better use of the time that at present is employed in routine visiting. I have nothing to say against pastoral visiting that is really such; I have a good deal to say against peripatetic jollying that passes current under the name of pastoral visitation. Social calls ought to be made an incident in the pastor's work as they are in the work of any other class; they ought not to be regarded as a necessity of his ministry. Calls should be made for cause, not for the sake of custom. The people ought to be reasonable enough to disregard the childish notion that the periodical visit was a token of affection, and its absence a certain proof of clerical snobbery or slight. The congregation would further the cause of ministerial efficiency by demanding that the pastor feed their souls from the pulpit, and not their pride in the parlor. If the congregations want scholarly men they can have them; but no man can allow his talents full swing, or use his attainments to the noblest advantage if he is compelled to spend many hours in the week in routine visiting. The ministry is too serious a work for that sort of thing in our age, and the time could be spent more profitably to all concerned in the minister's greater opportunity of making the eternal realities more appealing to the souls of men. E. B. B.

When Wilt Thou Save the People?

When wilt thou save the people?
O God of mercy, when?
Not thrones and crowns, but nations;
Not kings and lords, but men.
God save the people; thine they are:
Thy children as thine angels fair,
From strife, oppression, and from war;
God save the people!

Shall crime bring crime forever?
Strength aiding still the strong;
Is it thy will, O Father,
That men shall toil for wrong?
No, say thy mountains; No, thy skies;
Earth's clouded sun shall brightly rise;
And songs ascend instead of sighs;
God save the people!

When wilt thou save the people;
Oh God of mercy, when?
The people, Lord, the people,
Not thrones and crowns, but men.
God save the people, thine are they;
Let them not pass like weeds away;
Their heritage a sunless day;
God save the people!

The above hymn appeared in England at the time of the Anti-Corn Law agitation in the fore part of the last century, and well voices the prayer of the common people who may feel the iron of economic oppression.

The Children of Imbeciles

In the Survey for March much attention is given to the subject half-witted people beget children in wedlock or out and and that from half-witted people beget children in wedlock or out and that from this miserable progeny our drunkards, harlots and criminals come. It is proposed that these people who should never be allowed to have children should be confined in institutions even when they are not dangerous that society may be protected from the danger of this issue. For this kind of persons institutional life would often be pleasanter than what they now have and they would live out their term of life without any danger of contaminating society. The new science of eugenics has revealed to us the need of some social regulation of parenthood and it is quite obvious that we shall need to begin just here that we shall no longer have children that are damned before they are born.

– In Boston a novel religious meeting is held in Ford Hall. After the sermon, an opportunity is given the audience to ask questions, and the hour is the liveliest of the entire service. The sleepers wake up, and the meeting often holds until ten o'clock.

– Those who live to the future must always appear selfish to those who live to the present.—Emerson.

Editorial Table Talk

Old Church Ways Passing

Fred B. Smith, campaign leader of the Men and Religion Movement, states that he has not laid great store upon reports of increases in Bible class memberships, or even in those of increased membership of men in the churches, although the latter increase is the primary aim of the campaign. Rather has he looked for changes in Christian ways, since if old ways continue they will produce, after awhile, the same conditions they produced before.

In two directions Mr. Smith says he thinks he sees ends of old cause for religious decay among men. In one direction he sees the end of individualism in the pulpit, and the ability of ministers to do team work. He says the purely individualistic quality is out of date in the pulpit to-day. In another direction he sees, or seems to see the end of denominational divisions. He believes the Men and Religion Movement, whatever else it may have done, has sounded the death-knell of denominational distinction. He says that few things have struck him with more force, sometimes absurd force, as he has gone into every part of the country, than the reasons for different churches in communities. He believes the Movement to have set Church unity forward at least twenty-five years.

Unrest Among Ministers

A curious condition obtains among Christian ministers of America, as just reported by one Episcopal bishop, who is among the best known of American Christian leaders, but who must here be nameless. There are applying to him, he says, scores of ministers from other religious bodies asking him to receive them into his church. He is unable to do so, owing to lack of rectorates for them, but he states that they are so numerous and so insistent that, were there dearth of young men entering the seminaries for a year or two, he believes he could himself fill the demand.

Ministers who apply to him are resident in almost every state, and they are in practically every religious body. Asked if any Roman Catholics apply, he replied that not a week passes that some do not, and that they are quite as numerous in proportion as are those applying from other bodies. He does not assume, he says, that his church is over popular, but rather that there is tremendous unrest among ministers, and that others besides him, in positions where they might place new men, are besieged as he says he is with applicants for admission into their respective churches. He says those applying are by no means young men, nor are they men who have failed in present pastorates. He intimates that were he to give names, which he refused to do, many people would be surprised at the desire of some men to quit prominent pulpits which they now hold.

Conservation Congress in New York

As a culmination to the great campaigns conducted by the Men and Religion Forward Movement, the conservation congress to be held in April, in New York City, promises to be an affair of great size and enthusiasm. The following are the objects of the congress:

1. To summarize the year's campaign and to present a program for permanent work.
2. To face Christianity's unsolved problems in realizing a world brotherhood.
3. To make possible greater economy and efficiency in organizations doing special work for men and boys.
4. To give an added demonstration of the essential unity of Christianity.
5. To give an illustration of the masculine power of the church.
6. To produce an adequate literature upon the various phases of the message of the movement.

The body of delegates to this great congress will be appointed by the cities in which the movement has been organized during the past winter. Each central city in which an eight-day campaign has been conducted by the national committee of ninety-seven will be represented by a delegation of men proportionate in numbers to the size of the city and named by its own local committee of one hundred. These same local committees will invite all auxiliary towns within their respective districts to appoint also from one to three delegates. The committee of ninety-seven will, in addition, invite all the national officers of the various denominations that have co-operated in the movement, and likewise a representation of leading pastors. The same committee will name 100 delegates at large from among the foremost American Protestant laymen.

—It is stated that the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, with headquarters in Boston, must receive $187,000 more than during March of last year, and the Home Mission Society, with offices in New York, $71,000 more, if deficits larger than last year are to be avoided. The secretary states that if deficits occur they are to be taken by the societies that Baptist churches desire, or are willing to consent to, retreats and retrenchments in work. While expectations from laymen's movements are declared to be justified, it is admitted that larger apportionments have been made. The trouble seems to be, the Baptists say, that expectations are not realized as rapidly as some had hoped.

—As an expression of gratitude in behalf of the blind, a bronze statuette of "The Three Graces" was presented to Mrs. William Ziegler of New York City, by those who have been helped by her devotion. Five years ago she began the publication of the Matilda Ziegler Magazine in raised type, and has had it distributed free among the blind of the United States and Canada, at a cost of $25,000 a year. One reader in Alabama showed his appreciation by the collection of 5,000 dimes towards the purchase of the memorial. The names of the 5,000 contributors were inscribed in a parchment booklet which was presented in a covered bronze and gold jewel casket.

—Some of our Unitarian friends are disturbed over the resignation of one of their Eastern pastors because the liberty of one of his pupils had been infringed upon in the discouragement that he suffered after preaching a sermon in which was denied the existence of God. Even the most liberal cults affirm that freedom has its limitations, and we know it always must have as long as the sea has a shore. The boundaries of freedom are being continually widened, but there is a point where even freedom fears to tread.

—Plans are being made in Chicago to bring the membership of the Sunday-schools up to the half-million mark by June, 1914, when the international Sunday-school convention will be held there. One of the features of the campaign as outlined by Mr. Charles B. Hall, general secretary of the Cook County Sunday-school Association, will be a system of house to house visitation which will bring the workers in contact with every home in the city.

—The Laymen's Missionary Movement is lending its national leaders, J. Campbell White and William B. Millar, and its secretaries in different cities, to the China Famine Relief Committee, which hopes to induce persons of wealth in America to send $1,000,000 to buy supplies for the 6,000,000 starving families in Central China. The committee, of which Bishop Greer is the chairman, is co-operating with the American Red Cross Association.

—In France a curé is guaranteed only $180 a year and a house to live in. In England $335 is the lowest stipend for a beneficed clergyman. In America the cost of living makes larger stipends necessary, but the average salary is yet so low that the pinch of poverty is felt in many a parsonage.

—When Speaker Champ Clark was doing active service in Sunday-school and church, he little thought that in after days his fine record would be the means of enlisting some of his ministerial brethren in his behalf, in his present canvas for the presidency. It is said that four ministers of the Speaker's church are actively prosecuting his campaign in Kansas.

—"Let the man who goes to church, who reads his Bible, feel that it is particularly incumbent upon him so to lead his life in the face of the world that no discredit shall be brought upon the faith that he professess,"—that is the way Theodore Roosevelt talks to the conscience of churchmen.

—The spirit of Christianity will never die as long as there are men and women who are willing to die rather than to renounce their faith. To the noble army of martyrs must be added those of China in these recent days.

—A bill is now pending in Congress that would appropriate $50,000 for an equestrian statue to that famous soldier, patriot, and Christian, General Oliver O. Howard. This is in line with similar memorials to other great soldiers, and is deserving of success.

—According to the calculation of a French statistician, the number of books published throughout the world each year, is 128,500.

Interpretations

We Missourians have our problems with regard to baptism as well as Disciples elsewhere. The other morning the minister of the Second Christian Church which is composed of colored brethren (the First Church is that with which I am affiliated and is composed of white folk, mostly Clark Democrats and are therefore a superior people) came to me in a greatly disturbed state of mind. He said he had an unusual funeral in the afternoon and wished me to give him a text. His request was refreshing; for most of the preachers I know can easily get the text but have trouble in getting the sermon.

In reply to my question as to the unusual character of the funeral he told me the following circumstances regarding the deceased. He was twenty-one years old, and had been popular among the colored people. The cause of his death was pneumonia. While sick he called for my guest, the minister of the Second Church, who read to him several passages from the New Testament that set forth baptism as necessary to the remission of sins. The young man thinking he was going to die, demanded immersion at once. The bath-tub was ordered filled. But some one telephoned the doctor and he firmly forbade the baptism. The relatives took sides, some agreeing with the minister and some with the doctor. They had a heated argument. But before the matter was decided the young man died. But the discussion as to baptism continued, and the colored population wondered what the preacher would say at the funeral. Colored funerals are usually very largely attended; but this one would be exceptionally so.

The colored minister was in great distress of mind. He said: "If I preach him into heaven the people will say baptism is not necessary to salvation; but if I preach him into hell they will say I should not have allowed the doctor to stop me from baptizing him."

The reader will see that our Missouri problems are concrete.

Well, I sent him away with a good, safe text; and he seemed relieved. What text would you have given him?

* * *

One of our nationally known evangelists is holding a meeting in a neighboring town for one of the "big" pastors of Missouri. Feeling a little lonesome for ministerial gossip I dropped down to see the brethren. The evangelist is a heartening soul. His laugh is expressive of health and of faith in the universe. He is a big human-hearted man. As men meet him on the street and in the stores they straighten up, take deeper breaths and quicken their walk. He is gifted with the humor of his race. It happened that several other ministers from regions round about had foregathered, so the evangelist took us all up to his room, gave us some Baldwin apples, and then said, "Now we are ready for business," by which he meant for discussion.

A Methodist minister who had "joined" in the meeting the night before was present, and the evangelist was anxious to "indoctrinate" him so he would thoroughly understand our plea. The preacher-convert was troubled over only one matter, viz., he could not be brought to hold that the good people of pedo-baptist churches were not Christians. "Why" he said, "that makes my wife a non-Christian." "Ah, but don't you see if you admit they are Christians," said the evangelist, "you will have to admit them to our churches? That's the logic of the situation." "But don't you believe they will be saved?" asked the convert. "We cannot tell what God will do. We are practicing in the lower courts and cannot go beyond the word," replied the good-natured evangelist. His illustration of the "lower courts" he credited to John Sweeney. You see, our problem was a concrete one. A human life was trying to readjust its church relationships, but refused to accept a position that would do injustice to his human feelings.

The evangelist thinks with two minds. As a man he is human, kindly, Christian. But as a dogmatist he thinks in dispensations, legal premises, and in propositions foreign to his own soul. It is strange how propositional convictions will chill one's humanity. Christianity will have come to its own when its devotees have ceased to hold any dogmas that put a strain on natural human feelings.

The evangelist was greatly elated over the Methodist preacher who was partially converted—for he had joined. But there was in our group a Disciple minister who is seriously considering a call to a church not our own. He is a widely read man. You would call him cosmopolitan in his thought. He understands the age-spirit. The evangelist is mistaken in thinking that this brother lacks conviction. It is his conviction that makes him restless.

So you see the situation, typical of a very wide-spread condition—one was coming and one was leaving. And he who was leaving was not the weaker.

The one coming was changing some of his dogmas; the one going regarded Christianity as life. The problem of union is not to be solved by exchange. By this method it would be postponed forever. When we went out on the street again we were all one. The enjoyment of the sky with its wonderful stars was common. Think you, that a creed was ever written with the stars of God in sight?

Hannibal. GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

As Others See Us

INEXPLICABLE.

The address sent broadcast throughout the world by the recent Ecumencial Conference of the Methodist Church at Toronto was an able, earnest, and evangelical plea for universal peace, temperance, Lord's-day observance, and allegiance to the authority of Christ, matters which appeal to the Christian conscience everywhere. The Christian-Evangelist, however, has a criticism. It says: "Just why such an otherwise excellent address, so catholic in scope and spirit, should turn off into a little sectarian byway long enough to affirm that there is still 'a place and a need for denominationalism' in the body of Christ is inexplicable."

Just why any paper should get off such a criticism is inexplicable, except as one finds the explanation in such items as the following from the succeeding page: "The writer does not admit that 'churches practicing affusion and infant baptism are churches of Christ,' in the New Testament sense, the sense in which the disciples of Christ, in their restoration movement, are particularly concerned. This writer does not believe that 'members of these churches are members of the church of Christ' in the normal, adequate, New Testament significance of the church."

The really inexplicable thing is the mental blindness of a paper which can thus read other churches out as not churches of Christ, and their members as not members of the church of Christ and then solemnly denounce denominationalism and tell us that "the chief reason why we are still dreaming of peace, temperance, Lord's-day observance, and loyalty to Christ is because these things have been made impossible by the very 'denominationalism' for which the address pleads."

The most intense denominationalists of whom we have knowledge are the Disciples, or Christians, sometimes known as "Campbellists," who, while laying stress on the unity of all believers, stultify themselves by reading other denominations out of the church of Christ.—Herald and Presbyter.

SECTARIANISM RUN WILD.

The "Christian Standard," an organ of the Disciples of Christ, published at Cincinnati, replies to a perplexed and inquiring spirit who asks the editor's opinion as to the propriety of uniting with the local Methodist Episcopal Church, since her own church (the Disciples) has no organization there, and the needs of the Methodists are great. The following is the editor's answer: "When it comes to leaving a church of Christ and uniting with a denominational church which practices things that are unknown to the Word of God, it is difficult to see how an intelligent and conscientious person can do it. The Methodist Episcopal Church is a stranger to the Scriptures, wearing a name that has no reference to Christ, and practicing things that are without the sanction of Christ. You should not go into an unscriptural organization, because you can not do it in the name of the Lord." Remember, the foregoing advice is given by a journal with the qualifying term "Christian," in the year of our Lord 1912, and at a time when the splendid light of a present-day co-operative spirit is revealing to the churches that we are all brethren in Christ. "You can not go into the Methodist Episcopal Church in the name of the Lord." We draw the veil! We give it up when it comes to such inveterate narrowness, prejudice, sectarianism and unfraternal bigotry as that. —Western Christian Advocate.

BROADENING INFLUENCES AMONG DISCIPLES.

The Disciples, who have been drilled for a century in the practice of debate with members of other communions concerning baptism, have of late taken up a strenuous course of argument among themselves. An editorial in The Christian Century of Chicago upon the Blight of Legalism has led, in the words of a correspondent to that paper, "to more hard thinking on this proposition than some of us have ever done on any single proposition in our lives before." The Christian Century puts as the first of six affirmations, "The Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches are churches of Christ." In a fourth affirmation it recognizes baptism as practiced in these churches as valid, although, from the Disciples' viewpoint "irregular, defective and objectionable as to the manner of administration." These affirmations are vigorously repudiated by some of the Disciples' ministers of high standing in the denomination; but an Iowa layman asserts, "I feel sure that the masses of intelligent laymen are with you." The drift of the prolonged—and not yet ended—discussion indicates that The Christian Century is of notable service to the Disciples in leading the denomination out of the bondage of literalism. The reform of this communion of churches from within is one of the significant signs of the times.—The Congregationalist.

Billy Jordan's Ten Cents

By Sarah M. McCreery

Dr. Aiken opened his church year-book and turned to the pages which read "Foreign Missionary Apportionments;" then he found the column headed "Deficits" and he felt grieved because the name of Fourth Avenue Church stood so plainly with such a large deficit to its discredit.

"I do hope my sermon of last Sunday will be the means of helping to increase the collection this year," he murmured. "We—we must meet our apportionment this time. The people can—they have the means but—" and he dropped his face into his hands with a prayer that God would open the eyes of the members of Fourth Avenue Church to see their duty and their responsibility to the men and women in darkness across the seas.

Then he recalled the remark of a brother minister, made almost two years before when he had accepted the pastorate in Farnsworth: "Aiken, you will have a fine church building and splendid equipment; the people are good, they will do anything for their pastor, but you are not going to a really live church, one that makes its influence felt in the community and whose influence radiates beyond its own town. I think the reason is found in the fact that it is a church without a vital interest in missions."

Dr. Aiken had laid much stress on the subject of missions only to be disappointed in the collections the first year, and the prospect of a large amount for foreign missions did not seem much brighter this second year. A sigh escaped his lips and there was a grave look on his face, when a timid rap-rap at the door of the study interrupted his thought.

When Dr. Aiken opened the door he saw a small, pinched-faced boy with a tattered cap in his hand. His clothes were clean but patched, and his shoes were badly worn at the toes, but his face was radiant with a smile which seemed to reflect the brightness of the sun itself. "Well, Billy, what can I do for you?" asked the minister kindly as he recognized Billy Jordan, a little newsboy.

"I didn't come for you to do something for me, I came to help you," Billy answered.

"Oh, you did!" and Dr. Aiken smiled broadly. "I think I need somebody to help me today, Billy, for I will have to confess that I am discouraged. Come in," and he stepped aside for his visitor to enter. He returned to his chair and motioned Billy to one on the opposite side of the table.

Billy took the chair, then his glance wandered around the room. "I didn't think anybody got discouraged who had a room like this to stay in most of the time. My, it's nice and warm in here!" he exclaimed. "And the rug is so soft. I never saw such a shiny table either. Ours at home isn't shiny because we have to eat on it, and use it to wash dishes on, then mother covers it with papers and uses it for a sewing table. It never was shiny, though," he added honestly, "it is just a pine table." Then his glance wandered to the books and the pictures.

"Is your home cold, Billy?" Dr. Aiken asked gently.

"Oh, no, but I get cold on the street selling papers. I was a little cold when I came in here." Then as if he suddenly remembered his errand, he said, "I came to help with the collection for next Sunday." Billy got out his handkerchief, untied a corner and took out a battered dime, which was worn almost smooth, and held it out to the minister.

A look of wonder spread over Dr. Aiken's face. "Oh, you mean this is for the foreign missionary collection which we expect to take on next Sunday. Thank you, Billy; this is the first contribution," and the look of wonder changed to one of pleasure.

"I am sorry it isn't more, but I put a penny into the Sunday-school collection every Sunday, and I want to give a little to the church this year, and mother is not able to work, so I have to make enough money to keep us. I sell papers mornings and evenings and do all the errands I can find to do between times," he explained. "It takes a lot of money to buy things to wear, and food to eat, and wood to burn, don't it?" and for a moment the brightness vanished from Billy's face.

"Indeed it does, Billy, and you are a brave and generous boy to support your mother and yourself, and yet spare ten cents for the foreign missionary collection. I—"

"You said last Sunday that our church did not give as much last year as it should," interrupted Billy, "and that it made you sorry to see the sum that should have been paid and wasn't printed right out in the year-book. You said if every man in the church would do his part, the collection would be as large as it ought to be from a church with so many members. I want to do my part, so I brought my ten cents. I can't come to church next Sunday, because I stay with my mother every other Sunday; she gets lonesome for she is alone every day in the week. I hope the ten cents will help," he added wistfully as he rose and moved toward the door.

"It will help; it will help a lot," Dr. Aiken said earnestly. Then as if he had a sudden inspiration, "I believe your ten cents will be the means of increasing our collections this year. If every man gives according to his means as you have done, it surely will," and he patted the boy's shoulder kindly as he opened the door.

Billy did not exactly understand what Dr. Aiken meant, but he knew the gift had pleased him, and his own heart beat happily under his patched coat. The minister watched Billy as he went out through the silent church, and the words a member of the church had spoken a few days before came to his mind. "We have had only one accession to the church in three months, and that was only a boy," the tone implied that boys did not count. "Boys do count," Dr. Aiken assured himself, "they count a great deal when they have a spirit like Billy's," and he turned to his desk again.

The following Sunday Dr. Aiken announced that the collection would be omitted until the close of the sermon. When the sermon was finished he said, "I have a story to tell you before we take our annual collection for foreign missions." Then in a voice full of emotion, he told of Billy's gift, not omitting the fact that the boy could not be at church that day as he stayed with his mother every alternate Sunday. "The widow was commended for giving her two mites, and Billy is certainly to be commended for giving his ten cents, and I hope the influence of his unselfish deed will bear fruit. He is the sole supporter of his mother and himself, and they have so little that every penny counts a great deal. With the inspiration of such an example before us," and he held the battered dime to the view of the large audience, "I hope none will give grudgingly today, but that each one will give according as the Lord has prospered him," then he motioned the ushers to proceed with the collection.

Mr. Bartlow, the wealthiest man in Fourth Avenue Church, rose as the ushers passed down the aisles. "I may be out of order in speaking at a morning service," he said, "but I don't know when a story has affected me like this one about Billy Jordan. I guess it's because I know the boy. Why, I have bought a paper from Billy every day for two years; he always looks so cheerful and smiles so brightly that I never suspected that he was carrying the burdens of a man. I will acknowledge, though it is a discredit to me, that I looked on this collection today as rather out of my line. I expected to put in a dollar, but Billy's ten cents made me ashamed to do it. Dr. Aiken, here is my check for one hundred dollars for this collection, and here is a memorandum stating that I am to be called on for the same amount each year for the foreign missionary collection." He went to the pulpit and laid the two papers in Dr. Aiken's hand. "This church shall not have another deficit in its foreign missionary department while Billy Jordan and I are here to contribute," he finished with a whimsical smile.

When the ushers brought the collection to the front, a glance showed the amount was unusually large. "We seem to be doing things out of the regular order this morning," Dr. Aiken said, "so I will ask for a song while the ushers look over the money and give us an estimate, at least, of the amount that has been raised this morning for foreign missions."

When the money was counted, Judge Clarke stepped to the front. "I am proud to announce that the collection from the boxes is just one thousand dollars; the check Mr. Bartlow has just given makes the total amount eleven hundred dollars."

Dr. Aiken involuntarily started the Doxology, and every person in the large audience arose. "I want to tell you one thing more in connection with this ten cents," he held it up again when all were seated. "I was discouraged over the outlook for this collection on last Tuesday. I had done all I could and I prayed that God would do something to arouse the members of this church to take an interest in missions, and especially in foreign missions. The coming of Billy Jordan with his ten cents took away my discouragement that day, and it answered my prayer, as the collection this morning proved. There is only one more word—only one thought that is appropriate just here: it is this, 'A little child shall lead them.' The child in this church is Billy Jordan, the newsboy, whose name was placed on our church roll three months ago."

The Program of the Disciples' Congress

From the Secretary's Point of View

BY CHARLES M. SHARPE.

One of our editors facetiously remarked that there is apprehension in the editorial offices lest there should be no problems worth writing about when the Disciples' Congress has done its work. It is conceivable that there will be more problems, rather than fewer, after the Congress adjourns. For sometimes many distinct problems are jumbled together and need to be "unscrambled," before any solution becomes possible. The Congress and the editors working together may reasonably hope to sweep Charybdis off the deck of the good ship, or if not, to neutralize it by turning Scylla loose upon it.

Notice the program subjects and writers. Consider how interesting and practical the themes are and how carefully selection has been made of men to treat them.

Scientific Management in Religion.

"The Principles of Scientific Management Applied to the Work of the Local Church." If you will read up on "Scientific Management" in the periodicals you will find that it refers to a method in the industrial world whereby it is sought to avoid waste of energy by such correlation of means to ends as secures the greatest efficiency. The great exponent of the idea is Frederick Taylor. We are told that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." Should we not profit by this superior wisdom? We are building up some great churches. We need to study conservation and direction of energy for the great ends of the universal Kingdom of God. The subject is to be discussed by two of our greatest experts in church mechanics and dynamics—Ewers of Pittsburgh and Grafton of Kansas City.

Delegate Representation.

The next topic is a controverted one. "Delegate Representation in General Convention for Religious Bodies of Congregational Polity." The point of this discussion lies in the proposition that has been made to unify the activities and interests of the Disciples of Christ by the adoption of some such plan as that now in operation among the Northern Baptists. Dr. W. C. Bitting, an eminent Baptist minister of St. Louis will tell us of the actual working of the plan among his people. Elder J. B. Briney, of Kentucky, will criticize the proposal so far as it relates to the Disciples, unless, indeed, he should be convinced by Dr. Bitting's report and withdraw his objections. Those of us who know Brother Briney, however, do not fear that any such catastrophe will befall. His positions upon this subject are too well grounded in his fundamental attitudes and loyalties. It is likely that in connection with this discussion the report of the committee upon unification will be read, as it is to be presented at Louisville.

The Social Task.

Prof. Samuel Zane Batten will speak at the Wednesday evening session upon the "Social Task of the Church." He has written an able book upon this topic, and doubtless this address will be the "Condensed Milk" and "Beef Extract" of the whole volume. Think how much time you will save by hearing the address instead of reading the book. No, you won't, either. If you hear the address you will read the book. Otherwise you will probably not even read the book—a total loss. Our own social expert, Prof. Alva W. Taylor of the Bible College of Missouri, will preside over this session and will be likely to say some things in introducing the speaker that will make history for the Disciples. This session will be notable.

Union and the New Testament.

What next? Verily the most fundamental question before the Disciples today, and one that is to be of increasing urgency: "The Problem of Christian Union in the Light of New Testament Study." The Disciples are pledged by their whole history to the advocacy of Christian union. They are pledged by their whole conviction of loyalty to the New Testament as the source from which alone the basis of Christian union is to be learned. Has New Testament study invalidated the Disciples' fundamental conception of what constitutes the measure of Christian loyalty? Does it show that the Disciples have mistaken the proportions of the faith? Does it require readjustments in thought and practice, if so be the Disciples wish to follow closely the mind of Christ? This is a discussion we ought all to welcome. We have been forward to try others at the bar of scholarship. We should be willing to try ourselves. Two of our finest scholars have been secured to present this important theme. They will do it fearless and conscientiously. Prof. F. O. Norton of Drake University, who in the field of Biblical Greek won his doctor's degree magna cum lauda, will present the principal paper. He will be reviewed by the brilliant and versatile Burris A. Jenkins of Kansas City. The late Prof. J. H. Thayer of Harvard University is reported to have said that Mr. Jenkins was the best student of New Testament Greek that had passed through the Harvard Divinity School within his memory.

The Disciples' Congress is to convene in Kansas City, April 16-18. Sessions will be held in Linwood Boulevard Church. The exceptionally attractive, well balanced and representative program combined with the favorable location for meeting assures an exceptionally large attendance. Those going from Chicago or via Chicago are asked to communicate with the office of The Christian Century. It is possible to materially reduce the fare if a party of a certain number go together. Regular fare from Chicago is $10.75.

Union and Psychology.

Our next subject falls in the more general field of historical development, and philosophical thought. "Is Christian Union Possible in the Light of History, Psychology and Logic?" History exhibits the factors and forces that have contributed to division. It shows the unsuccessful efforts to reunite the dissevered sections of the church. It ought to teach us how not to do it. Psychology exhibits the inner nature and processes of the human spirit, even when directed and controlled by the spirit of God. The bearing of these sciences upon the materials of our problem should be evident. But where does logic come in? Well, read an article in the American Journal of Theology, April, 1911, upon "The Logical Aspect of Religious Unity," and you will see clearly where it comes in. You will be led to ask for what sort of Christian union may we dare hope. What conception of union will "hold water?" (No reference to baptism intended.) Two men more ideally equipped for this discussion could hardly be found in our entire brotherhood. Prof. S. M. Jefferson, the veteran philosopher, logician and teacher of Lexington, will present the first paper, and Dr. Herbert Martin, the newly elect occupant of the chair of philosophy in Drake University, will present the second. If you are not afraid to do some good close thinking you will enjoy this session immensely.

Union and the Disciples.

At last we reach the climax of the program. "The Essential Plea of the Disciples of Christ in the Light of Their Origin and Aim." It is no injustice to these distinguished speakers that they are reserved for the closing session. It is a confidence reposed in them and a compliment to their ability and influence. We want the crowd to stay to the very last and we took the best plan of securing that result. They will put the finishing touch to this work of unconscious art—this program which, I am now persuaded, the committee builded "better than they knew." This last subject will be treated by the two men most conspicuous as representing divergent views upon the particular matter suggested in the title. Our youngest editor, Charles Clayton Morrison, of The Christian Century, whose conspicuous ability as a writer and whose genius as a religious journalist are the admiration of increasing numbers, will read the first paper. Our greatest, most universally beloved, and influential leader of the generation just passing, James Harvey Garrison, will read the second. It may appear to some that this discussion will overlap that of Messrs. Norton and Jenkins, or that of Messrs. Jefferson and Martin. Not necessarily so. This last discussion is one within the scope of a definite and comparatively short period. The three topics are, indeed, closely related, but they are supplementary rather than conflicting.

Eighty Years and More

"'Tis yet high day, thy staff resume.
And fight fresh battles for the truth:
For what is age, but youth's full bloom.
A riper, more transcendent youth!
A weight of gold
Is never old;
Streams broader grow as downward rolled.

At sixty-two life has begun:
At seventy-three begins once more:
Fly swifter as thou near'st the sun,
And brighter shine at eighty-four:
At ninety-five
Shouldst thou arrive
Still wait on God, and work, and thrive."

Be True to Thyself

Play no tricks upon thy soul, O man!
Let fact be fact, and life the thing it can.

—A. H. Clough.

An Interview With Rev. J. R. Perkins

From the San Francisco Bulletin

Editors' Note: The problem that a pastor faces when he discovers opposition to his ministry within his own flock is not to be settled off-hand by any outsider, but by himself alone. This is especially true in the case of opposition based on doctrinal disagreement. If the pastor could eliminate himself from the situation, no doubt he would be heartily glad to do so. But to withdraw is to act on one side quite as positively as to remain is to act on the other side. He cannot avoid acting. There is no abstract standard by which he may be judged. His problem is concrete and particular. He must take into account the wider interests of the Kingdom of God in choosing his course. The circumstances in connection with the retirement of J. R. Perkins from the pastorate at Alameda, Calif., are unknown to The Christian Century, but J. R. Perkins is not unknown. He is known to us as to the whole brotherhood of California as a man doing God's work in the spirit of his Master. He has always held the confidence of his brethren, having served them in many influential capacities. He was president of their state convention last year. His ministry has been one of great personal sacrifice in the face of many opportunities tempting him away from it. Passionately committed to and a leader in interpreting the ideals of social service he has not for a moment forgotten to sound forth the basic evangelical message of the Gospel. For months the strain of opposition to his teaching and policy has been wearing on his body. At last he was prostrated nervously, and the opposition accomplished its will in securing his resignation. Whether he should heed the earnest pleadings of a large portion of his flock and continue to preach in Alameda it is not for us to advise. But nothing is more clear than that the dictatorial attempt being made by an unfeeling orthodoxy, from without, to crush such men as he from the ministry of the Disciples would be ludicrous if it were not so tragically sad. There are too many of his brethren who have seen the larger vision. And whether they agree with his views or not the great majority of the leaders of the church are outraged at the suggestion that there is not room among us for men of faith like him. The following interview taken from a San Francisco paper contains our only information, which we gladly share with our readers.

"I thought I could do what no minister has ever done. I pleaded to allow conservative and liberal to live side by side. My conceit has broken my back."

———

Lying on his bed in his home in Alameda, pale and drawn of face, racked with the pain and torment of a complete physical breakdown, Rev. J. R. Perkins, until a few days ago pastor of the First Christian Church of Alameda, told the story of his failure.

I wonder if, when the world's history is finally written, there won't be a chapter—one whole chapter—devoted to the failures? I wonder if perhaps that chapter may not, more than any other chapter in the book, read success.

Church Without Pastor.

The First Christian Church of Alameda is without a pastor. The sermon that was to have been preached on Sunday will remain unsaid and the man who asked only that conservative and liberal be allowed to live side by side, must find another group of people who will permit him to preach as his convictions dictate or must leave the field of his choice and his training.

Though the doctor had forbidden callers, Mrs. Perkins admitted me yesterday to the room of her husband for a few minutes' talk. I wanted to discover just the points of difference between his doctrine and the doctrine of some of the members of the congregation.

He talked in short gasps, too weak to lift his voice above a whisper. There was not one syllable of enmity or criticism of the dissenting members of his congregation, no word of blame, but a sympathetic understanding of their misunderstanding.

Sermon Offended.

"I believe," said Mr. Perkins, "in the great ethical teachings of Christ. Some of my people took exception to a sermon I preached on the atonement. But I came to my conclusions after five years of the most careful study of all facts surrounding the death of Christ." He stopped and I prompted with a question.

"I reached the conclusion that Christ came to his death like any other social leader. I had to surrender my old conclusion. I did not want to but I had to.

"Social forces drove Christ on to his death. "He had interferred with the temple traffic. The high priestly family was greatly enriched by the system and because Jesus interfered there came a clash with the authorities. The greatest money panic in the history of the ancient world was on that year. The Roman empire was in a bad way.

What Atonement Meant.

"I said to my wife that the atonement meant just this: The death of Christ saved only as a man was willing to live the things that caused his death—that he died for the very principles of life and we find our own redemption in our fidelity to the things that he would not surrender—the great ethical facts that underlie civilization.

"I hold that no matter what one's profession of religion may be, unless he hold right relations with men he can not hold right relations with his Maker.

"All of Jesus' strife was with those who held wrong relations with men and claimed to represent God.

"I preached what I believe to be the fundamentals of Christianity.

"I found a congregation that was more doctrinal than ethical. The things I said were strange to them. They misunderstood.

"I hold the doctrines of my church at heart—it is not because I have believed in those doctrines less but because I have believed in the ethical teachings of Jesus more.

Didn't Like It.

"I think I offended some of my people when I talked of the failure of institutional religion in congested centers.

"I said that the churches have retreated to a marine view. We in San Francisco know what that means. We send back tardily our missionaries to those we left, but in our very retreating there is something which the so-called masses will remember forever.

"The church touches only the respectable and well-to-do. It doesn't go down into the soul of civilization; it doesn't seek out those who are wretched. It takes no account of the great causes of discontent in the world.

"I know what this discontent is. I went through big cities of the East myself, as a boy. I saw the thousands in want and misery. I slept under a newspaper on the Lake Shore and I know conditions in 1912 are not better than in 1894.

"I'm afraid my ministry has been colored by my knowledge of this discontent. Had I known that my church wanted the doctrinal rather than the ethical Christ I would have stayed out of the pulpit. I tried to fit into the doctrinal type. It would have meant a great deal to my family and to me, as men count success, but I could not do it.

"If you have an ethical sermon it is going to come out, even when you are preaching doctrine. It seems that forces are in play to make the churches accept the dogmatic Christ while the people are seeking and hungering for the ethical.

Was Misunderstood.

"They have quoted me as being a disbeliever in baptism. There again I was misunderstood. I was friendly to the theory of accepting those who came from other churches without baptizing them. I said I would refuse to baptize one who came from another church if he thought his form of baptism valid. I said that immersion in that case would mean merely getting him wet. From this day they thought that I did not believe in baptism. It is because I tried to point out that a principle, not a symbol, is the issue in modern life. I said that baptism has no significance to the man on Market street, and in the Mission, who is grappling with the elemental things in life. The form of baptism is not an issue with him. It has gone through all my denomination that I do not believe in baptism.

Why He Resigned.

"When I found that members of my congregation were opposed to me, I resigned rather than drag the church through the muck of a fight. When I resigned a month ago the board refused to accept my resignation, but my resignation is final now and half the board has resigned with me.

"This Sunday I was to have preached on the 'Wards of the Nation.' I am afraid that sermon would have offended them, too. When I told them that the church should turn out the man who worked children in factories rather than the drunkard, I am afraid I displeased them.

"But that sermon will not be preached now," he said with a pitiful attempt at a smile.

Has No Plans.

When I asked about his plans for the future Mr. Perkins said:

"I don't know. If it were not for the wife and the tads I would not worry. The difference between the Christ which I have today and my old Christ is just the difference between an abstraction and a reality. I have never had so much religion in all my life as I have this afternoon."

The conceit of this man was merely too great a belief in the breadth of mind and heart of his fellowman. It was his faith that broke his back.

Our Readers' Opinions

Practical Christianity

January 1, 1907, the E. P. & S. M. R. R. changed the division point from Alamagordo, N. M., to Carrizozo, changing the homes of 500 working people in one night. Carrizozo was then only a desert station and watering tank. The surrounding country is still a barren desert. When I arrived a few months later, I found two churches organized, and several others trying to organize.

The most conservative people know that the town was as large as it would be for several years. After talking to Mr. F. J. Sager, a Congregationalist, Mr. Humphrey, a Presbyterian, and several members of the Disciples' Church, we decided that it would be impossible for the town to support more than two churches; so we decided to go in with the Baptists or Methodists instead of helping to organize five churches.

The Baptists refused to take the Disciples in except by "experience and baptism." I then put my letter in the Methodist Church and did all I could to get members of all Protestant churches to come in with me. The Baptists then had no Sunday-school, and the Methodists had an average attendance of only twenty. Our preacher was only getting $30 a month, which was much more than he was worth. While within a few weeks we had increased our Sunday-school to 125, with an average attendance of 80 to 100. We soon secured a first-class preacher, to whom we easily paid $100 a month.

I lived in the town one year, during which time our church was a great social and religious center—a greater power for good than five small churches could possibly have been. I see from the local paper that the Methodist Church is still very active and progressive.

We asked or expected nothing from the Methodists when we united with them, but a united effort to advance the cause of Christ in the town. Yet I saw a few weeks ago that the revised charter granted by the state of New Mexico stipulated that the trustees were to be composed of five persons, two of whom were to be Disciples.

From all sides predictions were made that a union church would soon die. And many, of all churches, who had spent most of their time fighting the other churches, instead of Satan, would "have no part in such an unholy alliance." But "the people had a mind to work." And they worked for God and not for the church. God blessed us in our work. And when I left there, universal love and respect had completely replaced that old feeling of doubt, jealousy, and malice.

Since I have been thrown into closer association with other denominations, I have come to believe that they are as good Christians as we are. That they are really as anxious to unite their forces for Christ's work as are the Disciples, and are willing to make as much sacrifice to advance Christ's kingdom as we are.

I had been reading the Christian Standard all my life up to the time I went to New Mexico. But since then, nothing has weakened my faith so much as reading the Standard. When I read that so many of our biggest preachers say that my co-laborers in New Mexico, my wife, and many of my consecrated friends and relatives have not been baptized and are not members of the Church of Christ, and so are not sure of the kingdom of heaven, I sometimes feel like renouncing the whole church.

But then, when I read of the crying needs of the heathen in one column of the Standard, and in the next the attack on the F. C. M. S. for not recalling Brother Sarvis simply because they do not believe in all the practices of the church that sent him, I realize that the devil does his best work when he can work through followers of Christ. And I ask God to help my unbelief, and He helps me see that in these matters, it is the devil and not Christ that often speaks through the Standard.

I love my church, its traditions and leaders. But I love my Christ better, and should be more anxious to build up His cause than the Disciples' Church.

Your paper is doing a great work, and will be appreciated more and more as time goes on. B. B. Bagby, M. D.

West Point, Va.

Agitation, Then Action

Editors Christian Century: I have for some weeks watched with considerable interest the discussions in your paper regarding the fellowship question. You express much surprise at the refusal of many to stand under your six propositions, but I am not in the least surprised. There are, doubtless many, scattered here and there among us, that have caught the broader vision, and are ready and anxious to take a forward step, but the rank and file, and with them most of the leaders, are by no means so forward. Agitation may be carried on for a time, but there comes a time when action must take place, and then tremendous consequences, and many very surprising ones, are suddenly seen. If the Disciples are not spiritually minded enough to enter heartily into the fellowship proposed for the missions in India, how can we hope to enter such a fellowship at home?

Now, as far as the end is concerned, I am with you, and hope that a broader spirit may soon be manifested in all Christian people. Did not "Raccoon" John Smith receive Barton Stone and his followers in the early history of the Disciples, granting the validity if each one's baptism, whether by sprinkling, pouring or immersion? Had more of this spirit been manifested afterward, what a world of debate and bitterness of feeling would have been avoided. And did not W. T. Moore stir up considerable commotion in our Foreign Society, because he started in to preach for a congregation in London made up in considerable part of unimmersed Christians? And was not L. H. Jameson and some other sent over to report on this matter? (If I am in error in cases just cited, I wish you to set me right.) How much better for us to come together, and permit Jesus by his Spirit to reveal the truth in this matter in his own good time. Paul exhorts the Philippians to be like-minded as many as were perfect; and wherein there were differences the right would be revealed by God. Why not rely upon such an outcome in this case. For twenty-five years the position of the Disciples has seemed ridiculously inconsistent. The article by Ellis Barnes is right to the point on this question.

Sterling, Ill. Chas. A. Stevens.

A Vital Question

Editors Christian Century: We owe you a lasting debt of gratitude for raising a most vital question. I rather thought I knew the position of the Disciples, but I confess, if Brothers Spencer and Tharp hold representative views, then I was mistaken. I rather think, however, that these men did not even fairly represent themselves when they "protested." Indeed, no man ever does when in the spirit of remonstrating.

I heard one of our greatest evangelists preach his initial sermon for a meeting the other night. Did he really mean it when he urged all the Christians and their churches to coöperate in the meeting, or do you think he viewed them as these other men do? I am sure this man recognized the other churches as belonging to Christ.

Okmulgee, Okla. R. W. Clymer.

Lamentable Utterances

Editors Christian Century: I have been closely following the writings pro and con in The Century, and it is the only journal that voices my sentiments in regard to union and our attitude toward members of the various denominations. I am proud of The Century and want to say you are rendering a great service and one very badly needed. But for The Century's clarion call to practice union, I fear we would have degenerated into the hard legalism of a sect; in fact, just such lamentable utterances as those recently made by I. J. Spencer and Z. T. Sweeney indicate that deterioration has already begun. Mr. Spencer has embarrassed every one of us working for union, and I think should resign from the Unity Commission, for he will do more harm than good in that position. The Disciples should repudiate this extreme sectarianism.

Stockton, Calif. J. K. Ballou.

Letters to the Editors

Editors Christian Century: Enclosed find draft for $2.50 for which please renew my subscription to The Century and enter this new name on your list. You need not send me any commission. I thoroughly enjoy the spirit of The Century, and shall be glad to send you subscriptions whenever possible. Gladly do I count it a pleasure and special fellowship to wish you abundant success and Godspeed.

Editors Christian Century: "Let me protest"! Let me protest against your too generous disposition to impute to men a greatness of soul of which they resolutely remain incapable. These times try us sorely. Shall we be able to remain "one body" of communicants? We most surely are not "one spirit." With burdened heart for our inhospitality, I am, gratefully yours.

Editors Christian Century: Here is hoping you will pass safely through the troubled waters between Scylla and Charybdis. Your progressive spirit will, of course, win out in time.

Editors Christian Century: I am enjoying The Century very much. You are doing constructive work even if it is "divisive" in the eyes of some.

Likes Dr. Ames' Book

The Bethany Press, Chicago, Ill., Dear Sirs: Last week I ordered The Divinity of Christ by Edward Scribner Ames from you, having seen and liked a book notice of it in The Standard of Chicago. I am more than pleased with the book. The chapter on "Why I Am Not a Unitarian" is of itself worth the price of the book. The whole volume is the best constructive statement of the liberal position in religion I have yet seen. I am only a layman, but have been a religious liberal for some years and as a Sunday-school teacher have endeavored to set forth the fundamental of our Christian religion as a life. I have enjoyed these sermons of Dr. Ames so much I am enclosing express money order for $2.25 and wish you to send me three more copies as I wish to give them to friends. William R. Davis.

Flint, Mich.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

ART IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

All writing was originally pictorial, and our modern systems can be traced back to such a parentage. The mind of the primitive man was reached by the object in picture or in symbol. Religious truths were also impressed on the race in the dawn of history by the object lesson and the type—men were taught the spiritual and invisible by the things that were seen. The Jewish people in the time of Moses, and for many generations after Moses, were not able to grasp pure and abstract ideas of the Deity, so there was given to them a religious ceremonial, rich in rite and emblem, by which the great truths of their duty to God and man were taught to them; it was a religious kindergarten for a race in its religious childhood.

Value of Object Lessons.

The mind of the child can be best reached by the same means as that of man in the childhood of the race. The kindergarten has made this old truth new by applying it to modern methods of education—it has emphasized the value of the object lesson, as a means of impressing truth and knowledge on the brain and heart. We are all learning that the eye is as noble an organ as the ear—that it is one of the great thoroughfares from the outer world to the inner man. Modern education recognizes this principle in the wealth of illustrations in text books and in the maps and charts and figures that are used to supplement the spoken and written word. The growing vogue of the stereopticon, the balopticon, the moving picture, shows a growing appreciation of this effective avenue to the mind.

Value of a Beautiful Environment.

But while there is this general recognition of the value of the picture and the illustration, that does not necessarily mean a perception of the value of art in education. In the doctrine of evolution great emphasis is laid on environment as a means of growth and uplift to the species. The Greeks taught the importance of beautiful surroundings in exerting an elevating influence on all citizens of the republic, and the high artistic and intellectual type thus produced has made the "glory that was Greece" a perpetual possession for all ages. We have been slow to discover the value of environment in the educational life of our land. Until recently utility was the sole watchword in our school architecture. When we number the vast sums spent on school buildings it seems but little to ask that the forbidding, barn-like structures that we know so well should become obsolete. Good proportions, graceful lines, and harmonious colors cost but little more than bad proportions, awkward lines and ugly colors. There is coming to be an almost universal demand for more artistic school architecture.

Interior of School Rooms.

And coupled with this desire for pleasing exteriors is a call for something more in the interior than blackboard and blank wall. The open heart of the child is the place to implant lasting impressions of the beautiful—we cannot estimate the effect of lovely and noble surroundings in shaping its plastic mind. A bare, barren city school room, in a crowded, tenement house district, was taken by a little band of women and thoroughly cleaned and disinfected; the walls were painted a soft red, and a few good pictures were hung where all the pupils could see them. The joy and surprise of the little folks was so evident that the teacher told them they could write her letters about it. "Dear teacher," wrote one, "I promise you never to stick pins into Tommy any more." Another said, "I won't play hookey again all this year," and a little girl wrote, "I will ask my mother to let me wear my good dress tomorrow." These children came from homes where there was no vestige of beauty, and their appreciation of the new environment showed that the love of lovely things is a divinely implanted instinct in the soul of childhood. The children of the poor, even more than those of the rich, have a right to beauty in the school room as their natural privilege.

Need of Education in Art.

Wonderful as has been the advance in educational methods in the past quarter of a century, yet sufficient stress has not been laid on education in art. As a nation we are lacking in the æsthetic instinct; our cultured class, of course, is not altogether lacking, though many who claim to belong to the elect are amazingly ignorant of artistic matters. An educated American traveling in Italy wrote that he was always oppressed by the consciousness that his hack driver knew more about art than he did. We regard the people of the far East as our inferiors, yet many of them are superior to us in the instinctive sense of what is good in certain kinds of art. The Japanese have an inherited appreciation of artistic line and grouping that far surpasses ours. Some of the oriental nations have their sense of color so trained that they can discern over twenty different shades that are invisible to most of us—and we see the exquisite product of this educated sense of color in their rugs and shawls, that are true works of art.

Artists are Seers.

The training of the artistic side of the child's nature not only conduces to true culture, and enables him to perceive what is good in picture, or statue, or engraving, but it opens his eyes to the beauty of God's world. Many of us might truly utter the prayer of the blind beggar, "Lord, that I might receive my sight." The great artists are seers who reveal the wonders of nature to us, and the study of their masterpieces are open doors to new world's of delight. You see a splendid sunset, and perhaps give it a fleeting glance and say "How fine!"—and pass on. Study one of Corot's pictures of sunset, until it is photographed on your mind, and he will reveal a new glory of evening to you. You see the earth in shadow, with creeping mists, its gay greens changing to dull grey; you see the western sky glowing with golden light—and, somehow, the pensive sadness of the dying day is tempered with the thought, though the earth may be in shadow, the heaven is full of light.

Or, take Jules Breton's "Song of the Lark," that simple picture of the peasant girl in the early sunrise on her way to her work, pausing to listen to the invisible songster, who pours out his heart at heaven's gate; and as you mark the ineffable rapture on her upturned face, you catch a new revelation of meaning in bird song—and bless the goodness of God that this humble working woman has her heritage of beauty to brighten her lot.

Or, take examples of English and American landscape art, and you discover new beauty in wood and hill and stream, and feel fresh longing for them. And who can question that any "impulse to the vernal wood" is gain in this city-loving, money-getting generation! The true artist of nature is its poet and prophet, as well as its painter; he makes us consider the glory of earth and sea and sky, the birds of the air, the lilies of the field, and sheds so divine a light over all that we see "every bush afire with God."

Beauty of Common Things.

And how the artist's skill reveals to us the beauty of common things! One might go along a country road, and see a man sowing seed, and like Peter Bill, see naught else; but Millet finds in that homely sight a vision of the heroism and dignity of toil; in his "Sower" he shows us a shadowy figure, rushing across the field with rhythmic motion, scattering grain—doing his appointed task in life with all his might, and no less a hero than a soldier sweeping over the field of battle in a cavalry charge. Or mark the two figures in Millet's "Angelus," pausing in their work to pray, with bared heads, surrounded by all the rude implements of their daily labor, and learn that the humble, worshipping heart can uplift itself to God in the open field, as well as in the quiet cloister or stately cathedral.

And is there not a sense in which art can uplift our ideals of citizenship? Noble examples of historical art, whether of incident or portrait, cannot fail to appeal to the imagination, and rouse the spirit of imitation so strong in the young. The young boy of Vermont, seeing each day the statue of Ethan Allen, had his daring deed photographed on his mind, and became fired with the desire to serve his country as did that soldier of the Revolution, and from those boyish dreams was born the hero of Manila Bay.

Art and Morals.

Every now and then, notes of alarm are sounded in regard to the failure of our system of public school education to train the moral nature of the child. Our present interpretation of the doctrine of the separation of church and state seems to forbid formal religious teaching in our public schools and state universities which are supported by general taxation. As yet, efforts to introduce the Bible, which contains the purest code of morality in the world, into the course of study have been unsuccessful, and we recognize the difficulty of adequate moral training without the Good Book as a basis. Since we cannot use it as a text book for systematic ethical teaching, it seems imperative that every avenue to the higher nature of the child should be utilized by the Christian teacher. I believe that wisely selected works of art furnish a means of appeal to his moral being. By keeping before him pictures, at once beautiful and uplifting, he is helped to carry out the divine precept, "Whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, think on these things."

Philosophers have vied with each other in telling how the thoughts color the character. I fear we do not lay sufficient stress on the necessity of photographing on the sensitive plates of the young mind pictures of uplifting loveliness; we cannot estimate the power they may have to overcome ugly and evil imaginations. I do not claim that artistic culture is by itself a moral agent; I only claim that by the wise use of it—the use of the good and true and beautiful in art—it can be made a means of moral growth. For beauty is of God. The expressions in the Holy Book, "The beauty of God," "The One altogether lovely," "The beauty of holiness," are not idle words; and as we have a truer vision of the beautiful in nature, in life, in character, so is our inward vision of duty, of service to God and man quickened and ennobled.

As we thus enrich the child's mind with good and beautiful thoughts, and impress on his heart good and beautiful pictures, we send him forth to his appointed task in life more "thoroughly furnished unto every good work." I. W. H.

Woman's Doings

—Miss Eloise L. Calihan, who is said to be the only woman in Minnesota who really knows practical politics, after more than ten years of retirement from active politics has taken charge of the Taft campaign in Minnesota by installing herself as "chief" of the local Taft headquarters in St. Paul.

—Miss Mary F. Ledyard, for the last fourteen years kindergarten supervisor of the Los Angeles public schools, is preparing to leave for China to install a complete kindergarten system in the new republic.

—Miss Beatrice Harraden, whose "Ships That Pass in the Night" was so clever, has finished a new novel, her only book in the last four years. It is called "The Trackless Way," and is a story of so-called failures who work out their own salvation in curious ways. During the last few years Miss Harraden has been devoting herself to the suffrage cause and has given much money to it besides her personal services. Indeed, she has almost sacrificed her health in her great zeal. She has sold suffrage papers at street corners, marched in processions, spoken at meetings, written one act plays and produced them herself, and sold programs and suffrage literature at the entertainments where they were given.

—"The German woman is the champion housewife of the world," says Baroness Agnes von Schlegal, an American woman, who was married to a German nobleman and has lived in Germany fifteen years. "The American woman," the baroness said, "is too fond of clubs and diversions that are outside the home; the German woman finds her chief pleasures in the home. The American woman thinks too much of her club and too little of her home. To increase her power as a mother, a wife, and a home-maker, she should give the most of her thought to the home." The baroness may be right, but we are willing to inform her that if the American woman was not so fond of the foreign titles that go with English dukes and German barons, she would seem better and more wholesome and sensible in every way.

—A daring Danish woman explorer, Mme. Demant-Hatt, a graduate of Copenhagen University, has returned to the Danish capital after many months' sojourn among the Lapps—that strange race of the far North, the members of which have kept their race pure and their customs unchanged for untold generations.

—Miss Grace Anna Lewis, for many years famous as a naturalist, died at her home in Pennsylvania recently, aged 90 years. She was active in the management of the underground railroad before the Civil War and sheltered many fugitive slaves at her home in Kempton, Chester County, Pa. Miss Lewis was the author of many charts on botanical and geological subjects and a series of fifty paintings of Pennsylvania forest trees made by her and exhibited at the World's Fair in Chicago were bought by the state and won prizes at the St. Louis Fair. She also won a prize for her exhibit at the Centennial in 1876.

—Mrs. Sun Yat Sen, wife of the Chinese who was head of the successful revolution and who resigned the office of first president of the Chinese republic in favor of Yuan Shih Kai, is a very attractive little woman. A writer for the London Daily Mail describes her thus: "Just a dainty little lady with sweet, smiling face and a grace and charm that make willing slaves. The simple robe of pure white threw into strong relief the clear, olive tone of the complexion and the glossy black hair unadorned and smoothed back from the shapely forehead. Mrs. Sun Yat Sen might be a beautiful nun if her face did not shine with the happiness that is of this world also."

—Miss Alice M. Robertson, postmistress at Muskogee, Okla., is said to be the highest paid woman in the United States postal service. She receives a salary of $3,300 a year. She is fifty-six and a native of Oklahoma. Her parents were missionaries to the Indians in the Indian Territory.

—Mrs. William Post, a sister of Mrs. Frederick W. Vanderbilt, has adopted the Catholic faith. She was formerly an Episcopalian. The well known Jesuit, Father Vaughan of England brought about her change in religious ideas.

—Leona Mary Jewell has gone to China, where it is said she is to take an officer's position in the revolutionary army. It is even said that she is to be a captain and command a company of men. Miss Jewell, whose Chinese name is Sue Yi Yat, is the daughter of a Chinese merchant in Portland. She was born in that city and educated in the Oregon public schools.

Boys and Girls

Mr. Can't and Mr. Can

Oh, Mr. Can't from Mr. Can
Is a very different sort of man,
For Mr. Can, he always tries;
And Mr. Can't, he always cries.
Now, Mr. Can gets many a blow,
But he gets the best in the end, you know.

While Mr. Can't gets nothing at all,
For he's down too low to suffer a fall,
Oh, Mr. Can gets up with a grin,
And he says: "I'm bound in the end to win."
But Mr. Can't is a pitiful sight,
For he's whipped before he's begun to fight;
And he says it puzzles him quite a lot
Why some can win and some cannot.

Oh, poor Mr. Can't! He never knew
The secret I'm going to whisper to you—
That you can win if you only try,
And you certainly can't if you only cry;
And that is the reason why Mr. Can
From Mr. Can't is a different man.

—Herald and Presbyter.

The Three Happy Pumpkins

The three pumpkins grew on three neighboring vines, and from the day they came into the world blowing their golden blossom trumpets, each of them fairly beamed with happiness and self-satisfaction. They liked the rich soil into which their roots ran deep; they liked the sun and the rain; they liked the hoeing and the tending the farmer gave them, and they grew and grew.

While the first was yet green, Dick came along with his jackknife and scratched two words on the rind: "Dozyville Fair."

"O," thought the pumpkin, "what a great end I am born for!"

Neither sun nor wind nor rain could remove those magic words. They grew as the pumpkins grew, and finally they stood out in rough, gray-green lines on a broad yellow background; for the pumpkin had grown as big and round and golden as the harvest moon that shone down upon him at night.

To the Dozyville Fair went the pumpkin. He hobnobbed with monstrous beets, curly-leaved cabbages, pink celery, giant corn, and a wonderful rutabaga pig with wooden legs and black shoe-button eyes.

Finally a blue first-prize card was pinned to the fortunate pumpkin's back, and everybody that came along stopped, looked, wondered, and said: "My! what a big, fine pumpkin!"

And so the first pumpkin was very, very happy, too, because he thought the very best thing that a pumpkin could be was a premium pumpkin.

The second pumpkin grew even bigger than the first, but he was not round and golden like the harvest moon. In fact, he was rather long and green.

It was at twilight that Teddy stole into the field, and with his sharp jackknife and practiced hand gave him eyes and a nose and a mouth that seemed about to burst into a tremendous shout. His seeds were neatly scooped out through a hole in his back and a candle set to light up his empty interior. In short, he became a Jack-o'-lantern—the very next thing to a boy.

Teddy looked at Jack and giggled. Then he started off and made the round of the houses where his playmates lived, and at every one Jack bobbed up impishly at a window. Sometimes the little girls and the little boys were scared of the flaming face at first, but always the next minute they ran to the door shouting and gave chase. It was great fun for Teddy, for he did not get caught once.

And so the second pumpkin was very, very happy, because he thought the very best thing that a pumpkin could be was a Jack o'-lantern.

And what was left for the third pumpkin? Well, this great yellow pumpkin belonged to Dolly, and grandmother made it into pie. It was a wonderful pie. It was deep and spicy and rich, with a melting crust and a sugary golden-brown top. It was big enough to cut a piece for two great-grandchildren, nine grandchildren, and five children, as well as for grandfather and grandmother themselves; for it was baked in a great, bright square iron dripping pan. Dolly and Teddy and Dick and all the great-grandchildren and grandchildren and children, and grandfather too, declared that it was the best pie grandmother ever made. And grandmother laughed she was so pleased.

And so the third pumpkin was very, very happy, too, because he thought the very best thing that a pumpkin could be was a pumpkin pie.—Dora Reed Goodale, in Little Folks.

—Mrs. Rose Klohrer, who bought the home of the late President William McKinley and converted it into a public hospital, has added a much larger building in the rear of the original house. Within a few months after it was opened as a hospital, the demand for room became so great that Mrs. Klohrer decided to construct the new building for hospital purposes and preserve the McKinley house as a home for nurses. The new structure is of yellow brick five stories high, modern and complete in every detail.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Olney Church is in a meeting with home forces.

The meeting at Carterville has already resulted in 37 additions.

Windsor Church, E. U. Smith, pastor, is planning to build a parsonage in the near future.

The meeting conducted by O. P. Wright of Mechanicsburg, at Dawson, closed March 11 with 22 added to the church.

Hamilton Church with J. Ross Miller, minister, is steadily growing. Six new members have been received recently.

First Church, Decatur, received nine new members recently. The March offering will exceed that of the past two years.

The observance of decision day at Heyworth Church resulted in 22 additions, including 17 adults.

A. E. Smith, until recently an editor of the Mt. Carmel Register, has entered the Disciple ministry, and accepted a church at Columbus, Ind.

Atlanta Church voted to begin plans for the erection of a $20,000 edifice, to be built somewhat after the style of Bloomington Centennial Church.

Robert A. Sickles, pastor of Illiopolis Church, delivered an address before the Loyal Men's Class at the annual banquet, Waynesville, March 7.

The foreign missionary offering of Jacksonville Church, Clyde Darsie, pastor, amounted to about $700 when first taken. The offering is not yet closed.

At last report there had been 56 additions, all but nine by confession, in the meeting conducted by C. L. Organ at Rock Falls, where Roy A. Miller is pastor.

Churches of Mt. Pulaski are engaged in union meeting, being held at the opera house. The attendance is good and a number of conversions have been reported.

W. L. Saunders of Litchfield preached for Mason City Church Sunday, March 17. The reception tendered new members of this church on the 14th was largely attended.

Tallula Church, where C. E. French ministers has closed a 21 days' meeting conducted by Evangelist Lew D. Hill, of Decatur, and Clinton B. Knowles, of Pawnee City, Neb., with 15 additions.

T. L. Cummins began his second year with Catlin Church the first Sunday in March, at an increased salary. The church has a membership of 148, and on a recent Sunday morning 80 per cent of the members were present.

The Sunday-school Institute held at Litchfield, Union Avenue Church, had an attendance of over 800. This church, of which Charles W. Ross is pastor, has undertaken organized relief work this winter, in order to properly minister to those in need.

The meeting at Raymond, conducted by A. W. Crabb, of Brazil, Ind., closed March 3. There were 64 new members added, and greater interest is being manifested by old members. C. Floyd Shaul was recently called to the pastorate of this church.

William B. Clemmer has entered the third year of his ministry in Rockford, Central Church. The week before Easter he will hold a decision meeting. The congregation, with heroic faith, has voted to secure the $10,000 necessary to make the new building possible, by October, 1912. Almost $6,000 is already pledged.

Illinois has had a representative on Team No. 3 of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, in Raymond Robins, of Chicago. The Survey says: "Mr. Robins has stirred two score cities with his ringing message on the religious basis for social service. The clearest and strongest note in that message is the showing as to the paramount importance today of the industrial problem—of the growing, world-wide demand for democracy in industry." The Survey of April 6 will have generous selections from Mr. Robins' address—sermons on Social Service. In this same issue, Jane Addams will begin her volunteer work as associate editor, discussing current events.

Secretary's Letter.

D. Logan, Jeffersonville, is available for two half time places by April 1.

Geo. W. Wise is greatly pleased with his new work at Lincoln and the church gave him and wife a hearty reception March 13, 250 present. One addition last Sunday.

W. T. Walker of Robinson is holding his own meeting, 14 added first two weeks. Fine interest.

Frank L. Davis of Waynesville has time for a meeting or two at once. He has had considerable experience in evangelistic fines.

Thirty additions last Sunday in the Gilliland-O'Neal-Livingstone meeting at Kankakee, and it is just getting a good start. Mr. Gilliland has open date for April and May. Address him at Clinton, Ill.

J. I. O'Neal is doing a fine work at Oblong, having increased the membership 50 per cent in about a year.

Ellis Gish has been called to continue his work half time at Kilbourne. He is doing well there.

W. B. Oliver, Hillsboro, Ky., has accepted a call to Cuba and begins April 1. Welcome.

The Mackinaw Church, J. W. Street, minister, has had 20 additions recently, 17 baptisms The work prospers right along.

Frank E. Welton of Mason City has taken the work half time at Kenney and will move there soon. He is open for another half time place.

De Land has called J. H. Stambaugh of Mt. Vernon to begin April 21.

Payson has extended a call to their pastor, R. V. Hughes, to continue with them another year. They are working to make both Bible school and church front rank.

Men, be active for the nomination of county local option candidates for the legislature, April 9. There has never been a more important crisis in all the history of temperance work in Illinois. Get every local option voter to the polls. Farmers are apt to think they are too busy in their farm work to go to the primaries. A large majority of the "stay-at-homes" are local option men, and that is where we lose out, our fellows are not sufficiently interested to leave their work an hour or two and go to the primaries. Watch "The American Issue," Illinois edition, to see who are the local option candidates in every district. Vote together on this issue on April 9, regardless of party politics. That is the way the saloon wins. Let us learn wisdom.

J. FRED JONES, Field Secretary.
W. D DEWEESE, Office Sec'y.-Treas.
Bloomington, Ill.

First Church, Bloomington, to Celebrate Seventy-fifth Anniversary

Fellowship Week.

Beginning Sunday evening, April 7, with address by Rabbi A. J. Messing, on "The Contribution of the Jewish Faith to the World." Addresses each evening during the week, by representative men of the various Christian communions. Rev. J. I. Bergstrand for the Lutherans, Dr. J. W. Elliott for the Presbyterians, Dr. Bushnell for the Congregationalists, President Kemp for the Methodists, Dr. J. L. Jackson for the Baptists (Catholic representatives to be announced later). Sunday evening, April 14, A. C. Smither for twenty-one years pastor of the First Christian Church of Los Angeles, Cal., now of St. Louis, will conclude the series with an address on "The Contribution of the Disciples to the World."

Anniversary Week.

Sermons by George R. Southgate, former assistant minister of the First Church, Stephen H. Zendt, minister of Second Church, and Milo Atkinson, minister of Centennial Church. Eureka College (night), with address by Dr. Underwood, the newly elected president of that institution. Lecture by Archibald McLean, LL. D., president Foreign Missionary Society, on "Thomas and Alexander Campbell." Pioneer night—address by N. S. Haynes of Decatur, on "Heroes of the Faith in Illinois."

Anniversary Sunday, April 21, 10:30 a. m., union services of First, Second, and Centennial Churches. Seventy-fifth anniversary sermon by the pastor, Edgar DeWitt Jones. Evening address by James H. Gilliland, on "Twenty-five Years of Religious Life in Bloomington."

Decision Week.

Preaching by the pastor each evening. Full announcement of topics later. Sunday, April 28, Decision Day in Bible School. Address by Hugh Cork, secretary Illinois Sunday-school Association. Decision services conducted by pastor. Sermon at morning worship by Mr. Cork; evening sermon by the pastor.

Former Ministers.

Only four of the former ministers of the church are living. Of these, J. H. Gilliland will have a prominent part in the celebration, and H. D. Clark, whom Mr. Gilliland succeeded, will be present, if it is possible for him to leave the bedside of a son who has been very ill for weeks. Mr. Clark is located at Mt. Sterling, Ky., whither he went from Bloomington. William Ross Lloyd, also formerly ministered to this church and will send a letter to be read at the anniversary. J. H. McCollough of Santa Cruz, Cal., is another former minister of the church who will be represented by a letter at the anniversary.

Chicago

An event of signal importance in the educational progress of the Disciples is the announcement of the call of Prof. Charles M. Sharpe, Dean of the Bible College at Columbia, Mo., to the position of assistant professor of systematic theology in the Disciples' Divinity House of the University of Chicago. Professor Sharpe has accepted his election and will move to Chicago next June, thus assuming the duties of his new position at the opening of the summer quarter. During the absence of Dean Herbert L. Willett in the Orient next year he will serve as acting dean of the Divinity House. Professor Sharpe's work as instructor and dean in the Bible College at Columbia has extended over a period of nine years. He has been active in building up there an institution of light and power for the training of ministers and the teaching of religion among college studnts. It is well known that the great prestige and efficiency of that institution has been due to his personality and activity more than to any other single influence. Among the churches of Missouri he has been the symbol of the highest educational ideals. The trustees and faculty of the college and the Missouri brotnernood regret his relinquishment of that work. But all agree that he could not do otnerwise than heed the call to the greater opportunity afforded by the Divinity House. This institution is the only attempt made by the Disciples to provide a comprehensive system of graduate instruction. Every advantage afforded by the thirty million dollars endowment of the University of Chicago is put at the disposal of the student in the Divinity House. In addition to the faculty of the Divinity School, the faculty of the Divinity House now consists of Dean H. L. Willett, Ph. D., Prof. C. M. Sharpe, Prof. Errett Gates, Ph. D., besides Professors Ames and MacClintock of the University faculty. The trustees of the House are taking hold of their task with energy and vision. The purchase of an additional fifty feet of ground adjoining the present lot, as announced recently in The Christian Century, indicates that it is the purpose of the board to build a home for this school worthy of its ideals and of the Disciples, as well as appropriate to the noble buildings of the university of which it is an integral part. Prof. Sharpe is a graduate of the University of Kansas, and will soon receive the Ph. D. degree from the University of Chicago, where his advanced work in systematic theology has already won distinction. In the promotion of both the material and academic plans of the Divinity House Prof. Sharpe will take active leadership.

Professor Charles M. Sharpe.

A factor for pure food
ante-dating all state and national food laws

DR. PRICE'S CREAM
BAKING POWDER

No Alum—No Phosphates

Be on your guard. Alum Powders may be known by their price—10 or 25c. a lb., or one cent an ounce.

Eureka College

The students of Eureka College have inaugurated a movement which is adding great encouragement to our campaign for the enlargement of the school. On the evening of March 6 a mass meeting was held in the chapel under the direction of the Boosters' Club. The meeting was called for the purpose of generating enthusiasm and outlining plans to help raise funds for the new gymnasium.

The president of the Boosters' Club, Hugh R. Davidson, was instructed to appoint a Steering Committee to take charge of the new campaign. This committee consists of Paul Million, W. H. Fonger and C. C. Haradon. President C. E. Underwood and myself are advisory members of the committee. The committee has outlined the campaign with uch care and has officially announced the purpose and plans of same. The campaign was formally opened March 19, and will run twenty-five days. It is the expectation that $15,000 will be raised during this time toward the new gymnasium.

It has been announced in the columns of this paper that part of the campaign for the enlargement of Eureka College for the next three years is $45,000 for buildings, $25,000 of this to go toward a new gymnasium. If the friends of the college will rally to the call of the student body at this time, and assist them in getting the first $15,000 within twenty-five days, it seems to me it will be an easy matter to bring the gymnasium proposition to a consumation soon. Friends, former students alumni of the college everywhere ought to fall in line with this movement and assist us.

H. H. PETERS.

Church Life

Charles G. Stout has resigned the pastorate at Paonia, Colo., and will enter the evangelistic field.

B. L. Wray, one of the evangelists under the American society will take the work at Gary, Ind., for the present.

It is reported that John L. Brandt is to become the minister for the Seattle University church.

H. H. Webb has already had over a hundred additions at his meeting in his home congregation at Portland, Ind.

E. V. Huffer, pastor at New Holland, O. has been called to the pastorate at Grand Junction, Colo.

The rural church building at Siloam, Ky. which had stood for years as the pride of the community was recently burned to the ground. There was no insurance.

A. Zink of Colorado Springs, Col., has been called to the pastorate at Plattsmouth, Neb., a pastorate he held five years ago.

There were 102 aditions in the meeting at South Bend, Ind., held by the Wilhite company. A meeting is in progress by the same team in Mishawaka.

R. R. Hamlin has accepted a call to the pastorate at Johnson City, Tenn. Mr. Hamlin has been at Wichita Falls, Tex., for some years.

Following up the Billy Sunday meetings with an evangelistic campaign, the church at Canton, Ohio, has already had over 1,000 additions.

Frank A. Higgins, assisted by Miss Ethel Easterly as leader of song, recently held a good meeting in his home church at Tonawanda, New York.

The church at Palestine, Tex., has called L. B. Haskins, of Baltimore, Md., to the pastorate. Palestine is the scene of the labors of L. D. Anderson, who built a splendid building there.

S. B. Braden has just closed a very successful meeting at Edon, O., assisted by home forces. The direct results of the meeting were 24 additions.

At last report there had been 103 responses to the invitation in the Olson-Moss meeting at Corvalis, Ore., H. H. Campbell, minister.

J. R. Perkins, who resigned from the church at Alameda, Cal., has been reported seriously ill on account of the nervous tension due to the trouble through which he passed.

Albert Nichols, pastor at Winfield, Kan., has been called to the pastorate of the Abilene, Tex., church. Mr. Nichols was formerly pastor at Plano, Tex., and is well known in the state.

Pentwater, Mich., the place where a colony of Disciples go for the summer, has a growing church. They recently had a meeting which will result in nearly forty aditions to their number.

The Central Church of New York has introduced an innovation that ought to be copied. They have a "Guest Book" where visitors are asked to sign their names and give their addresses.

Claire L. Waite is preaching a series of sermons in Cincinnati on the religious significance of various parts of the pageant that is being given in connection with the great missionary exposition.

The Magnolia Avenue church Los Angeles, Cal., will be supplied by J. K. Shellenburger in the absence of the pastor, J. P. McKnight who is to spend some months in the Mediterranean lands.

At the dedication of the Hot Spring's, Ark., church, March 10, $20,000 was raised for the payment of the debt on the property. On the 11th, Newell Hillis spoke in the church on "The America of Today and Tomorrow."

Victor M. Hovis has taken the work at Chelan, Wash. This church has a C. E., organized Feb. 11. They now have 77 members. The Sunday-school is four weeks old and had 109 in attendance last Lordsday.

J. W. Baker, Superintendent of Missions for West Washington, is in a meeting at Camas. During this meeting their new church building will be dedicated. It is the best church building in the town.

The new church in East Dallas, Tex., will be dedicated on April 7. This enterprise has been delayed somewhat owing to adverse conditions but is nearing completion. F. M. Rains will deliver the dedicatory address.

E. M. Keene, pastor of Owasso, Mich., has accepted a call from the church at Youngstown, O., to fill the vacancy left by the removal of C. S. Cliff who goes to Third Church, New Castle, Pa., after six years at Youngstown.

C. E. Chambers was the preacher and Miss Mae Roberts was the singer in a meeting that recently closed at Osceola, Iowa. There were sixty additions, of whom forty were men. Miss Roberts is a sister to the pastor, G. F. Roberts.

E. C. Harris, of Bedford, O., writes: "Three added last two weeks, ten during the month. We are having a very substantial growth both in church and Sunday-school. Our church building is in sight."

J. S. Tindall did the preaching during the week and Clarence A. Hill, the pastor, preached on Sundays in a good meeting recently held at Chicago Avenue Church, Columbus, O. There were sixty-nine confessions of faith.

Miss Mary Kelly was the speaker in a missionary service in Buffalo, N. Y., recently. Miss Kelly has been for 12 years in Nankin, China, and was able to present a thrilling message.

The Congregationalists are coöperating heartily with Herbert Yeuell in his meeting at London, Ont. The meetings are held in the large auditorium of the Congregational church. There were fifty confessions on March 11.

The Christian Century acknowledges the receipt of an invitation to attend the Texas State Missionary Convention at Houston, May 13 to 16, 1912. W. S. Lockhart is the pastor of Central Church and writes that a large delegation is expected.

J. T. Stivers has recently closed a meeting at Missoula, Mont., with 84 additions to the church. The new members were gathered for a special meeting on tne last night and each one was presented with an artistic souvenir of the occasion.

M. M. Moss has accepted a call to minister at Vanvouver, B. C. He will begin his labors for the First Church there as soon as the meeting closes at Corvalis. At that time Mr. Olson will begin his labors for the Scandianavian Church of Christ at Minneapolis, Minn.

The churches of Southern California are agitating the removal of the Bible Seminary to the vicinity of Los Angeles. There is no college of the Disciples in Southern California and the lack is necessarily keenly felt. There is no indication, at the present, of what the decision will be.

The church at San Jose, Cal., has installed a moving picture machine and gives a sacred concert every Friday afternoon. The church is prospering in its work in every way but it is desired to reach more of the people than have been touched by the influence of the regular services. Mr. Brewster, the pastor, makes a short address on the occasion of the concerts and picture entertainments.

D. S. Hayden telegraphs from London, Ontario: "The Hulbert Yuell meetings continue with unabated interest; 104 to date, 37 today. Building overcrowded for Passion Play lecture Saturday night. Men's meeting at Y. M. C. A. largely attended. Meeting with Congregationalists causing hundreds to hear our plea for the first time."

The church at Colorado, Tex., is without a pastor. The congregation is not large but they are composed of some very fine people and they are harmonious and progressive. The town is situated in the part of West Texas that attracts many people from the north on account of health and it may be that the announcement will interest some one who needs a change in climate.

In response to a recent visit to Oklahoma City by President Zollars and O. N. Ruth, the churches of Oklahoma City made definite provision to contribute $1,000 per year for five years to the support of one professor, thus making the Oklahoma City Church a living link in education. Mr. Ruth has spent much of his time during the past few months visiting points in Oklahoma, Kansas and Arkansas.

Central Christian Church, Cincinnati, O., is furnishing seventy workers who are acting as "stewards" in the great missionary exposition now in progress in that city. n addition to other work, certain of these "stewards" are giving the "Brahmin wedding" demonstration. Three different sets of workers from Central give this demonstration, one set presenting the wedding on Tuesday nights, one on Thursday nights, and one on Saturday nights.

Dr. L. J. Jaggard and wife have sailed for the Congo. It is a great pity that they could not have had more rest and it is to be hoped that the strain under which the compaigns are necessarily conducted will not produce any ill effects on the health of the doctor. It would have been wise if he could have had some months of complete rest but the necessities of the work are so imperative that he felt he must get back as soon as possible.

The encouraging gains that the Foreign Christian Missionary has been able to announce ought to be a source of comfort to all who are loyal to the great plea of the Disciples. The forces of opposition are able to make some impression in obscure quarters but the great heart of the brotherhood is sound and there is little danger that the work of the society will be seriously affected by the repeated and persistent attacks.

W. L. McCullough, formerly pastor of the church at Elma, Wash., died at Elma Mar. 5, at the age of fifty years. The Christian Century extends sympathy to the bereaved loved ones. Brother McCullough was the nephew of J. H. McCullough, who baptized him and trained him for the ministry. He was a useful man and faithful to the last. He preached for twenty years.

There is a movement on foot in the new Republic of China to get all the Christian churches to unite. If this can be accomplished, it will mean much toward the advancement of the kingdom of God in that country. The converts to Christianity in the Congo know nothing of the divisions in the churches such as we have in this country. The time may yet come when missionaries from these foreign countries will come to America to preach Christian union.

James Ware writes from Shanghai, China: Guy W. Sarvis and Mrs. Sarvis have been here about three months. They came in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel, and their coming has done us all good. Immediately after their arrival they took hold of the Mandarin language in a business-like way and are sure of making rapid headway. The China Mission look for a long and happy comradeship with them in the work.

H. E. Stafford, pastor of First Church, Massillon, Ohio, writes: "Our church is uniting with seven other churches of this city in an evangelistic campaign beginning March 24, to be held by Milford H. Lyon. Two additions since last report, seven Sunday; 387 in Sunday-school, 98 men in the Brotherhood. Crayton S. Brooks of Portsmouth, O., as evangelist and John Lewis of New Castle will aid us in the meeting following this one."

The mission station at Longa, Africa is to have a memorial hospital in memory of Dr. Willian Bailey of Louisville, Ky., whose friends are to provide the funds. Longa is the first station up the Bosiri river from Bolengi and in a very fine district. The greatest problems seems to be to secure the right sort of men to take up the medical mission work. The Congo mission at the present has no doctor on the field at all. Our missionaries are hundreds of miles, in some instances, from medical assistance.

J. L. Thompson writes from Greely, Colo.: "We are in the midst of a second meeting within a period of fifteen months and the interest is fine. There were 103 additions in the first and we have had 95 in twelve days in the second. G. L. Snively let me have his singer, O. J. Marks, for one week and his services are very helpful. Colorado is having its big snow; we have fourteen inches here and it has hindered us some, but as 422 little ones were in the Sunday-school Lord's day morning we will not complain."

Dr. E. L. Powell has been appointed one of the vice-presidents of the Second World's Christian Citizenship conference to be held in Portland, Ore., June 29—July 6, 1913. The speakers that will address the meetings include D. J. Hill, formerly ambassador to Germany, Ambassador James Bryce, Hon. A. J. Balfour, formerly prime minister of England, Justice Hughes of the Supreme Court, and many others. It is to be a conference of the leading thinkers of the world on matters pertaining to the uplift of humanity and the attainment of ideal citizenship.

J. B. Holmes, the evangelist-pastor, has done a most remarkable work at Pendleton, Ore. During the five months which he has been there, he has led the work from discouragement to hope and optimism. During this time $12,000 of the $21,000 debt has been paid and the remaining $9,000 is covered by a church extension loan at 4 per cent interest. They have installed a stereopticon. Mr. Holmes will combine the Sunday-school and morning sermon, preaching each Sunday morning on the Sunday-school lesson. The lesson will be illustrated.

At a meeting held Mar. 6 in the Bible House by the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which is composed of thirty-one denominations of the Protestant Church, the following telegram was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate in Washington urging the passing of arbitration treaties: "The Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in session assembled at New York City, unanimously urge in the name of the churches of America the passage of the pending arbitration treaties."

While Connecticut has her Fannie Crosby, the writer of 3,000 hymns, living at Bridgeport at ninety years of age, Ohio has her Dr. William H. Doane, composer of numerous hymns and songs, who at his home in Cincinnati, on Feb. 4, celebrated his eightieth birthday. Among the rich treasures of sacred words and tunes composed by Dr. Doane are: "Jesus, Keep Me Near the Cross;" "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Savior;" "Though Your Sins Be as Scarlet;" "More Love to Thee, O Christ;" "I Love to Tell the Story;" "Come, Great Deliverer, Come;" "To the Work, to the Work;" "Safe in the Arms of Jesus;" and hundreds more that have been sung by millions of people.

[Church Life continued on page 24.]

Foreign Society News

Miss Edna P. Dale, Shanghai, China, in a recent letter, says, "These are great times in China and the most interesting time to be here. So many changes are taking place. Queues are going fast and one can hardly find cloth in Shanghai suitable for coats, so many are adopting foreign clothes and getting overcoats. There is talk of tearing down the old Shanghai city wall and running electric trams (cars) through the old city."

D. C. Dunningham, Harda, India, writes as follows: "We had five baptisms here last Saturday. We are hopeful of large results in the near future. We have remembered the March offering in a special two weeks of prayer. Trust the offering may be beyond our fondest hopes. Our annual convention will meet in Jubbulpore from March 7 to 11."

The Missionary Education Movement reports that twelve summer conferences have trained 2,600 people for missionary leadership, and two score institutions in as many cities have prepared others. At least 150,000 people have been enlisted in mission study and 21 different foreign countries have been assisted in establishing work to promote missionary education.

"Took our offering yesterday and in spite of sickness, death and very bad roads, I believe we will reach our apportionment. What a travesty that a people who claim to 'speak where the Book speaks' should allow bad roads, a little sore throat or a corn on their toe to interfere with an offering for the supreme conquest of the world by Christ. Even death in the family would not be sufficient to hinder another member of the family from being baptized. It might postpone the event, but nothing more, for the whole official board and forty good women would follow the candidate until he was immersed. But the missionary offering, if followed up at all, is by the preacher. We will follow up the campaign."—B. H. SEALOCK, Edinburg, Ill.

The Clifton Christian Church, Louisville, Ky., enters the living link rank. Good! J. C. Hilton, the chairman of the missionary committee, says, "The church will surpass our ideal 'As much for missions and benevolences as for current expenses.'" L. G. Gordon is the minister. He has good Australian blood in his veins, which means that he is sound to the core on the missionary question.

Mrs. Mary A. Alexander, wife of Jos. H. Alexander, an annuitant of the Foreign Society, died at Union City, Ind., early in March. She was a good friend of foreign missions. We extend to her husband and the family sincere Christian sympathy in this great loss.

Subscribers Wants

Readers of the Christian Century find its columns valuable for advertising their wants or wares. The charge is one cent for each word, with a minimum of thirty cents for each insertion. Cash must accompany the order to save bookkeeping.

DO YOU NEED HYMN BOOKS for Church or Sunday-school? Write for prices, care of M, NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

CHURCH CLERK: Do you need church letters? We furnish a well designed letter in blocks of fifty at 50 cents. Write us, care of X, NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

MOTHERS' DAY Songs and Program. Chas. M. Fillmore, 1914 Commerce Ave., Indianapolis, Ind.

Self Heating Iron

NEW "PERFECTION"

Makes and contains its own heat. Works while it is heating, heats while it is working. Saves miles walking. Saves its cost every month. Economical, safe, convenient. The "Perfection" is stove, fuel, heat—all in one. Fire is inside. Carry it about, go where you please. Don't stay in hot kitchen; iron any place, any room, on porch, or under shade tree. Go right along, one thing after another. All kinds clothes ironed better in half the time. No waiting, no stopping to change irons. Right heat. Easily regulated. No time wasted. Iron on table all the time, one hand on the iron, the other to turn and fold the clothes. The "Perfection" is neat, durable and compact; all parts within radius of iron and handle. No tanks nor fittings standing out at sides or ends to hinder and be in the way. No wires or hose attached to bother. Right size, right shape, right weight. Cheapest fuel, two cents does ordinary family ironing. Every iron tested before shipping. Ready for use when received. Price low—$4.50. Sent anywhere.

"Perfection."

AGENTS MAKE MONEY Men or Women. Quick, easy, sure. All year business. Experience not necessary. Sells on merit—sells itself. They buy on sight. Every home a prospect. Every woman needs it. Price low—all can afford it. HOW THEY DO SELL—Even 2 or 3 a day gives $27 to $40 a week profit; 6 sales a day is fair for an agent; some will sell a dozen in one day. Show 10 families—sell 8. Not sold in stores. Send no money. Write postal today for description, agent's selling plan. How to get FREE SAMPLE. C. BROWN MFG. CO., 124 Brown Bldg., Cincinnati, O.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

CENTRAL CHURCH New York, 142 West 81st St. Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL

Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27

ESTABLISHED 1858

THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

BOWLDEN BELLS FOR CHURCH AND SCHOOL

Sweet Tone Far Sounding Durable

Catalogue Free.

AMERICAN BELL & FOUNDRY CO., NORTHVILLE, MICH.

WE READ and clip for you daily everything printed in the current country and city press of America pertaining to the subject of particular interest to you.

NEWSPAPERS contain many items daily which would inform you exclusively of where you can secure new business, an order or a contract; where a new store has been started, a new firm incorporated or a contract is to be let. A daily press clipping service means more business

FOR YOU. Send Stamp for Booklet

THE CONSOLIDATED PRESS CLIPPING CO.

1109 167 W. Washington St., Chicago, U. S. A.

The church at Norfolk, Va., has been ıpporting a living link for some years. ıey are now building a large addition for ınday-school purposes to cost about $40,- 00. Yet they expect to increase their mis- onary offerings. C. M. Watson is the min- ter.

W. R. Hunt, Chuchow, China, writes: Our new church at Chuchow is built. It ill be opened March 1. Friends will come om Nankin. I have a great evangelistic eld in Chuchow, besides a big clientele of iends among the business men and stu- dents. We shall have special evangelistic services and lectures. This month and next we will baptize a number."

R. Ray Eldred, Longa, Africa, reports seven baptisms on the 21st of January.

The Foreign Society is searching for a medical missionary for Africa. He should be under thirty years of age and well equipped for the position. Not only should he have a medical education, but he should know the Bible and understand the plan of salvation. One man in California offers to pay for his outfit and passage and provide his salary. The friends of the work are asked to unite in prayer that the Lord of the harvest may send the right man for this great and needy field.

The churches, as churches, sent $19,528 for foreign missions the first twenty days of March. This is an increase of only $293 over the corresponding time last year. The severe storms during the month have greatly interfered with the offerings. Let the churches be prompt in forwarding their gifts. We are able to report one new living link.

$20 to $50 and Expenses Weekly.
NO EXPERIENCE REQUIRED. NO CAPITAL.

$1,000 to $2,500 Annual Income WRITE US TODAY

COSTS NOTHING TO INVESTIGATE. WRITE US FOR OUR PROPOSITION ANYWAY.

Let Us Start You. Big Profits.

SHOP OUTFIT FOR GOLD, SILVER AND NICKEL PLATING.

To Show You What Others Are Doing We Quote the Expressions of a Few Who Have Made Money in the Plating Business:

Mr. Reed, Ohio, made $88.16 THE FIRST 3 DAYS. Mr. Cox, Illinois, writes: "GET ALL I CAN DO;" plate 30 sets a day. Elegant business: Customers happy. "Mr. Woodward earns $170.00 a month." M. L. Smith, Pennsylvania, says, "GOT $301.27 plating in 2 weeks." (used small outfit). Geo. P. Crawford writes: "Made $7 a day." J. S. Mills, a farmer, writes: "EASILY MADE $5 A DAY PLATING." Thos. Baker, school teacher, 21 years, writes: "I made $9.80 profit one day, $9.35 another." Albert McWethy, N. Y., "EARNED EVENINGS OVER $20, with no soliciting." H. H. Ward, Tenn., "EARNED $5.00 A DAY spare hours from my printing business." Chas. Branther: "I made IN ONE DAY, $17.85 PROFIT." Sam Brown, Me.: "Plating ODD HOURS, MADE $37 profit in a week." E. B. Woodbury, old soldier: "Plated 1800 pieces table ware, AVERAGING $6 PER DAY PROFIT." E. L. Gracier, teacher Philippine Islands: "I make $3 daily, besides teaching." R. T. Bartlett: "I made $2 per hour spare time." D. F. Fuller: "$5.25 first day." W. H. Davis, writes: "I get all the plating I can do." B. G. Vaughn, S. C.: "I conscientiously recommend the Royal Plater—do splendid work—average $5 per day." J. H Carrier, N. Y.: "I made $6 IN 3 HOURS spare time." J. Anderson N. D.: "You can get plating to do at every house." H. H. Bender, Mich.: "There is a great demand for replating." R. R. Howard, Mo.: "HAVE MORE WORK THAN I CAN DO." H. H. Ward, Tenn.: "Gray & Co.. are thoroughly reliable and all who patronize them will receive fair treatment." Geo. E. Wilson, N. Y.: "Am now making nice living in the evenings. I make some weeks $20."

H. E. Woodward, of Pa., writes; "I have all the work I can do. I have two solicitors. It is very easy to learn to do plating. I have done from $8 to $10 worth of work per day. I can do more as I gain in practice. I thank you for the gentlemanly way in which you have treated me since I commenced to deal with you."

WHAT IS THE USE OF YOUR SLAVING LONGER FOR SOME ONE ELSE?

Why not start a business for yourself, reap all the profits and get a standing in your locality?

If you are in some one else's employ, remember he will continue to pay you a salary only so long as he can make profit out of your labor.

In this era every bright man is looking to own a business, to employ help, and to make money.

It is just as easy to make money for yourself as it is to coin money for some grasping employer, who pays you a small salary each week.

If you are making less than $30 weekly it will pay you to read this announcement, for it will not appear again in this paper.

If you read it and take advantage of the opportunity offered, you will never regret it. To own a business yourself is certainly your ambition.

We start you in a profitable business. Teach you absolutely free how to conduct it.

It is no trouble to make $5 to $15 a day at home or traveling, taking orders, using, selling and appointing agents for PROF. GRAY'S Latest Improved, Guaranteed Plating Machines and Outfits. It is a practical, complete, scientific outfit for doing the finest plating on WATCHES, JEWELRY, KNIVES, FORKS, SPOONS, CASTORS, TABLEWARE OF ALL KINDS, BICYCLES, SEWING MACHINES, SWORDS, REVOLVERS, HARNESS AND BUGGY TRIMMINGS, metal specialties; in fact all kinds of metal goods. HEAVY THICK PLATE EVERY TIME. GUARANTEED TO WEAR FOR YEARS. No experience necessary.

There is really a wonderful demand for replating. You can do business at nearly every house, store, office or factory. Almost every family has from $2 to $10 worth of tableware to be plated, besides watches, jewelry, bicycles, etc.

Every boarding house, hotel, restaurant, college or public institution has from $5 to $75 worth of work to be plated.

Plate some articles for your friends and neighbors by Prof. Gray's Process and it quickly proves to them its genuineness and merit, and that your plating is much thicker, will wear better and longer than a large percentage of the new goods. Your trade is then established, and within a short time you will have all the goods you can plate.

THE ROYAL OUTFIT.

Prof. Gray's Famous Discovery.

THE NEW DIPPING PROCESS is the latest, quickest, easiest method known. Tableware plated by dipping, taken out instantly, with a fine, brilliant, beautiful surface. All ready to deliver to customers. THICK PLATE EVERY TIME, WEARS 5 to 10 YEARS. A BOY PLATES 100 to 300 pieces of tableware daily, from $10 to $30 worth of work. Profits almost 1000 per cent. Goods come out finely finished. No polishing, grinding or work necessary, either before or after plating.

ROYAL OUTFIT IN OPERATION.

YOU CAN DO PLATING SO CHEAP.

The best part of the plating business is that it increases fast and is permanent, and every person can afford to have their goods plated.

You will not need to canvass. Agents write they have all the goods they can plate. People bring it for miles around. You can hire boys cheap to do your plating, the same as we do, and solicitors to gather work for a small per cent. Put a small advertisement or two in your local paper and you will have all the plating you can do. The plating business is honest and legitimate. Plating on our machines gives perfect satisfaction. Wears for years: customers are always delighted and recommend you and your work.

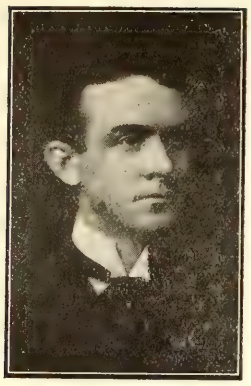
We teach you everything, furnish all receipts, formulas and trade secrets free, so that failure should be impossible, and any one who follows our directions and teachings can do fine plating with a little practice, and become a money maker.

We are an old established firm, have been in business 20 years, know exactly what is required, furnish complete outfits, the same as we ourselves use, and customers always have the benefit of our experience. We are responsible and guarantee everything. Reader, here is the chance of a life time to go in business for yourself. We Start you. Now is the time to make money.

WE SEND SAMPLE PLATING FREE

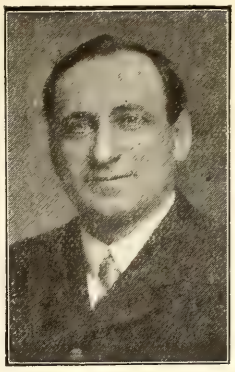
together with our new plan and proposition, also valuable information how plating is done. Write for FREE sample anyway

GRAY & CO., Plating Works, 1066 Gray Bldg., Cincinnati, O.



CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

ORVIS F. JORDAN



ELLIS B. BARNES

SILAS JONES

CHARLES M. SHELDON

Good Things in Store For Our Readers

The Oriental Mission Field

Coming months hold much in store for Christian Century readers. No feature in American religious journalism during the next twelve months will surpass the articles by Professor H. L. Willett, from the Oriental mission field. Dr. Willett is now forming the personnel of the class which he is to take through Japan, China, India, the Philippines, Egypt and Palestine. The party sails toward the end of summer and will spend eight months, not in casual sight-seeing but in earnest study of the social and moral conditons of these countries and of the problems of missionary service among their peoples. The enterprise is conducted under the auspices of the University of Chicago. The work done by members of the party is of university grade and will receive university credit. Dr. Willett has been invited by both mission and native educational institutions in the various lands to deliver series of lectures before students and faculties on Christian themes. The most intimate aspects of political, educational and social life as well as the teeming life of the masses, will be accessible to him. His mission both in purpose and plan is unique in missionary history.

The account of his observations and experiences will be published in The Christian Century in a series of articles written as only such a scholar and world-traveler as Dr. Willett can prepare, and generously illustrated by original photographs.

We have every right to say that these articles will be the most significant contribution to the missionary enterprise that has appeared in current literature. Facts, gathered at first hand, by a competent and discriminating observer, and reported in fearless and graphic fashion, are what the Christian people of the Occident want. This they will receive through Dr. Willett's articles.

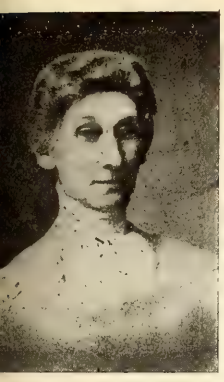
"Why I Am a Disciple"

The current discussion of Disciples' ideals and principles has compelled The Christian Century to take an aggressive and critical attitude toward certain practices and opinions that have come to be accepted by many as part and parcel of the essential conviction and aim of this brotherhood. While this uninviting policy of critical examination was undertaken with reluctance, it is being carried on without regret and will be carried on. The Christian Century strives to interpret the ideals of the Disciples, not simply to reflect their current ideas. To no less a task has this paper been consecrated.

The prosecution of this task involves us in discussion with those whose ideas do not seem to us to represent the Disciples' ideals. This discussion we believe to be thoroughly wholesome. It must not be abandoned nor curtailed. It is only fairly begun. But while it is in progress we wish our readers to see the other side of the shield also—the positive side of The Christian Century's loyalty, its radical affinity for the dominant ideas that characterize the Disciples' mind.

We are therefore planning a series of editorials on the subject, "Why I Am a Disciple." These articles will be written by Charles Clayton Morrison, and will be a personal and intimate setting forth of the way in which the teaching and aim of the Disciples appeal to him. The series will include perhaps a dozen short articles. Much of the material will be commonplace to those familiar with the literature of the Disciples, but there will be many readers, no doubt, to whom the articles will come with the force of novelty. And even to those well-read in this lore, the old story is ever new with each new narrator.

Dr. Willett's Study Class Conducted Through Palestine and Egypt in 1905. His 1912 Class to the Orient is Limited to Fifteen.



IDA W. HARRISON

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL

EDGAR D. JONES

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

HERBERT L. WILLETT

Other Fascinating Features

A feature in which every reader will be intensely interested is the story by Charles M. Sheldon, world-famous author of "In His Steps," which will begin in the issue of April 18. Dr. Sheldon is the most interesting and popular writer of religious stories in America. The publishers of The Christian Century are happy to have arranged for the appearance of a story from his gifted pen. Dr. Sheldon has recently resigned his twenty-year pastorate at Topeka, Kansas, in order to devote himself to the wider ministry of travel and writing. Young and old, layman and minister, all alike will enjoy "The High Calling." This story was read to the author's Sunday evening audience of young people, and attracted more interest than any story since "In His Steps."

The delight with which our readers have devoured the unique articles by Dr. William E. Barton, Congregational pastor, leader of his denomination, and a writer whose works are sought by the best magazines of the country, has moved us to make arrangements with The Advance for the simultaneous publication of articles from his pen. These articles will appear almost every week. Dr. Barton deals with live issues in a very practical, human and clever way. He is the friend and interpreter of the minister, and he writes about the minister in such a way as to interest the lay reader quite as much as the minister. His recent interpretations of Old Testament stories, translating them into terms of our modern life, have been intensely fascinating and vital.

Who can preach in print better than G. Campbell Morgan, of Westminster Chapel, London? It is difficult beyond the understanding of anybody who has not had experience in an editorial office to find preachers whose sermons can stand the light of the printed page. People like to read sermons—when they are readable. Many a preacher whose sermon is very effective in actual delivery is totally unable to carry over his pulpit power into print. With Dr. Morgan this is not true. Thousands throng to hear him in his great London pulpit. But his printed sermon possesses the same charm and conveys the same power of which the people who heard it spoken were conscious. Dr. Morgan's great messages will continue to appear in The Christian Century.

Work of the Regular Staff

And what shall we say of the regular staff of editors who are at work producing The Christian Century week by week? Our recent discovery of Ida Withers Harrison and Ellis B. Barnes as newspaper writers of the first rank were two events that released a current of popular congratulation which seems to swell with each succeeding issue of the paper. Mrs. Harrison's department, "Modern Womanhood," has been treating of a wide circle of interests, revealing not only her remarkable versatility but the breadth and richness of mind of the women of today. Her page is an increasing delight to our women readers, and it is to be doubted if any other part of the paper is read with more interest even by the men.

Mr. Barnes has leaped into a place of true leadership in his interpretation of the thought and activity of the Christian world and his espousal of the historic ideals of the Disciples of Christ against sectarian reactionism.

No man among the Disciples is better equipped to give instruction in social conditions and principles and sound forth an inspiring note for social service than Orvis F. Jordan, the leader of Disciple forces in Chicago. Underneath everything that Mr. Jordan writes there is a firm basis of academic knowledge of social principles and a rich fund of first-hand and intimate observation of actual conditions. His Social Survey page is unique in the newspaper literature of the Disciples.

The devotional studies on the prayer-meeting topic by Silas Jones will be continued. Mr. Jones' article heads the editorial department each week. His devotional writing has a distinctive flavor in that it combines the temper of piety with the insight of a trained psychologist.

The department of "Interpretations," contributed by George A. Campbell, and the self-revelations of Edgar D. Jones, under the the heading "Monday Moods," both of which our readers have so greatly enjoyed in the past will be continued and we hope even more frequently in the future.

A full table of contents for the future it is impossible to give. What has been here set down is but a description of the regular contributions upon which our readers may count. Besides these there are the carefully selected articles on vital, human conditions and experiences in the search for which the editors are continually on the alert. The development of these unannounced contributions is one of the main tasks to which the editors have set themselves for the coming year. Certainly no person familiar with the current literature of the Disciples can be found who will take exception to the statement of a very conservative reader who said recently that The Christian Century was "doing more to enrich the mind and widen the horizon of the Disciples than any other influence among us."

How Our Readers Can Help

In view of the actual service now being rendered by The Christian Century to its readers and to the larger cause of Christ, the publishers have no hesitation in calling the attention of every friend of the paper and its ideals to the unique opportunity afforded just now for practical co-operation all around. It is a great moment in the history of the Disciples. The part taken by The Christian Century in the forward movement of the brotherhood has been taken in the faith that every forward-moving Disciple would share in a very practical way in promoting the common cause. The most important, practical help that such a friend can render is to increase the number of our readers.

Church Life

(Continued from page 20.)

C. B. Hahn, the leader in boy's work has a boy city in operation in the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City. There are seventy citizens, with a mayor and other officials. They print a newspaper and have a brass band. They recently organized a Sunday-school under the supervision of a boy superintendent. They gave an exhibition on March 14 of their handiwork, consisting of the work of the boy carpenters, cabinet makers, printers, electricians, artists and wireless telegraph operators. The mayor of the Boy City made an address of welcome, quite after the style of real mayors.

In Joplin, Mo., the Men and Religion Forward Movement committee secured an address from the general superintendent of the board of public welfare of Kansas City on the subject of prison reform. It is a most encouraging sign of the times that the movement has so largely emphasized the practical side of social service and has conducted investigations that have led to recommendations of the most concrete and definite character. The time has long gone by when thinking men will expect abstract appeals to the souls of men to take the place of the doing of justice by the community to the bodies of the men.

W. A. Wilson, an elder in Central Church, Houston, Tex., is chairman of the committee of one hundred of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. W. S. Lockhart, pastor at Central, is chairman of the social service committee and has done excellent work in revealing the actual conditions and in leading the forces for a moral and religious reform. The churches in Texas are finding that the different denominations are being drawn together most effectively by this method. The functional plan of union is often the only way and certainly more more effective than mere doctrinal agreement.

C. C. Wilson, of First Church, Milwaukee, Wis., in a sermon preached on March 10, spoke some clear and ringing words on the subject of Christian Union. We make the following quotation, only wishing that our space allowed the reproduction of the entire sermon:

"We have been seeking for Christian union in the wrong place. It will never come by proselytism. The only union some of us seem to care for is that of the union of the lamb in the lion. It is also a fatal fallacy to postpone it until the millenium, when it is hoped that all will think alike. We want unity, not uniformity. We must plead for unity, not fight for it. The Disciples of Christ came into existence about 100 years ago to protest against sectarianism, and promote church union. Have we succeeded, or have we added one more to the swollen number of denominations and so confused the issue and retarded its solution? The Campbells—founders of the movement—were heretics and so cut loose from their denominational moorings, but have we not lapsed back into that very spirit of bigotry, intolerance, exclusiveness and sectarianism from which they sought to escape? I am not a Campbellite because I do not want to be in bondage to the past, but it would be well to catch again the catholicity of Thomas Campbell. We need more humility and less of the 'I am holier than thou' attitude. Chances are we haven't a corner on the truth market. There are just as good folks in other churches. But pleading for unity in itself is futile. We must practice it. Otherwise our words will be as sounding brass and clanging cymbal. Unity, like charity, begins at home."

W. D. Van Voorhis writes us: "The Protestant churches of Parkersburg, W. Va., have just closed a very helpful union meeting under the leadership of Dr. Herbert Booth, of London, the youngest son of the founder of the Salvation Army. Mr. Booth was first called to our city by the First Methodist Church, and the first services were held in their auditorium. As the time seemed ripe for a city-wide campaign, one of the leading opera houses was secured and we all entered into the work on a large scale. Considering the fact that very little advertising was done before the meeting, and almost no preparation was made in the way of organization, the meeting was successful. The religious forces of our city were united, the leading workers in our churches worked side by side; our ministers showed themselves to be large hearted, large minded Christian men, working for the good of the kingdom. There were about 150 decisions for Christ. But the general results such as the quickening of spiritual life among Christians, the raising of the standard of social righteousness were all out of proportion to the numbers which will be received into the churches. Herbert Booth is one of the most Christ-like men I have ever known. His preaching is strictly Biblical. He avoids everything that smacks of the sensational. He seems to care little for numbers, and insists continually on an out and out stand for Christ. He is especially strong in his portrayal of Bible characters. Being a born dramatist, he is able to call the great men of the Bible to live and breathe, to sin and struggle, to fall and rise again before his audiences. Personally, I feel stronger for having had part in such an effort. It can but hasten the answer to our Master's prayer that 'all may be one.'"

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS. THE WINTER OF 1912 SURPASSES ALL RECORDS

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX April 4, 1912 Number 14

IN THIS ISSUE

WHAT ENGLISH FREE CHURCHMEN TALK ABOUT
BY LESLIE W. MORGAN—OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT

A MINISTER UNPOPULAR WITH YOUNG PEOPLE
BY WILLIAM E. BARTON

IS IT LOSS OR GAIN?
AN INTERPRETATION OF SOME STATISTICS, BY GEORGE A. CAMPBELL

A MOONSHINER WHO TURNED ABOUT
BY ANNA ROSS

THE CASE OF RICHARD MEYNELL
BY IDA WITHERS HARRISON

DISCIPLES' DUTY IN A SMALL VILLAGE
BY SAMUEL HARDEN CHURCH—WITH EDITORIAL COMMENT

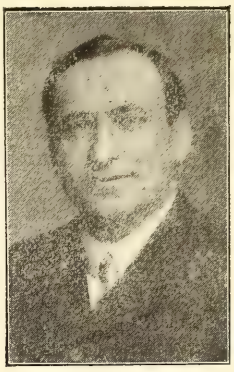
THE TRAGEDY OF THE BACKWARD LOOK
AN EDITORIAL BY ELLIS B. BARNES

EDITORIALS
NOT BY BREAD ALONE—A LENTEN STUDY
THE RISEN LIFE

CHICAGO

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

ORVIS F. JORDAN.



ELLIS B. BARNES.

SILAS JONES.

CHARLES M. SHELDON.

Good Things in Store For Our Readers

The Oriental Mission Field

Coming months hold much in store for Christian Century readers. No feature in American religious journalism during the next twelve months will surpass the articles by Professor H. L. Willett, from the Oriental mission field. Dr. Willett is now forming the personnel of the class which he is to take through Japan, China, India, the Philippines, Egypt and Palestine. The party sails toward the end of summer and will spend eight months, not in casual sight-seeing but in earnest study of the social and moral conditons of these countries and of the problems of missionary service among their peoples. The enterprise is conducted under the auspices of the University of Chicago. The work done by members of the party is of university grade and will receive university credit. Dr. Willett has been invited by both mission and native educational institutions in the various lands to deliver series of lectures before students and faculties on Christian themes. The most intimate aspects of political, educational and social life as well as the teeming life of the masses, will be accessible to him. His mission both in purpose and plan is unique in missionary history.

The account of his observations and experiences will be published in The Christian Century in a series of articles written as only such a scholar and world-traveler as Dr. Willett can prepare, and generously illustrated by original photographs.

We have every right to say that these articles will be the most significant contribution to the missionary enterprise that has appeared in current literature. Facts, gathered at first hand, by a competent and discriminating observer, and reported in fearless and graphic fashion, are what the Christian people of the Occident want. This they will receive through Dr. Willett's articles.

"Why I Am a Disciple"

The current discussion of Disciples' ideals and principles has compelled The Christian Century to take an aggressive and critical attitude toward certain practices and opinions that have come to be accepted by many as part and parcel of the essential conviction and aim of this brotherhood. While this uninviting policy of critical examination was undertaken with reluctance, it is being carried on without regret and will be carried on. The Christian Century strives to interpret the ideals of the Disciples, not simply to reflect their current ideas. To no less a task has this paper been consecrated.

The prosecution of this task involves us in discussion with those whose ideas do not seem to us to represent the Disciples' ideals. This discussion we believe to be thoroughly wholesome. It must not be abandoned nor curtailed. It is only fairly begun. But while it is in progress we wish our readers to see the other side of the shield also—the positive side of The Christian Century's loyalty, its radical affinity for the dominant ideas that characterize the Disciples' mind.

We are therefore planning a series of editorials on the subject, "Why I Am a Disciple." These articles will be written by Charles Clayton Morrison, and will be a personal and intimate setting forth of the way in which the teaching and aim of the Disciples appeal to him. The series will include perhaps a dozen short articles. Much of the material will be commonplace to those familiar with the literature of the Disciples, but there will be many readers, no doubt, to whom the articles will come with the force of novelty. And even to those well-read in this lore, the old story is ever new with each new narrator.

Dr. Willett's Study Class Conducted Throu gh Palestine and Egypt in 1905. His 1912 Class to the Orient is Limited to Fifteen.

IDA W. HARRISON.

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

EDGAR D. JONES.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

Other Fascinating Features

interested is the story by Charles M. Sheldon, world-famous author of "In His Steps," which will begin in the issue of April 18. Dr. Sheldon is the most interesting and popular writer of religious stories in America. The publishers of The Christian Century are happy to have arranged for the appearance of a

A feature in which every reader will be intensely This story was read to the author's Sunday evening minister, all alike will enjoy "The High Calling." story from his gifted pen. Dr. Sheldon has recently resigned his twenty-year pastorate at Topeka, Kan- sas, in order to devote himself to the wider ministry of travel and writing. Young and old, layman and audience of young people, and attracted more interest than any story since "In His Steps."

The delight with which our readers have devoured the unique articles by Dr. William E. Barton, Congregational pastor, leader of his denomination, and a writer whose works are sought by the best magazines of the country, has moved us to make arrangements with The Advance for the simultaneous publication of articles from his pen. These articles will appear almost every week. Dr. Barton deals with live issues in a very practical, human and clever way. He is the friend and interpreter of the minister, and he writes about the minister in such a way as to interest the lay reader quite as much as the minister. His recent interpretations of Old Testament stories, translating them into terms of our modern life, have been intensely fascinating and vital.

Who can preach in print better than G. Campbell Morgan, of Westminster Chapel, London? It is difficult beyond the understanding of anybody who has not had experience in an editorial office to find preachers whose sermons can stand the light of the printed page. People like to read sermons—when they are readable. Many a preacher whose sermon is very effective in actual delivery is totally unable to carry over his pulpit power into print. With Dr. Morgan this is not true. Thousands throng to hear him in his great London pulpit. But his printed sermon possesses the same charm and conveys the same power of which the people who heard it spoken were conscious. Dr. Morgan's great messages will continue to appear in The Christian Century.

Work of the Regular Staff

And what shall we say of the regular staff of editors who are at work producing The Christian Century week by week? Our recent discovery of Ida Withers Harrison and Ellis B. Barnes as newspaper writers of the first rank were two events that released a current of popular congratulation which seems to swell with each succeeding issue of the paper. Mrs. Harrison's department, "Modern Womanhood," has been treating of a wide circle of interests, revealing not only her remarkable versatility but the breadth and richness of mind of the women of today. Her page is an increasing delight to our women readers, and it is to be doubted if any other part of the paper is read with more interest even by the men.

Mr. Barnes has leaped into a place of true leadership in his interpretation of the thought and activity of the Christian world and his espousal of the historic ideals of the Disciples of Christ against sectarian reactionism.

No man among the Disciples is better equipped to give instruction in social conditions and principles and sound forth an inspiring note for social service than Orvis F. Jordan, the leader of Disciple forces in Chicago. Underneath everything that Mr. Jordan writes there is a firm basis of academic knowledge of social principles and a rich fund of first-hand and intimate observation of actual conditions. His Social Survey page is unique in the newspaper literature of the Disciples.

The devotional studies on the prayer-meeting topic by Silas Jones will be continued. Mr. Jones' article heads the editorial department each week. His devotional writing has a distinctive flavor in that it combines the temper of piety with the insight of a trained psychologist.

The department of "Interpretations," contributed by George A. Campbell, and the self-revelations of Edgar D. Jones, under the the heading "Monday Moods," both of which our readers have so greatly enjoyed in the past will be continued and we hope even more frequently in the future.

A full table of contents for the future it is impossible to give. What has been here set down is but a description of the regular contributions upon which our readers may count. Besides these there are the carefully selected articles on vital, human conditions and experiences in the search for which the editors are continually on the alert. The development of these unannounced contributions is one of the main tasks to which the editors have set themselves for the coming year. Certainly no person familiar with the current literature of the Disciples can be found who will take exception to the statement of a very conservative reader who said recently that The Christian Century was "doing more to enrich the mind and widen the horizon of the Disciples than any other influence among us."

How Our Readers Can Help

In view of the actual service now being rendered by The Christian Century to its readers and to the larger cause of Christ, the publishers have no hesitation in calling the attention of every friend of the paper and its ideals to the unique opportunity afforded just now for practical co-operation all around. It is a great moment in the history of the Disciples. The part taken by The Christian Century in the forward movement of the brotherhood has been taken in the faith that every forward-moving Disciple would share in a very practical way in promoting the common cause. The most important, practical help that such a friend can render is to increase the number of our readers.

The Book World

Recent Books on Christian Union

OTHER SHEEP I HAVE, is too discursive and voluminous for the value of its contribution. The pruning knife is needed here. It is a brief compendium of church history, and the manner of treatment is not likely to appeal to the general reader. The beliefs of the different denominations of the Christian Church are subjected to a keen analysis by such characters as Romanus, Magnate, Objector, Encourager, Bapto, Method, Anglic, Pilgrim, and others. There is much valuable material in the work, but the argument is too prolix for our busy age. The bent of the work is Anglican. The author shows an intimate knowledge of the subject, and the references and footnotes indicate that his reading has been quite extensive. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Pp. 385. $2.)

AN EIRENIC ITINERARY, by Silas McBee, the accomplished editor of The Churchman, is an account of a wide tour in European countries, with the Edinburgh Conference as the culmination. Mr. McBee's interest in the cause of church union is well known, and through him the Episcopal church has come to be one of the foremost in America in advocating this great mission. Conferences on the subject were held with high officials in the Eastern and Roman Catholic churches, as well as with the representatives of the American and English Protestant churches on the fields in Oriental countries. The spirit of the book is well indicated in the following paragraph:

"These efforts have now brought me in touch with representatives of practically every type of organized Christianity. I have talked to others and they have talked to me with an unusual measure of frankness which has been the more unreserved because I have had the privilege of worshipping with them. This principle of action is very far-reaching and is not without its difficulties and grave dangers. Not the least of these is the danger of allowing, for the sake of the end in view, the wearing away of clearly marked lines of principle and conviction, for to reduce principle and conviction to indifference by compromise is worse in effect than to yield them in open conflict."

Another comprehensive statement is as follows:

"The right to differ is an essential condition of growth and it is equally an essential condition of vital unity. The deprivation of the right to differ would mean the destruction of variety and the establishment of uniformity and that would mean a death blow to all growth. . . . Unity in variety is the gift of God. It safeguards the right to differ and to hold sacred differing and different convictions so long as these differences are kept in their true perspective, so long as they are limited to the sphere of human knowledge and power, and are not projected beyond that sphere as if man could place limitations upon God. This principle calls for the living application of the love that believes all things in the face of having to endure all things. It seeks to apply the family idea to a broken and dismembered Christendom as the governing principle of the church's life and as an essential condition of manifesting Christ to the whole world."

The latter chapters of the work are made up of editorials which have set forth Mr. McBee's views on the subject of union. The book is valuable because of its generous spirit, and its wholesome attitude toward the different communions. (New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 225. $1, net.)

THE UNIFICATION OF THE CHURCHES, by D. W. Fisher, D. D., is a brief but worthy contribution to the subject. The author has a clear view of the difficulties, the fields, and the prospects of union. Special emphasis is laid on the necessity of union among the families of churches, the twelve distinct bodies of Presbyterians, the fourteen kinds of Methodists, the sixteen kinds of Baptists, the twenty-four kinds of Lutherans. Says the author, "The truth is that the perpetuation of this fragmentary condition within families of churches is an anachronism; and though history may somewhat condone it as a concession to our infirmities, it will nevertheless at some time permanently record this state of things as a reproach."

Dr. Fisher finds great encouragement to hope that the examples of some of the missionaries and their churches will be followed by our American churches. We find this incident which gives us all reason to believe that what is possible in Africa will be possible everywhere:

"For example, in British East Africa, not long ago, forty-five missionaries held a conference for the consideration of union in a single body. A definite plan was not adopted, but it is highly significant, that for the accomplishment of this purpose, Quakers expressed a willingness to use the sacraments, Presbyterians to serve under a Bishop, and all to use a liturgy and free prayer. Among the native Christians in various countries the tendency to come together, irrespective of the denominationalism which hitherto has obtained among them, in one independent church is constantly becoming stronger; and by many intelligent missionaries this consummation is regarded as inevitable and not far distant in time."

We cheerfully commend this little volume as a worthy contribution to the literature of the subject. Dr. Fisher has no plan of union to propose, but we are safe in saying that no union will be accomplished that ignores the general approaches to union suggested by this work. The good and the ill of division are fairly and skillfully treated, and the reason for the continual divisions of the churches in America, viz., the right of free speech. All churches are given every consideration in the eyes of the law. Where liberty of discussion and of opinion is allowed it seems inevitable that new shoots will be produced from the parent roots. But it is also to be observed that no new communions have sprung up in America within the past twenty years. The breaking point in church life is not reached as easily now as in former years, and that in itself simplifies the problem. There is much valuable information in this little book. (New York: F. H. Revell. Pp. 93. 50c.)

CHRISTIAN UNITY IN EFFORT, by Frank J. Firth, is an attempt to promote unity by an understanding of the historic creeds, and on the basis of love. The work will not appeal to those who are unfamiliar with the creed systems, and it will likely be objectionable because of the implication, in tracing the development of the Nicene creed, that a human creed is necessary to union. The author gives a synopsis of the beliefs of some of the larger churches, and also a statement of the belief of the Jews, Mohammedans, Confucianists, Buddhists, and Brahmanists. We cannot understand the purpose of this in a work of this character.

The author suggests that successful "Christian Unity in Effort" demands:

1. A belief in God and the Bible as its fundamental faith.

2. An organized method following the highest development of successful secular effort.

3. Lives of faith in action, demonstrating in love and charity for all an enduring purpose to Christianize the entire world. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott. Pp. 273. $1.50 net.)

A Firm Step Forward at Berkeley, California

The following resolutions were adopted enthusiasticaly by the church of Berkeley, Calif., Sunday, March 24, 184 voting for and 65 against their adoption.

Whereas, we believe that baptism by immersion is the proper and apostolic mode of inducting converts to the teachings of Christ into His Church; and

Whereas, we also believe that all persons who believe in the Divinity of Christ, and who are members of an evangelical Christian Church, of any denomination whatever, are already in His Church: and

Whereas, we believe a practice based upon these principles will be conducive to the union of all Christian people; therefore,

Be it resolved, that this congregation will receive into its membership in full fellowship converts to the teachings of Christ upon a public confession of belief in the Divinity of Christ, and upon being baptized by immersion; and,

Be it further resolved, that it will receive into its membership in full fellowship, regularly accredited members of other evangelical churches who believe in the Divinity of Christ.

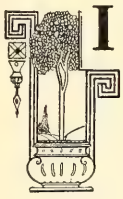
The congregation has a total active membership of about 325. It is stated that if every member in the church had voted the ratio would not have been materially changed. Some idea as to the temper of the church on this subject may be gathered from the vote in the various official bodies of the church. In the board of elders six were in favor of the resolutions, three were opposed, and one was undecided. The entire board of trustees, composed of four leading men, were in favor of the resolutions. The board of deacons, comprising twenty-one men, voted thirteen for and four against, with four noncommittal. The resolutions passed the board of deacons with only four dissenting votes. Out of seven deaconesses five were in favor of the proposed change.

From the above facts it is clear that the step forward by the Berkeley church is no one man affair. It is a movement that has sprung spontaneously from the people. The leading men and women of the church have co-operated intelligently with the pastor in bringing about the result. Among the men who have thus actively co-operated to bring about the change are: C. E. Knox, S. S. McCahill, Ira Sorrick, J. H. Wood, Dr. C. A. Meek, R. A. Berry, J. F. Barbee, Dr. Clark, Professor J. R. Grinstead, Prof. R. B. Abbott, Prof. Wm. Meyer, Howard Kirk, R. E. Johnston, and many others who with their families have been in active sympathy with the proposed change from the beginning. They are people who have been educated at the feet of Disciple leaders in the greatest churches of the middle west. They are described as men who think for themselves, many of them leaders in business and professional life in the Bay region.

In connection with the report of the above data The Christian Century has received a short letter from the pastor, H. J. Loken, interpreting the action, whose publication is inhibited this week by the late moment of its arrival. It will appear next week, together with an editorial comment on the Berkeley situation.

The Christian Century
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The Risen Life



IT IS HIGHLY SIGNIFICANT that the great moral and spiritual experiences of the race have a way of laying hold of some important event in the natural cycle of the seasons and making it their own. In doing so they do not ask permission of authorities, nor are they scrupulous in their employment of facts. They only ask for a common and convenient method of expressing an unusual and deeply impressive emotion.

* * *

Christian joy in the advent of Jesus into the world laid hold of an old festival of the "Triumphant Sun," and turned it into the Christmastide. Hebrew gratitude for deliverance from Egypt seized upon the Spring festival of gladness and turned it into the Passover. The delight in the oncoming Summer with its first fruits of the field formed the basis for the newer joy of the Feast of Weeks, and later still, the Pentecost. The sentiment of thankfulness for gathered blessings has voiced itself among all nations in a festival of the Autumn. But the Jews took it a step further by calling it the Feast of Booths, and they brought it to spiritual significance in its closing ceremonial of the Day of Atonement; while Christian America has appropriated the same Autumn festivity in Thanksgiving Day.

* * *

Easter Day is of the same nature. All nations have joyfully celebrated the opening of Spring with the coming of the birds and flowers, by some public manifestation of happiness. The Passover of the Hebrews and the Feast of Astera among the Scandinavians rested upon the same natural phenomenon, the awakening of the world to new life. But it is neither the exodus from Egypt nor the birth of the goddess which concerns the modern world. It is the return of Jesus to his people. And for the anniversary of this fact the universal Church has chosen the day with a Hebrew history and a heathen name.

* * *

In this manner, a time of only ethnic, or at best naturalistic, significance has gained an immeasurably added value. Not all men believe the story of the opened sepulchre. But there are few, in the lands where the Gospel story has currency, whose pulse does not quicken at the return of the Easter time. And who shall say that it is only the influence of reawakening nature which brings this new animation of hope? Is there not a community of gladness, generated in souls the least touched by the Christian mystery, by the common sentiment of happiness which the thought of the resurrection brings to multitudes of believers? This quite informal and unexpressed message passes from mind to mind as by a social and sympathetic code, at the Easter time.

The story of the resurrection of Jesus was the earliest asset of the faith in its contest with a weary and hesitant world. The manner of that return of Jesus to the circle of the disciples was never very clearly understood nor definitely related. But the truth of the fact, that after the tragedy of the cross he made himself known again to those he had loved and led, was at first a wonder, then a joy unspeakable, and at last a confidence so complete that no danger, persecution or martyrdom could avail to weaken their triumphant faith in its reality. No other poets and dreamers had voiced the hope of a future life. Ancient systems, as old as Egyptian oracles, had outlined a program of the soul's procedure in the dim underworld of shadows. But the resurrection of Jesus laid a new foundation for the hopes of the world, and the Christians of the first and all later ages have walked in the clear light of the life that is life indeed.

* * *

The disciples' belief in the resurrection of their Lord was not based alone upon the evidence of their senses, but rested upon the surer foundation of faith. Their moral sense was no less a factor in bringing them assurance than were their five senses. Their souls cried out against an order of things in the universe that would bring to an end such a life as that they had witnessed in Jesus. Death cannot be so strong as his goodness, his holiness, his love, they said. And so Paul interpreted to all ages this early fundamental faith when he said, "It was not possible for Him to be holden of death." Their moral estimate of Him afforded a basis of probability for the specific evidences of Easter morning. The Easter story will always be taken with a grain of incredulity by those who have not become acquainted with Christ's person. But to those who know Him it would have been a miracle had he indeed been holden of death.

* * *

But the true significance of Easter is deeper and broader still. The future life is a blessing only as its quality is assured. The truly risen life is not that of the future, but of the present. "If ye then be risen with Christ," says Paul, "seek the things which are above." And this rising is no formal thing, such as emergence from the baptismal waters. Far deeper must one look for a satisfying meaning to his words. He himself hastened on, he said, to lay hold of that for which he had been taken hold of by Christ. And this was the risen life, the life of holiness and beauty. To know the Master, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being conformed to his death, was the very means of attaining the goal of the saints, the Risen Life.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Country Minister

In the old days there were two kinds of country ministers. One was the circuit rider who did the pioneer work of the church and rode over vast stretches of the country organizing new churches and cheering little groups of pioneers who had no other religious privileges. The other was the country minister who settled down upon a farm and preached to his neighbors on Sunday, accepting what they were willing to give him. Alexander Campbell was a country minister in his latter days though a circuit rider in the earlier times, always refusing a salary.

The country minister as a resident of the country has well-nigh disappeared. In the state of Missouri it was shown that in three counties there are one hundred and ninety-two ministers with only three residing in the open country. In many cases the village minister lives in a big town and comes in over Sunday to preach his sermons, draw his stipend and depart. In such a situation as this, the minister can be the leader of no social regeneration. His message must be that of individual salvation and future heaven, with little of this world's affairs mixed in. The most valunable asset of the true minister is his life, and this the country people absolutely miss under the present system.

It is going to be hard to induce ministers to live in the open country. It will seem to some like being a missionary to China. It is going to be hard to induce the farmers to provide conditions that will make it possible for ministers to live in the country. It will seem to the farmers that religion is costing too much. There will never be a truly effective country church, however, until the country minister is a resident minister, a prepared minister, sharing the ideals of his people and ready to counsel them not only about the surest road to heaven, but also on certain occasions about the way to bring the largest yield out of their acres. We are catching the vision these days of the ideal country minister, and we shall hope to see ministers prepare themselves for this kind of Christian work.

China Worse Off Than at First Believed

The reports from China indicate that the famine there is worse than we were ready to believe at first. In America where it is almost unknown for one to starve to death and altogether unknown for this to happen with the knowledge and consent of the community, we can scarcely realize a situation where thousands are dying for want of the simplest necessities of life. A recent correspondent writes as follows of conditions there:

"In a district personally examined by the writer during the last week in January, fifty-five homes in a number of country villages in North Kiangsu were thoroughly examined. In only one home in eight was there any rice. The food everywhere found in preparation consisted of sweet potato leaves and carrot tops, while one family in three was eating elm bark. In these fifty-five homes four dead were found, and many others who could live only a few days at most. In this district at least two out of three are certain of death unless there is help from outside—and there are still four months before harvest. These conditions are typical of the whole North Kiangsu famine area, where missionaries, who for many years have been thoroughly familiar with conditions, estimate that 1,000,000 people are facing starvation.

"Whenever there is any question as to the reality of famine conditions, test work is offered by the Central China Famine Relief Committee at such a low wage that only those who are in great need will apply. This plan has been used in two places, and the great numbers who have come and remained at work, indicate the severity of the conditions. As a general thing there is in China no possibility of question concerning the desperate need of the people in the famine districts."

The Beef Trust Wins a Decision

The newsboys outside are crying the startling news that the government has been defeated in its prosecution of the beef trust. The decision had been expected to be in favor of the people rather than of the corporation magnates. There is surprise, sorrow, indignation, resentment and more being expressed in the street as the citizens receive the news. The machinery of justice has spent ten years in investigating the case of the packers. There have been halts in the work at times, there have been legal surprises sprung on both sides, but the evidence stands in the records of the courts as clear as day. The beef trust was tried before the American people and long since condemned. Why this decision?

Most of us are not corporation lawyers. We do not presume to attack courts or juries. Since we are all of us thinking beings at times, however, we cannot help asking questions. Is it possible to send a rich man to jail? We ask this as we remember the fate of Harry Thaw as compared with that of the murderers of the truck farmer in Chicago. Were the packers legally innocent though morally guilty? Or have they over-awed those who had the case in hand with the power of their billion dollar corporation? Is the Sherman act sufficiently stringent or does it need amendment? If it is sufficient, why are we not able to secure convictions under it of the greatest offenders?

The evidence brought out in the trial showed that the National Packing Company was made up of the leading packers of Chicago: the Swifts, Armours, Cudahy and some others. This central company assigned territory to the different corporations in such a way as to eliminate competition. The National Packing Company fixed the price for buying and the price for selling. A former employe testified of the secret meetings of the confederates in this hold-up game. The prosecution, when asked what they thought of the decision, said that the evidence would stand in the records of the court, as a testimony to future generations. We hope this evidence may yet bring some results in this generation.

Eliminating the Middle-Man

Among the various reasons assigned for the present high cost of living is the increase of middle men who take a profit from the produce of the farmer. Apples often rot in orchards within a hundred miles of Chicago because they will not yield a profit to all the middle men involved in the process. A buyer secures the supplies from the farmer. He sells these through a commission house to a jobber, who in turn sells them to a wholesaler, who sells to the grocer, who delivers the supplies to the consumer. Five profits are to be figured before the producer's material reaches the ultimate consumer, and since on perishable goods the percentage of profit is high, the ultimate cost of the goods is often several times what it should be.

One of the ways of bridging this gap between producer and consumer is the municipal market, such as is maintained in Indianapolis. The organization of grocers always fights the inauguration or maintenance of such a market. In those cities where the market is maintained, however, the farmers get more for their goods, and the small consumer who is willing to carry goods home, makes a large saving. In the state of Iowa this past year, one city was paying twice as much for potatoes as another. One city had the municipal market, the other did not.

Another way of meeting the problem is through the co-operative grocery. This is an English idea, but it is taking root in America, and these stores are to be found now in a number of American cities. One of the most ambitious attempts is that of the U. S. Co-operative Company, which is organized under the laws of Wisconsin. This company is assured of democratic control by giving each stockholder one vote without regard to his holdings of stock. The stock draws interest but no dividends. The amount of one's purchases determines the dividends. This enterprise has the endorsement of some very prominent business men and of Prof. Henderson, of the University of Chicago. We shall watch the outcome with much interest.

We are told of lace weavers that they do the most delicate and beautiful work when the spinner is himself in total darkness, and his pattern only in strong light. Here is a subject for reflection: and upon reflection, does it not bring comfort and peace to the Christian worker? How much of his life is spent in shadow, if sorrow, suffering, or some other form of trial be his lot! Christ our great Pattern is passed into the heavens. Jesus the Son of God. We hear Him say in His Gospel, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me." He was lifted up upon the Cross. His church lifts Him up above the altar; He draws all men unto Him. Our comfort, then, is that though we dwell in the shadow at times, it is our part to keep our eye fixed upon our great Pattern, who Himself is Light: and when He shall appear, we shall be like upon Him.—The Living Church.

Not in the clamour of the crowded streets, not in the shouts and plaudits of the throng; but in ourselves are triumph and defeat.—Longfellow.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Unity Through the Primitive Church

In a recent number of the Churchman there is a notable editorial growing out of a contribution of Professor Sanday's to The Contemporary Review, in which he tells of the light thrown on the origin and working of episcopacy in early times by C. H. Turner, a distinguished layman of the English Church, which may be summed up as follows:

"If it is true that in the first century the apostle-founder and the community as founded by him are the two outstanding elements of Christian organization, it is no less true that in the second century the twin ideas of bishop and people attain a prominence which throws all subordinate distinctions into the background."

Following this Mr. McBee, the editor, writes on "The Persuasive Power of an Efficient Ministry," discussing the relations of Presbyterian, Congregational and Episcopal forms of government, and the validities of ministries and sacraments. He says:

It is not likely that either Congregationalism or Presbyterianism will abandon its present position simply because a few scholars are taking a better rounded view of Christian antiquity than ever before. But it is true that the possessions of scholarship to-day become the common gain of everyone tomorrow, and it is also true that the episcopate itself, if its autocrat and feudal elements are sloughed off, will win the sympathies of Congregationalists and Presbyterians to an unexpected degree. Such results have been reached already in the episcopate of the American Church, and Dr. Sanday speaks with telling force of the power of the Anglican Church to reform itself by a closer adjustment to its tasks and burdens.

Dr. Sanday's frankness goes even to the length of discussing the validity of ministries and sacraments in a divided Christendom as they may be determined under the fullest historical tests. He is bound to win assent when he says that it is scarcely admissible for one Christian body to take upon itself to pronounce upon the validity or otherwise of the ministrations of another. He deprecates introducing such a problem into general public discussion. If discussed at all, it should be by dispassionate experts. No good can come from the canvassing by one party of the ultimate credentials of another. There is the danger of encouraging self-complacency and censoriousness on the part of the judge, and of opening up old sources of bitterness on the side of the party at the bar. The broad general question of the validity of a particular ministry, Dr. Sanday thinks no human tribunal is really competent to judge. Instead of speaking of the validity or invalidity of a ministry, he suggests that the issues involved and the limitations of man's knowledge would be better recognized if some particular form of ministry was called ineffective rather than invalid. "God alone knows what accumulation of defects constitutes invalidity."

Such conclusions as these are altogether practical and should be helpful in promoting the cause of reunion. By those who hold, as Churchmen must do, the historical episcopate as one of the dearest and most beneficent forms of their tradition, Dr. Sanday's final counsel needs to be most carefully heeded. The historic episcopate has been too often, he holds, presented as a dogma. This sharp and short way with opponents oftener alienates than attracts. The better method of putting the claims of the episcopate in a concrete rather than in an abstract form is certain to conciliate. His motto for those who defend episcopacy is, "Clothe it in flesh and blood;" that is, seek not so much to win assent to an abstract proposition—the episcopate—as to bring the divided members of Christ under the terms of a pastoral supervision by which they can live more truly and realize more perfectly the association of a divine brotherhood.

"Is Religious Faith Declining?"

This is the subject of a noteworthy address given by Bishop Greer of New York at a meeting of men in that city who listened to addresses covering three hours and a half. Other speakers were Fred B. Smith; the Rev. John F. Carson, moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly of the United States; Dr. Rudolph Grosseman, rabbi of Temple Rodoplph Sholom; the Rev. Edward Gregory Fitzgerald, a Roman priest; and Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, moderator of the National Council of Congregationalist Churches. Joined to the principal address were the questions, "If so, What Are the Causes?" "What Will Be the Effect upon the Life of the Republic?" "What is the Remedy?" The following synopsis of Bishop Greer's address from the Living Church will repay a careful perusal:

Bishop Greer thought the question might have been put, "Is Religious Faith Advancing?" The answer would be in the affirmative, and no remedy would be sought. As the question stood, the answer from statistics would always be unsatisfactory. Full and accurate statistical information was hard to get. But Church membership was growing faster than the population. From his own observation, attendance at church was not falling off. When the question is asked, "Why don't the people (or the men) go to church?" the answer is, "They do go." All never did, but many do now. In accepting the statistics of church attendance at any given period in any given locality it may be asked, Is such attendance the result or the outcome of religious faith? Is it from the best and purest motives? How much discount must we allow on account of social, conventional, and other considerations? It must always be remembered that figures are not of the first importance. The question must be approached in some other and better way. We must study other documents than mere statistics and figures. He would present three manuscripts. First, the great political manuscript spread before the American people. A great writer has said that all political questions become, sooner or later, social questions; such in turn become religious questions. At the first transition we stand to-day. Political questions are becoming socialized as never before. In the history of this republic the whole trend of events is toward the welfare and the betterment of society at large. The tendency cannot stop at this point. Why must we be interested in the welfare of society? What is the social imperative? Here we come to questions of religion. Here we are coming to-day. The fact that this religious question is on the programme of a political club is a sign that political-social questions are passing into religion. In dreaming and planning for better things to come, we find that we cannot keep God out of this manuscript.

The second is the philosophic or scientific manuscript. It is a fact that the best modern philosophy is not materialistic but spiritualistic. Professor Tyndall's philosophy of the "potency of all life" has fallen beneath the new and better spiritualistic hypotnesis. We cannot keep God out of true philosophy.

The third is the manuscript of human nature. The image of God is indelibly stamped upon man. It is most ubiquitous. The religious instinct—the instinct of God—no age can get rid of. We cannot get rid of it. "I have no misgiving for the religious faith of the future," said the Bishop. "A man, so the story goes, was falling down from the fifth story of his house. When he reached the third story he said, 'I am all right so far.' While optimistic, let us beware of the blind optimism which foregoes effort. The effort is making in the Men and Religion Forward Movement. A seeming fall will land us fairly, squarely, more squarely upon religious faith. Experience has shown us that man cannot get on without it."

Pastoral Limit on Again, Perhaps

Methodist Spring conferences, just starting at the middle of this month, will show, it is said, a marked change of sentiment from last fall in the matter of a restoration of the pastoral time limit. For two or three years ministers in the smaller churches have been gaining strength in favor of their contention, while ministers of the large churches have done little. A few have written magazine articles opposing the change. The prediction is now heard that many conferences, particularly those in the East, will overwhelmingly favor the memorial. It is said the New York, the New York East and the Newark conferences, meeting March 27, will so vote.

The limit to Methodist pastorates was taken off by the General Conference of 1900, meeting in Chicago. Able men finding themselves in strong charges, have been content to keep them, and the people for the most part content to have them do so. The average pastorate has not, however, increased much in length. The stand patters point to this fact, while those who want a limit again say dissatisfied men in smaller charges have changed oftener and so prevented the expected increase. The charge is made by those clamoring for the limit that the machine sustains the old men. They say an open field, such as other communions offer, is fairer than the present Methodist plan. The General Conference to which the memorials will go, meets in Minneapolis in May.

A chief argument in 1900 for the removal of the pastoral time limit was to meet conditions in large cities. It was said that where population changes rapidly, Methodism must furnish one stable official in the pastor of its church. The beneficial effect has been small, it is said, and it is from the large cities that the clamor for restoration of the limit now chiefly comes.

—Rev. Frederick Day of the Episcopal church, was killed by mutinous soldiers in China during the late uprising.

—The Second Avenue Baptist Church, New York City, is located in the midst of a foreign population, and has sixteen services each Sunday in eight different languages.

—Dr. C. F. Aked silenced a report that he had decided to resign his pastorate, as follows: "San Francisco has received me with open arms, and I have taken San Francisco to my heart. In California I have found the real American. I cannot for my life understand the suggestion that I am dissatisfied. A man who would be dissatisfied here ought to be sent to Siberia. I have abundant reason to be thankful for the success that is attending my work, and at the present moment the deacons and trustees of my church are discussing a tremendous forward step. We are likely to build here the church of which I dreamed in New York."

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

Bringing in the Sheaves

Nature and man penalize the sinner. Disease and loss of efficiency are marks of nature's displeasure. Restraint and exclusion from privileges and opportunities testify to man's attitude toward bad actions. We may accept these penalties as warnings. There is something wrong in the conduct that invites them. By giving heed to light penalties imposed for first offences we may learn much that will be of value in directing our conduct.

The critics of Jesus were right in assuming that offenders against the purity of the home and the supporters of tyranny should be reminded of their sins. Jesus never taught anybody to ignore the distinction between right and wrong nor did he teach that men should withhold their condemnation from evil-doers. His critics were wrong in assuming that he encouraged publicans and sinners in their bad ways. They seem to have been satisfied when they had excluded from their ranks those whose conduct was offensive to them. Jesus was impelled to seek the restoration of outcasts to self-respect and to public esteem.

The practice of forgiveness is difficult. To condemn is easy. We are ever ready to visit with wrath any one who happens to sin against us. We magnify the sins of all who hinder our ambitions or disturb our ease. It may not be hard to deal gently with others when their faults are not troublesome to us. But to abhor sin because it hurts another as well as ourselves and to long for the rescue of the sinner seems to be extremely difficult for many of us. This means that we have but partially learned the mind of Christ.

The Pharisee and the Scribe murmured because Jesus received sinners and ate with them; the church has been most highly honored when she has followed this example of her Lord. The rough hand of organized religion has ever been throwing upon the scrap heap valuable human material. Jesus recovered much of this material and he set his followers the task of watching for what the generations to come might needlessly throw away, that they might restore it to its proper place and use. The disciples must decline to accept the hasty verdict of a group of formalists respecting the possibilities of any class of human beings.

"Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" I do not suppose Jesus meant to ask whether there would be forms and ceremonies and creeds when the Son of man came. These may exist without faith. He doubtless was inquiring about the faith that overcomes the world. Do we believe enough in God to help others to faith in him? Can we speak to the defeated and awaken hope in their hearts? Faith of this sort will create the machinery it needs. Machinery without it is worse than useless, it mocks the hopeless and grieves the sincere.

The preparation of the church for its ministry is a more important work than the preparation of the preacher for his ministry. The former includes the latter. The intellectual and moral standards of the preacher can never be made too high. He who speaks the word of life loses by ignorance and gains by intelligence. His message is a farce if unsupported by a godly life. It is also a farce to the community if unsupported by an honest and efficient church. It is the business of the church to plan for the evangelizing of its neighborhood. The preacher is its representative.

Is the church of America able to make disciples of all the races and peoples that are coming to America? Here is a test of her faith and wisdom. If she wins the victory, her power and glory will be great. If she loses, she will be despised at home and abroad. Success commands respect. Men who win in the lesser enterprises of life receive credit therefor. We admire the successful ball player. It is difficult to withhold admiration from the skilful gambler. The people of America have a right to have before their eyes successful churches. It should be the ambition of the disciples of Jesus to plant and strengthen churches in every community so that every boy and girl in the land will have the opportunity of knowing Christianity at its best. Well supported ball teams, well built homes, well housed schools, and meanly supported and meanly equipped churches remove the church from the number of institutions that powerfully influence thought and action. We must therefore exalt the church, not so much by praising it as by equipping it and setting it to its proper task. [Midweek Service, April 10. Luke 15:1-10.] S. J.

Not By Bread Alone

A LENTEN STUDY.

It is a notable feature of the temptation of our Lord, that in the moments of crisis, when all the future depended on the choice to be made, it was in the words of Holy Scripture that the decision was announced. It was as if Jesus would have his disciples and all men know that in the supreme literature of the religious life, the roll of the Book of God, he had found what all men might find, the sanctions of the higher life and the words in which those sanctions have been most fittingly recorded.

* * *

The Scriptures of which Jesus made use to comfort and fortify his soul among the lonely hills were the familiar documents which we know as the Old Testament, but which all Jews know, as Jesus knew them, as comprising the whole of the Sacred Word. They were the theme of household instruction and of day-school discipline in Palestine. They shared their sanctity only with the temple, that holy House which to the Jew was the joy of the whole earth.

* * *

It is true that the Hebrews of the classic period treated their slowly-forming Scriptures with great freedom, and that Jesus shared this untrammeled spirit to the degree that he passed frequent and caustic criticism upon the ethics and religious ideals of these books. Yet they were to him, as to the best men of his race, a source of comfort, direction and inspiration. He quoted from them on many occasions to confirm as well as to correct their teachings, and any book that Jesus thought it worth while to treasure in his heart, to revere and recommend to his contemporaries, and to summon to his own assistance in time of need cannot fail to possess significance for all men.

* * *

It is a notable fact that while Jesus quoted from many portions of the Hebrew Scriptures in the process of his teaching, all the words chosen by him in the time of his temptation were from the Book of Deuteronomy. And this was singularly appropriate. For that book enshrined most of the treasured memorials of Moses, the great leader of Israel's earlier years, the traditional fashioner of all its institutes of civil and religious life. These fragments of Mosaic instruction, wrought into new and convincing form by the persecuted priests and prophets of the dark days of Manasseh, had furnished the basis of the greatest reformation ever organized in Israel, and formed the most impressive section of the sacred Torah, the pride of every Jewish heart.

* * *

It was fitting that from that arsenal of the past Jesus should chosen by him in the time of his temptation were from the book of Moses or Josiah had ever known. For the temptations which he met wore the grace of plausible appeal, and even adorned themselves with the words of Scripture. For the suggestion that the Father's love might be tested by an act of impressive self-abandonment to the high purpose of proving his leadership, summoned to its aid the psalmist's message of assurance. "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." But Jesus knew what all the centuries have proved, that

"The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose,
An evil soul, producing holy witness,
Is like a villain with a smiling cheek,
A goodly apple, rotten at the heart."

With the words, "It is written," referring, as the phrase always did, to the sacred Writings of the past, Jesus met every suggestion of evil. Nor was it essential that the passages he quoted should refer to situations parallel with his own at that moment. They were all drawn from wells deep enough to contain the water of life. They were all fruits on the tree of life, whose roots run down to the foundations of the world, and whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

* * *

"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every utterance of the mouth of God." So said the leader that brought the nation through the wilderness. There the supply of food seemed the very gift of God. And yet it was not to be compared to the divine direction brought to them in the long marches of the desert or by some outgushing fountain by the way. There must be food for the world. But the saints have ever counted it less necessary than the divine presence. "One must live," is the saying by which men apologize for numberless compromises with truth and duty. Not so have the heroes believed, and the world is rich because of the faith of such as counted not their lives dear if they could but win life.

* * *

"Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." Israel had trifled with the divine commands, trying the patience of their God, venturing as near as possible to the dead-line of destruction. It was to bring them back to wholesome and whole-hearted devotion to the program of purity and progress that the mandate had gone forth.

* * *

Now in even a more tragic time, when the temptation to make proof of the Father's affection mingled with the wish to try the effect of a portent upon the popular mind, Jesus, deeply moved and struggling with a great peril, reached out for this word of counsel from the past, and stayed his soul upon it. It is the word that should rise to the minds of all who are tempted to venture to the edge of danger, in the ill-founded belief that some watching providence may stay them from the abyss. Few walk deliberately into folly and ruin. It is the venturesome step, that goes a little further, tempting God, that passes one day the line from which there is no stainless return.

* * *

"Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." It was in a day when Jehovah had to contest every measure of ground with the gods of the heathen, that these words were first uttered. But time has taught the lesson that there are other idolatries than those which set up gods of wood and stone. Jesus was tempted to exchange the lofty ideals of the nation and the world for a political success which might have been a vast improvement upon the prevailing conditions, but would have ended in a compromise at best, and failed to reach his hopes. And to-day men are setting up the idols of the market place, or the capitol, or the social arena, and dethroning the God to whom their lives belong. And all the more pathetic is the fact that too often this unhappy exchange is made without disarranging the conventions and proprieties of their church membership.

* * *

Jesus met his temptations in the spirit and the inspiring companionship of the great saints of the past. In that holy company one can do all that the ideal demands. For the words of Scripture meant to him no formal quoting of oracular words, but the deliberate entrance into the charmed circle where the powers that war against the soul are robbed of strength to harm. And in that circle, with him, it is the privilege and high obligation of the child of God to abide.

"Easter is the day of joy in immortality, revealed on earth in the rising from the dead of our Lord Jesus Christ. His life is the assurance and, indeed, the only assurance for his disciples of the continuance of earth's life beyond the tomb. So vital is it, and so joy-bringing, that it has changed the thought of the whole world of Christendom from doubt to confidence that man is an immortal being and that immortality may become the highest of our gains. It was a hope. It has become an inspiration for the imagination and a motive for right living and patience in renunciation and postponement."

The Tragedy of the Backward Look

In a former article I showed that dissent from The Christian Century's affirmations which have always been regarded as representative teaching of the Disciples on the subject of their attitude toward unimmersed believers, was at variance with the teaching of Alexander Campbell and his biographer, Dr. Richardson. These great men opposed that class of men among us who attempted to make the church universal identical with the congregations of the Disciples, and reprobated all such efforts as inconsistent and unworthy of our plea. That fact remains, if history have any meaning.

In line with our preceding article I wish to show the position of Isaac Errett and James S. Lamar on the question of the Disciples' attitude toward brethren of other households of faith. Some dissenters may have conceived the idea that its tolerance was a heretical attitude of The Christian Century; such should be apprised of the fact that it was a reaffirmation of our entire history.

Our references are to the first volume of Lamar's Memoirs of Isaac Errett.

Concerning the temper of some of the Disciples, after the death of Mr. Campbell, toward those of different communions, Mr. Lamar tells us that it was controversial, and that "the truth was viewed in controversial aspects." Moreover, the spirit of controversy "developed and cultivated an unlovely spirit towards other Christians, and it gradually seduced those who indulged in it away from the true and original basis of the Disciples' plea." Let us hear him:

> They became isolated in feeling as well as in fact; their opponents began to be regarded, not as erring Christian brethren, but as enemies, enemies to them and enemies to the truth. After a while they not only called their own several congregations "churches of Christ," which was doubtless true, but they contemplated all of them in mental aggregation as "the Church of Christ," or, sometimes, "the Christian Church," which it is much to be hoped was not the truth. Presently, as we shall hereafter see more fully developed, lines of communion and fellowship began to be drawn in accordance with this lofty assumption, and thenceforth any utterance on the part of these brethren looking to Christian union could be regarded only as conspicuously inconsistent. (Vol. i, p. 226.)

Is Mr. Lamar speaking to the past or to the present? He is doing both. Is he rebuking the narrowness that would include all our churches "in mental aggregation" as the Church of Christ, of the period of which he speaks, or of our day? He is performing a double service. Is he proud of that spirit which would make our churches exclusively churches of Christ? On the contrary, he deprecates that spirit and earnestly hopes its view is not the truth. The dissenters affirm that the exclusive attitude is the position of the Disciples; Lamar affirms that such position is "a lofty assumption." He further avers that "lines of fellowship and communion began to be drawn in accordance with this assumption."

The year 1862 witnessed the great communion controversy with Lard's quarterly on one side and the Harbinger on the other. It was the old question of open or close communion. Could we commune with the pious unimmersed? Let the heavens be one huge ear to hear such a momentous question discussed! And yet some of our representative men by turning back the dial of progress have compelled us to discuss one equally trivial. The advocates of restricted communion were Moses E. Lard, Benjamin Franklin, and George W. Elley. Those who opposed them were Professor Pendleton, Dr. Robert Richardson, and Isaac Errett—as might have been expected. These latter believed "that there had always been a people of God in Babylon." Referring to these in his first article, Mr. Errett said:

> We incline to the opinion that most of them were unimmersed. They were, in many respects, an erring people—in regard to baptism they were certainly in great error; but they feared God and wrought righteousness; and—what seems as great a stumbling block to many good men now, as it was to Peter until the trammels of sectarianism were knocked off—"in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." At one and another trumpet call of reformation, multitudes came forth from Babylon. They did not reach Jerusalem. But they wrought great deeds for God and for his Word. They talked much and suffered much for the name of Christ. We inherit the blessed fruits of their labors. We follow them through the scenes of their superhuman toil, to the dungeon where they suffered, and to the stakes where they won the glories of martyrdom, and whence they ascended in chariots of fire to the heavens; and as we embrace the chains they wore, and take up the ashes from the altar-fires of spiritual freedom, we ask not whether these lofty heroes of the church militant, to whom we owe our heritage of spiritual freedom, may commune with us—but rather, if we are at all worthy to commune with them! We feel honored in being permitted to call them brethren. Our reformation movement is the legitimate offspring of theirs. Neither in Pennsylvania, where the Campbells and Scott began, nor in Kentucky, where Stone and others led the van of reformation did this movement spring from Baptist, but from Pedo-baptist influences. It is the legitimate result of Pedo-baptist learning, piety, and devotion. Unless we can recognize a people of God among these heroical, struggling, sacrificing hosts of Protestants, from which we have legitimately sprung, then the promise of Christ in regard to his church has failed; since, if we insist on the rigid test of the letter of the gospel conditions, no such people as the Disciples can be found for many centuries. But of this people of God of whom we speak, we affirm that they loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. They loved and magnified his word. They possessed his Spirit—manifesting it in very precious fruits of righteousness and holiness. The spirit of obedience dwelt not less in them than in us. They erred in regard to the letter of baptism, even as it may yet be found that we have erred in regard to the letter of other requirements. We felt the need of further reformation. We have seen the mischievous and wicked tendencies of the sect-spirit and life. We have eschewed it. We invite all who love the Saviour to a scriptural basis of union. We do not, meanwhile, deny nor refuse their prayers, their songs, their exhortations, nor their sympathy with truth and goodness. Whilst we cannot endorse their position nor their practice, as lacking immersion, and as practicing infant rantism, but lift up a loud and constant voice against it—we must still deal with them as Christians in error, and seek to right them. To ignore their faith and obedience and to deal with them as heathen men and publicans will be indeed to "weaken the hands" of pleaders for reformation, and expose ourselves, by a judgment of extreme narrowness and harshness, to the pitcq, if not the scorn, of good men everywhere." (Vol. i, p. 251.)

That document is representative enough for me. The italics throughout are as in the Memoirs. Evidently Mr. Lamar in thus stating Mr. Errett's position had no sympathy with such views as our dissenters. Note a few sentences: "We ask not whether . . . . they may commune with us, but rather, if we are at all worthy to commune with them!" "We feel honored in being permitted to call them brethren." "Unless we can recognize a people of God among these heroical, struggling, sacrificing hosts of Protestants, from whom we have legitimately sprung, then the promise of Christ in regard to his church has failed; since, if we insist on the rigid test of the letter of the gospel conditions, no such people as the Disciples can be found for many centuries." "To ignore their faith and obedience and to deal with them as heathen men and publicans will be indeed to 'weaken the hands' of pleaders for reformation, and expose ourselves, by a judgment of extreme narrowness and harshness, to the pity, if not the scorn, of good men everywhere."

We hope all the dissenting brethren will let that closing sentence sink into their hearts. Ostensibly, Isaac Errett was dealing with the communion question; he was in fact dealing with the exclusive doctrine, of which close communion logically became an issue. The same conclusion that was "extreme narrowness and harshness" in Isaac Errett's day, is just as narrow and as harsh today. It is even worse, if such a thing be possible, for there is less justification for such view now. History should have taught us its lessons. If the earlier exclusionists would have exposed us "to the pity, if not the scorn, of good men everywhere," what of the later? If these things be done in the green tree what shall be done in the dry?

No man can compel the Disciples to re-write their history nor to believe that they understand Mr. Campbell better than he understood himself, that they understand our plea better than W. K. Pendleton, Dr. Richardson, or Isaac Errett; they could never convince those who are familiar with our history that our fathers bequeathed to us a narrow and a cruel creed with reference to Christian people who differ from us in the matter of baptism. The views that the dissenters have expressed concerning unimmersed believers, if adopted by any considerable number of our people, would turn back the dial of our progress, make our plea a jest in the eyes of Christendom, and disappoint the sanguine hopes of thousands who thus far have devoted their lives to the work of restoring apostolic Christianity. That they have no desire to do our cause so great an injury, we cheerfully admit. Neither had those who would have made us close communionists; they thought they were doing God service. But the fact remains that they have inflicted upon our people a wound which long time alone can heal. Had they deliberately planned our doom, they could not have chosen a more effective method than the one which is now a matter of record. The fact that every sectarian in our ranks is hailing these men as the champions of their cause, and that the anti-organs are not likely to shed tears over their utterances, should furnish food for reflection for all interested.

On this subject of our relation to other religious peoples, I have taken the liberty to supplement what The Christian Century has already said, and to place myself on record. I have spoken plainly because I have felt deeply. But my appeal has been to the facts of our history as recorded in the Memoirs of Alexander Campbell and the Memoirs of Isaac Errett. If our dissenting brethren wish confirmation for their position they can find an abundance of it on the pages of the Octographic Review and the Firm Foundation. My appeal has been to the living forces which have saved us from the peril of anti-ism; their appeal must be to the graveyards where ephemeral and party issues are buried. I have wondered at the recrudescence of that spirit which would translate us again to those unseemly days when the rigid were the orthodox and Isaac Errett was the heretic. I can account for it in no other way than that the greatest and best men are likely at any time to become the victims of that sectarian interpretation of our plea, which seems to be a constant peril for all who advocate it. That interpretation will ruin the cause of Christian unity. The strength of the dissenters cannot save the Disciples from its baleful effects, any more than could the strength of others in former belligerent periods. The brethren of these restricted views are in error. Alexander Campbell is against them, Dr. Robert Richardson is against them, Isaac Errett is against them, James S. Lamar is against them; one hundred years of our history is against them; and I believe that Almighty God is against them. Cruel, exclusive, narrow, and belittling views of Himself, or of those who are trying to do His will, can never be pleasing to Him.

While this confusion lasts into which we have been thrown by this tragedy of the backward look, let those of us who believe in the breadth and inclusiveness of our plea, keep our faces to the future; let us welcome every opportunity to show our brethren who love our Lord in those churches with which we are seeking closer fellowship, that we disapprove of any harsh and uncharitable views concerning their election of God; let us rejoice that it is our high privilege to journey with them to the heavenly Canaan; and that in doing these things we are holding fast to the ideals and to the spirit of our fathers. To those who persevere in a contrary course we commend the following from the pen of Isaac Errett at the close of the "close communion" controversy:

"It has now become a question, growing out of the peculiar logic employed by these brethren, whether we shall have any religious fellowship whatever with any outside our own churches? Whether we shall not outvie the Old Landmark Baptists themselves in exclusiveness, and make ourselves ridiculous before the whole religious world by the monstrous extravagance of our assumptions?"

Richmond, Ky. E. B. B.

At the Door

I thought myself indeed secure,
So fast the door, so firm the lock;
But lo! he toddling came to lure
My parent ears with timorous knock.

My heart were stone could it withstand
The sweetness of my baby's plea—
That timorous, baby knocking and
"Please let me in—it's only me."

I threw aside the unfinished book,
Regardless of its tempting charms,
And opening wide the door, I took
My laughing darling in my arms.

Who knows but in eternity,
I, like a truant child, shall wait
The glories of a life to be Beyond the Heavenly Father's gate?

And will that Heavenly Father heed
The truant's supplicating cry,
As at the outer door I plead,
"'Tis I! O, Father; only I?"

—Eugene Field.

—The church of Christ throughout its history has believed with one of its most accomplished poets that "God reveals himself in many ways." Wherever the human spirit reaches out after the divine there is the answering voice of God. In human history, in the progress of the sciences, in the development of social consciousness, in the aspirations of the mystics, in the efforts of all seekers after God there has been the enlargement of human knowledge of the divine, and of the divine self-disclosure to man.

—Sunday, April 28, has been set apart by the Men and Religion Forward Movement as Conservation Day for men and boys. A call has been issued by the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, asking our churches to fittingly observe the day, and a program is suggested. Hundreds of our churches should observe the day. There is no more promising field of activity than work among men and boys.

Interpretations

Loss or Gain?

The following extract is taken from a letter written by one of our Disciple college presidents:

"An alarming situation now confronts the church! According to the most complete and reliable statistics available, the Christian Church in the United States has only 5,565 preachers to supply our 10,940 churches. During the past five years (1906-11), we sustained a net loss of 1,043 preachers, 405 of these being lost in 1911. We have in all our colleges 1,021 students preparing for the ministry. But as 371 of these are already preaching, the reserve supply is only 650. Of this number not more than 175 annually complete their preparation and enter the field. The increase in our ministry is, therefore, by no means equal to the loss by death and retirement.

Result: Many long-established churches are dying, and a large number of destitute fields are untouched, not to mention the loud calls for preachers for foreign lands."

I wonder what is the full significance of these figures: Do they reveal tendencies that are altogether bad? Certainly this is an age when the commercial spirit is all too dominant. However, even in the commercial world there are many indications that the ideal life is beginning to assert itself. But, still, it is true that young men are not so mightily gripped by a call to the ministry as they once were. One reason of this is that the denominational conscience is far less keen today than it was a generation ago. The age has become vastly more humanitarian. Many long established churches are dying because they were born out of sectarian controversy rather than out of human need. It is therefore natural that they would not survive in an unsectarian age. Never before has the law of the survival of the fittest been so ruthlessly applied to our churches. Thousand of little burgs each built in the days of heated dogmatism several churches, which were never adequately supported, and which in these days of an increasing spirit of unity find their excuse for persisting still more impossible.

* * *

Here as everywhere God seems to be bringing progress out of death. We poor mortals learn God's lessons slowly. Perhaps in the death of many churches the kingdom of God is making tremendous strides forward. In this way God is compelling his people to join in a common Zion. The church of the future will not represent Knox or Wesley, but the common humanity of the community. It will not be founded on the doctrines of Calvin or Luther, but upon the aspirations of the people whom it seeks to serve. The one foundation, Christ Jesus, will not be sectarianized as it has been in the past.

We are just now in the vision state. We have not applied the vision yet. Everybody agrees with what I have said above; but nobody is actively applying the truth. We are not, in spirit, disobedient to the heavenly vision; we simply do not know how to make practical use of it. We are waiting on time to show us. When we move in our eagerness to serve the age-spirit, we cause wreckage We set out to unite and we are surprised and disheartened because our efforts have led to division. So we are in a waiting time, waiting on time. Is "time" intelligent? Yes. It is God's mind and man's mind coming into unison. It is the Holy Spirit in the background moulding conditions and asserting itself with commands that must be obeyed when the right hour strikes. The lion-hearted both help and hinder time. Revolutions get the credit for progress often when patience and evolution would have as surely brought the results, and with less loss.

* * *

The young men of this day are not appealed to by a ministry in a town greatly over-churched. No sane man today believes in his heart of hearts that only those of his fellowship are going to heaven. Beneath all of our professions and pleas is the age-conviction of God's love and man's worth. It is this conviction that grips us. It is out of this age-thought that life today will issue its "Call" to young men. And as yet, only here and there can Jesus' plea for a united church be made effective; God is not calling as many young men to the ministry as formerly. Is it presumptuous to say He is biding His time? He is disciplining us in this waiting period. Some day, and that not far hence, He will thunder forth such calls to young men as will startle his church into a tremendous forward faith.

I wish all our Missionary Societies could so read His mind. In every community I have lived, some Missionary Society has been wasting the Lord's money by keeping alive a church or churches that ought to be allowed to die. They were not needed by the community and therefore ought not to be needed by the denomination. I wonder if that religious journal was right in its suggestion that, except in the frontier communities the missionary boards ought to agree to give no help? Perhaps that is a radical step we are not yet prepared to advocate; but that it is an ideal to strive for I verily believe. I doubt not that if we could read the records of the Kingdom, their entries would be quite different from our records. When our representative writes "One church lost," the omniscient secretary might record, "A great gain made."

I covet the spirit in our churches wished for by the author of the extract quoted above, and heartily support his endeavor: but the church will not come to its own until it works more fully in God's way.

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Hannibal.

Editorial Table Talk

Sinning Against Conventionalities

A correspondent in one of the large denominational journals is scandalized by the prevalence of "Tom Thumb" weddings in churches, particularly the Methodist churches which have had more than their share of these performances, it would seem. The correspondent pities "the poor children who were so profanely used for money-making purposes."

What would he say if we showed him a telegram in one of our papers announcing the startling intelligence that a certain evangelist in our ranks was the 'greatest harp player in the world?' And what would be his consternation upon learning that the harp was a mouth-organ! That 'the greatest in the world,' covers a deal of territory. Whoever sent such a report in cannot be aware of the unmeasured acres of harmonica melodies that waste their sweetness on the desert air. Well may we exclaim, "Lord, who hath believed our report!"

Now the danger in such reports is their deception. One not acquainted with the facts might conclude that the harp referred to was an Italian harp; and that if an impressario reading the telegram in some musical center of Europe, hied himself across the Atlantic and the prairies of the West, seeking a wonder-worker whose name had not even been heard in harpist circles! Imagine said collector of artists being confronted with a performance on this kinsman of the jews-harp! Drop the curtain, please!

If the correspondent referred to fell foul of the practice of having the boys whistle hymns in church, what would he say of the use of that plebian harp? Angels and ministers of grace defend us!

With all such criticisms we find ourselves in sympathy. There are proprieties in a sacred service that ought to be observed in all good conscience. Our zeal in money making, and in the pious endeavor to interest people in the work of the church amounts, at times, to a profanation because of the means we employ. There are boundaries to the very best of intentions. The madness of crowds is upon us, and in our haste to add names to the roster we may elbow out some who are worth more than those who are coming in. In any case, the command to let all things be done decently and in order has as divine a sanction back of it as many others which receive a great deal more attention.

A Tireless Reformer

Since childhood many of us have been familiar with the name of Anthony Comstock. At that period and many subsequent periods he has either been in a fight, or has been fighting some of the enemies of the country. But he never knew what it meant to surrender. He has gone through seas of trouble of various kinds, through fires of criticism, and is to-day at a ripe old age as undaunted in his life's work as when he struck the first blow at vice, forty years ago.

Under his leadership the Society for the Suppression of Vice has caused the arrest of 3,547 persons for trying to corrupt the youth of the land. More than 145 tons of obscene and immoral literature have been destroyed: 2,948,168 obscene pictures, and 14,794 plates for making them; 99,081 pounds of books, and 28,428 stereotyped plates from which the books were made. More than three and one-half millions of objectionable circulars, advertising books and pictures.

The plan under which the promoters of vice work is to secure catalogues of schools and colleges and send to the students circulars and samples of their vile product. One man when arrested had in his possession 113 catalogues "of the best institutions of learning for boys in New England and the Middle States."

Mr. Comstock has recently completed forty years' service with this society. He has been bold and courageous, and has always been at the front of every crusade in the interest of purity and for the suppression of vice.

The churches throughout the country are asked to preach on the work that this society is doing. Information can be had by writing to Mr. Comstock, New York City.

—In the Christian Evangelist Dr. Garrison alludes to six affirmations concerning the attitude of Disciples toward other Christians which The Christian Century published some weeks since. The affirmations he regards as "true enough, with certain qualifications and explanations." He misinterprets this paper, however, in ascribing to us "an ultimate motive" for publishing in connection with these affirmations a list of prominent Disciple leaders. Dr. Garrison says this "ultimate motive" was apparently to gain the support of these names for a "pet theory" which was not mentioned in the set of affirmations. Nothing is farther from the truth. No "theory" of any kind was involved in the discussion with Dr. Sweeney out of which the six affirmations grew. It was specifically stated also that no "views" of this paper were involved—nothing except the explicit contents of the affirmations. The list of names was for the most part made up of the most conservative men of the brotherhood. It would be a serious reflection on the honor of the editors of this paper, if Dr. Garrison's assertion were not so manifestly absurd.

—The distress in the famine districts of China is pitiful beyond expression. Men, women, and children are dying from starvation in great numbers and harvest time is still three months away. Have pity on the dying people!

Disciples' Opportunity in a Small Village

With respect to the excellent counsel offered by Mr. S. H. Church to his correspondent (see Our Readers' Opinions page) The Christian Century does not wish to appear to assume a disapproving attitude. The goal he wishes attained and the reasons for it meet our approval. And with the major portion of his statement of the means to attain the goal we are in perfect agreement.

With a minor portion we are not in agreement. We take exception to a statement of fact, we disagree in a matter of taste, and we would suggest a somewhat different interpretation of a Disciple's duty in such a situation.

The statement of fact which we regard as erroneous is that it was the practice of the apostles always to baptize in running water, following an alleged Jewish custom. This statement cannot be supported. There were no doubt many instances of apostolic baptism administered in pools and other stationary waters. Nor was the Jewish rite required to be administered in running water, though there was probably a preference for it.

The matter of taste in which we do not share Mr. Church's feelings is his objection to immersion on the grounds of multiple baptisms in the same pool. With respect to the various physical features of the administration of immersion-baptism there has, no doubt, been much carelessness on the part of ministers and congregations. But as taste is refined and sanitary principles become better known these defects are being remedied in the appointments and habits of most churches.

These are just "points." They are neither vital to Mr. Church's main purpose in the correspondence nor to our main purpose in this comment. We advert to them at all only because the question of baptism is under discussion just now and many readers are scrutinizing with great care all statements bearing upon it.

Mr. Church represents the enlightened layman's point of view, and that point of view is not so much concerned with fine distinctions as the clerical point of view is apt to be. It bulks the problem. It says, after the fashion of practical men of the world, there ought to be one good efficient church in this village; go to, let us have but one! This practical attitude is coming more and more to be the attitude of enlightened clerical leaders, too, but the time has not come when so brusque a treatment of particular situations will effect the desired result. However, with Mr. Church our hope is in "the tendency of the times" which is carrying us all farther and farther away from finical distinctions as to means and uniting us in the big practical ends of religion. The immediate end in view is a united church in this Florida community.

If it is assumed, as Disciples have always assumed, that Methodist, Baptist and Disciples' churches—the three bodies now striving to establish churches there—are all churches of Christ it would seem that no vital principle could be imperiled by accepting whatever basis of union might be mutually satisfactory to the people involved. Mr. Church has pointed his Disciple correspondent to high ground, higher than the denominational ground upon which she was standing. But he does not, as it seems to The Christian Century, point to the highest ground. She conceives of the Disciples as a denomination with denominational interests at stake in this new town. These interests are to be advanced by the establishment of a separate Disciples' church, regardless of the number of congregations that other denominations with similar interests are establishing in the town. It is not to be wondered at that this good woman has no higher conception of the Disciples' mission, seeing that it is this conception which practically our whole body has come today complacently to accept, a conception which is cultivated assiduously by our entire denominational press. Conventional religious journalism could not live except as it can keep alive and intensify this conception.

Mr. Church's advice assumes this denominational point of view, but he urges his correspondent to relinquish the denominational motive and strive to organize a union church that would neither be Methodist, Baptist, nor Disciple, but just a church of Christ. He assumes that the fifteen Disciples who have been gathered together would have certain denominational interests to surrender along with the others, and he counsels them gladly to surrender them in view of the incomparably greater interest of a united church and of efficiency in Christian service. This is wholesome advice. The Christian Century has no hesitation in affirming that in such a situation as this no denominational consideration—creed, name, or rite—is important enough to stand in the way of a united church. The practical unity of these churches of Christ is more important than any particular basis of unity can possibly be.

But we would suggest a somewhat different conception of the duty which the historic plea of the Disciples has laid upon the fifteen Disciples in this village situation. We would suggest a straight-out undenomnational conception. Instead of assuming that they have denominational interests or sentiments which make them a coördinate factor with Methodists and Baptists in determining a basis of unity, it would seem that here is a typical opportunity for the Disciples to urge their plea for Christian unity and leave to the other churches of Christ the task of fixing the basis of unity. If the energy expended by this ardent and loyal group of fifteen Disciples in raising money and winning memberships for a denominational church were expended in heart to heart talks with Baptists and Methodists on the sin of dividing Christ's people in their little community, reënforced by some public meetings addressed by men of unsectarian breadth of vision, a conscience on Christian unity would be created and conferences for practical action would be called. Then would come the Disciples' chance to prove their plea truly undenominational. They could say to Baptists and Methodists: You confer together. You are churches of Christ. You take the New Testament as your standard. You will not sacrifice an iota of the New Testament. You will not compromise the church of Christ. You cannot adopt a basis of unity that is one whit less than a church of Christ. We will not enter the conference. We have no peculiar or distinctive convictions that we wish embodied in the united church. We will not allow ourselves to be in the slightest degree a complicating factor in reaching a conclusion. We will remain outside the door while you confer and we will accept and stand upon the basis which you adopt.

That, as The Christian Century interprets the great passion of Thomas Campbell and the ideals he enunciated in the Declaration and Address, is the high disinterested ground the Disciples originally intended to occupy. Whether in Ft. Lauderdale the basis of unity agreed upon would be identical with that set forth by Mr. Church or not—we doubt that it would be—matters not to us, nor does it, as we believe, matter to Mr. Church.

The great thing that matters is whether or not the Disciples can be awakened from the complacent and respectable denominationalism into which they have lapsed, so that they may be willing in every community in this land and in the mission field to take this high ground. Despite the attitude some of their leaders assume, our confidence grows constantly more sure that they not only can be awakened but that they are already awaking.

The Minister Who Was Unpopular With Young People

By William E. Barton

The First Congregational Church in Samaria was very happy. It had called the Rev. Mr. Elisha to be its pastor, and he had accepted the call. The previous pastorate had ended unhappily, but Providence had assisted in a way the church really did not deserve, and the pastor whom the church had fired was taken to heaven in a chariot of fire; so the church passed resolutions of respect for him, and proceeded to install his successor, the brilliant and gentlemanly Mr. Elisha.

Elisha was definitely called to be the successor of Elijah; and he kept Elijah's hairy mantle hanging on a sacred peg in his closet, carefully done up in moth balls. He never wore it. He alluded to it in touching terms from time to time, but it had gone out of style. New times, new methods. Elisha adopted new methods.

Elisha a Good Mixer.

He did not keep himself apart from men as Elijah had done. He had a house in town and lived there, dressing like a gentleman of the period, and having his friends among the very faction that had driven out his predecessor. It would have made Elijah turn over in his grave to have known that Elisha habitually hobnobbed with the king and other men whom Elijah had fought tooth and nail. But the church was weary of controversy, and felt that there are other and often better ways of accomplishing a desired end than that of antagonizing the men on whom the church must depend for success.

It usually is well that a new minister should be unlike his immediate predecessor. It prevents comparisons. And there was no comparison between Elijah and Elisha.

Elisha had been reared in the country, but he very soon adapted himself to city life. He was at home there. He had a house and a servant, and he moved in the best circles of society and was active in the political and religious life of the town.

Young People Rebel.

But though he was a young man, he was not popular with the young people. That is the strange thing about it. And yet it is not the only time it has happened. A young man follows an old one, and still the young people do not like him.

The dislike broke out one day in open mutiny. Young as Elisha was, he was prematurely bald. He was more sensitive about it than he ought to have been. Many respectable men have been bald. Baldness is no certain sign of depravity, but it does not improve a man's beauty, and in Elisha's case it did not improve his disposition.

One day a crowd of youngsters who ought to have known better met him just outside the meeting house, and shouted out their contempt for him. "Go up, thou bald head! Go up, thou bald head!" they cried. The words may have been an allusion to the way in which Elijah had left some years before. Churches sometimes remind a minister of the way they ousted his predecessor; at other times they are silent because they are ashamed of it.

Elisha was annoyed. He turned and cursed the children, which I do not think he ought to have done. It is not a good habit, that of cursing, and especially cursing children. Personally, I wish Elisha had been more patient. But even good men have their failings, and Elisha was a good man and had his. As I have said, he cursed them.

The Avengers.

Elisha went on his way, for he was starting for Mount Carmel, where Elijah had been accustomed to go, and he did not stay to see what happened. But something very terrible happened. Two she-bears came out of the woods. We are able to state on the authority of Mr. Rudyard Kipling that "the female of the species is more deadly than the male." These two she-bears were females of the species, and therefore very deadly. They broke loose among those children, and bit and scratched and hurt forty-two of them. That is the record. No two he-bears ever bit half that many children in any one day. Whenever you hear of two bears biting forty-two children, you will know that they were not he-bears.

Mother's Way Wrong.

Now, personally, I should have been glad if, instead of two she-bears, there had been forty-two she-women, mothers of whose forty-two unmannerly children, who had taken those forty-two youngsters across their maternal knees, and taught them how to address the minister. It was more their place than it was that of the bears, who had children of their own, and none too well-behaved, if the whole truth were known. But it was an age when irreverent children had to be punished, and if the mothers did not do their duty, as they did not then and do not now, the bears did theirs. I have no doubt the intentions of the bears were good, even if their way of showing their disapproval was somewhat drastic. It would have been no use to appeal to the mothers. They would simply have taken the children out of Sunday-school. So the bears were a necessity.

And what the bears did may have been justified by the results. No one knows just how impudent children would have been to ministers, but for this salutary warning.

Elisha Remained.

The youngsters did not succeed in driving Elisha out of Samaria. He was there years and years afterward, and lived to see some of the boys married and fathers of children of their own. He lived till some of the irreverent youngsters began to be bald-headed, and to tell their children how in their youth children always were respectful to their parents and to the minister.

Elisha is one of the few ministers who succeeded in holding his pulpit after it became recognized that he was not popular with the young people. In general, the chariot of fire should be made ready for the pastor who lacks popularity with the young people. If no chariot appears, the toboggan slide is usually brought into place, and the minister is given a farewell reception, and the council passes resolutions of respect for him.

Elisha stuck it out, and those of the boys whom the bears did not eat grew up and after a while began to like him; and he finished a ministry which was both long and notably profitable. It will be seen, therefore, that it would have been a pity if the young people had succeeded in ousting Elisha, as they so often have done since.

Other Bears Needed.

But there are some things about this story that trouble me. History does not tell us what became of the bears. Why should they have receded so far into the background? Why do we look in vain for their reappearance upon the stage? Those irreverent children lived and begot other children in their own image, and these begot others and these others, and the woods are full of them; but where are the children of the bears? Many and many a minister, meeting the irreverence of the youngsters, has cast his eyes toward the woods, and no bears have appeared. Is it because ministerial profanity is not considered in good form in these degenerate days? What were the magic words which, albeit they blistered the preacher's tongue a bit, brought forth the mamma bears? Where are there some more bears willing to kiss their own infants good-bye for an hour or two, while they go forth in search of young people who treat the minister with irreverence?

Irreverent Youth.

In these days, youth goes honking past in its father's automobile, and the prophet scrambles to the curb and brushes the spatters off his trousers, and the bears are not in sight. The automobile is on its way to the zoo, to see the bears, and feed them five cents worth of carrots. Carrots are not nearly so good for bears as naughty children. Why have things so changed?

Elisha never permitted any boy in his Sunday-school to spatter mud on his trousers. He never was snubbed by his Young People's Society without having something happen. And the movement to send him over the deadline before he reached middle life because he was not popular with the young people resulted in failure, but with salutary lessons to the young people.

Let Parents Become Bears!

Now, inasmuch as the bears are no longer on the job, would it not be well for the fathers and mothers to supply the lack? Ministers teach their members to bear and forbear. Even so; and do not be afraid to bear on hard. The youngsters will be all the better for it, and the pastorates will lengthen. How many good things Elisha did after he proved unpopular with the young people! And there are some indications that after they came to know him better, they really liked him. We read of several boys who came to know him intimately and to their profit.

So do not be in too great haste to fire the minister who is unpopular with the young people. First let the bears loose among them; or, if the church has no bear, then let the parents of the young people teach them proper lessons of respect. The plan worked well in the olden time. It is worth trying again, though with important modifications.

A Bear Staff Ministry.

I am not able to state with entire accuracy just what effect the experience of the Rev. Mr. Elisha with his young people's society had upon surrounding churches. The records of those churches have not in every case been preserved to us, and where they exist at all, they are fragmentary. But I have the impression that a number of the churches round about Samaria passed resolutions something like this:

"Resolved, that this church add to its equipment two full grown and vigorous bears.

"Resolved, that this church has no conscientious scruples against equal suffrage among bears, and would prefer she-bears to any other kind."

A Moonshiner Who Turned About

By Anna Ross

It was a balmy April day and Mollie Mitchell could not help enjoying the soft beauty of the returning springtime as she strolled along the wood path, the flowering dogwood and the flaming azalea giving a touch of white and gold to the tender green of the oak and chestnut, the tulip, and sweet gum tree.

As she emerged from the woods on the brow of the hill, she gazed with beauty-loving eyes on the scene before her. Far away to her right the soft curves of the mountains were outlined against the western sky. In the foreground lay the valley, the river winding its placid way; its banks fringed with willows becoming green with the warmth of returning springtime. The balmy breeze and the bright sunshine added to the charm of this secluded spot in the sunny South.

But Mollie was not happy. Her enjoyment was dimmed by the consciousness that in ten minutes she must leave behind all this brightness and beauty and be shut up in a stuffy room with dozens of others doing the same old tasks in the same old way. Would she never be free to live her own life? Never be anything but a mere machine? Miss Dexie had told her she must be patient, but how could she be patient when her heart and soul cried out for something better and finer than the sordid associations of mill life. If only her mother had lived! Ah, her mother, who had determined that Mollie should have "her chance." And if only her father—but her vague aspirations always received a hopeless check when her surviving parent loomed up before her mental horizon.

She was soon joined by others returning to work after the noon hour, and remarking each to the other, "what a pretty day" it was. The whistle blew and soon Mollie was at her work.

A few hours later along the same wood path came Miss Dexie. She, too, was charmed by the witching beauty of the lovely spring day. Her eye took in every detail of the landscape, and her heart, too, was sad, for she saw not only the beauty of nature, but also the imperfections of human nature.

The mountains indeed were beautiful, but she knew that in their remote caves and fastnesses were men who lived unlovely lives, and engaged in lawless deeds. She had heard many an evening the firing of a gun which she knew was the signal to certain thirsty individuals that a supply of "moonshine" was at hand. Even at that moment she recalled the case of a man, an officer of the law, who had been a liberal patron of these same law-breakers who, in a personal quarrel had shot and killed a fellow-being, and was now a fugitive from justice, taking shelter in these same mountains.

Her gaze wandered in the direction of the river and she knew that it also ministered to the demands of selfish commercialism. On its banks stood the mill in the midst of untidy surroundings, and she knew that within its walls little children of tender years were toiling at the machines and being dwarfed in body and mind. What a pity so much moral ugliness should exist in the midst of all this natural beauty.

Pausing in her reflections, she came to the foot of the hill to the dilapidated sidewalk that led to the mill directly past the open door of the "finishing room." She stepped inside for a word with Mollie. A strong odor of tobacco filled the air. Women and girls were using snuff and expectorating freely. She felt a great wave of pity for Mollie, who with her delicate, refined face and quiet manner seemed out of touch with her surroundings.

Miss Dexie's attention was attracted by a pile of red hose.

"And who wears these?" she asked, in a half-amused tone.

"Those are for the penitentiary."

"Ah," and the tone was more serious, "and does it ever make you feel bad to work on them, knowing where they go?"

"I'd as soon be in the penitentiary as here."

"Now, dear, you know you wouldn't; you have your liberty here and a clear conscience."

"Oh, yes, I know," she admitted with a sigh.

"Come and see me soon, I have a new book for you," and Miss Dexie passed into the street.

She turned into a path that led to a group of poor little cabins near the river. Stopping at the home of Mrs. Kerley, she found that lady with a huge black sunbonnet on her head at work in the garden. She listened with considerable interest while Mrs. Kerley explained the need of constant watchfulness to guard against the enemies that would destroy her "craps." Miss Dexie observed that she spoke with a sense of proprietorship. It was "my garden," "my cow," "my orchard," etc. Why shouldn't she? It was due to her faithful toil that the family was blessed with these possessions.

"What a lovely view of the mountains you have!" exclaimed Miss Dexie.

"Law, I reckon you wouldn't think they was so purty if you dun climbed over them so often as I have. Won't you come in and set a spell?"

Miss Dexie followed her into the primitive dwelling. The room contained two beds and was lighted by one small window. A rude stairway in one corner led up to the floor above. At one end was a fireplace which served for heating and cooking, and alas! was often put to ignoble uses. Mrs. Kerley as well as her husband was addicted to the use of the weed, and could calculate the distance to the fireplace with the same accuracy as her tobacco-loving spouse.

"Seems like you all come to see me when I ain't got things cleaned up. I ain't feelin' right peart these days. I've had a right smart o' sickness this last year, an' I ain't feelin' stout yet. Are you well enough?"

"Yes, I'm blessed with good health as a general thing."

"You say you are: Well, you sure got a heap to be thankful for. And how's your paw?"

"Why, he's getting on nicely, thank you. This fine climate is doing him lots of good. He thinks its better than doctors or medicine. We've been here a year now and we have grown to like it so well that I doubt if we ever go back to the north to stay."

"It's sech a pretty day, lets go out and sit on the porch," suggested Mrs. Kerley.

Nothing loth, Miss Dexie agreed, and in a moment she saw the opportunity she had been waiting for. "Mrs. Kerley, who lives in that house yonder just to the left of the group of pine trees?"

"That's Dock Mitchell's."

"Oh,' replied Miss Dexie, in a non-committal way. "Is that Mollie Mitchell's father," just as if she had never heard of the man before.

"Yes'm, but you wouldn't think it. If ever thar was a low-down, good-fer-nuthin, no-count critter, I reckon its Dock Mitchell. Thar ain't a meaner man in this country."

"What does he do for a living?"

"Do?" with a snort of contempt. "Don't do nuthin' but make whiskey and drink it. Spends most of his time up yander in them thar mountins. Once in a while he comes home and gits on a tearin' drunk, an' Mollie gits half skeered to death. But she sticks to her job and keeps the two boys in school while she's a workin' in the mill. Hits a plumb shame how that man neglects his own kin. When his wife was livin', she aimed to hev Mollie git larnin' and Mollie did go off to school fer a while, but now all that's changed. She stays to hum an' keeps a place fer the boys or like's not they'd be into mischief."

Miss Dexie looked thoughtful as her companion went on: "'Pears like some men ain't got no sense no ways or they wouldn't go filling theirselves full o' whiskey an' makin' fools and idiots of theirselves. An' that ain't the worst on it, either. You know Bill Jones over thar on the 'tother side of the hill?"

Miss Dexie nodded. "Well, he uster git drunk, and when he'd come out o' one of his drunk spells he'd be so mean an' ugly he'd beat his wife. Lum Grover's wife lived next him. And she tol' me about him. She wanted Lum to go over an' try an' quiet him, but Lum said he wan't goin' to be messin' into things when sich doins' was agoin' on. Law, Miss Dexie, ain't it turr-'ble. Lemme tell you, a man that'd go and steal a horse, ain't no low-downer than a feller that'd beat his wife that a-way."

Miss Dexie was a little taken back at this method of comparing ethical values, but she steered the conversation back to its former channel.

"Do you suppose Mollie knows her father is a moonshiner?"

"I reckon she does. but she don't say nary a word to nobody about it. She's a mighty good girl, Mollie is, and a powerful hand to keep things to herself."

Miss Dexie experienced a new feeling of respect and a deeper sympathy for the young girl she was trying to befriend, and as she bade good-bye to her hostess and turned her steps toward home, she wondered what more she could do to make life more tolerable for her. She had seen the father but once. He had not a bad face, but shifty and lacking any indication of strength of character. She wondered what could be done to bring the man to a sense of his responsibility, to the realization of the duties of fatherhood, even of real manhood.

A few days later a messenger stalked into the finishing room and with hurried stride made straight toward Mollie. She saw him coming, noted his excited manner, and knew the thing she had feared had come.

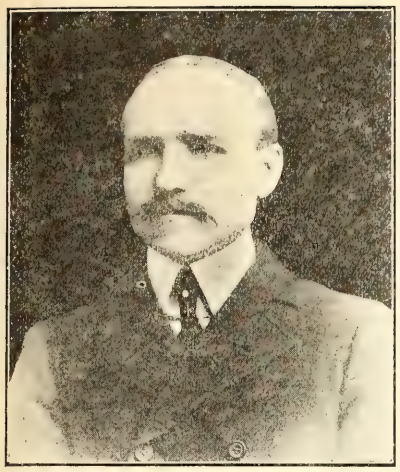
"Say, Mollie," he said as he reached her side, "your paw's dun got hurt an' you'll hev to go straight hum."

Mollie left the mill without a word. Outside in the bright sunshine, the man explained the cause of the accident.

"I reckon he's not dang'rus. Them durned revenues got atter him an' he fired on em' an' they fired back an' hit im on the shoulder. We dun sent fer the doctor a right smart bit ago. I reckon he'll soon git all right agin."

But days and nights of suffering for the father, and hard work and anxious care for

(Continued on Page 22.)



English Topics

Annual Gathering of the Free Churches

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

The Free Church host gathered last week at Cheltenham in annual conclave. The tone of the meetings was very much affected by the shadow cast by the coal strike. Social messages were especially colored by this. The compactness of Great Britain is such that both calamities and blessings are shared by the entire national life. Englishmen do not speak of these things in the third person, it is "we" and "our." It must have sounded strangely in the ears of an English audience when an American, only recently come to this country, said in an address, "I hear there are a million miners on strike." No Englishman would think of detaching himself from the situation like that, even in the use of an illustration. The Cheltenham program was a very crowded one. I have made a few full programs myself, and have often gotten into trouble with "Father Time" and not a few people by doing so, but I think I have never made one quite so full as this one, framed under the direction of the Rev. F. B. Meyer as honorary secretary. Mr. Meyer has so many strings to his bow that he must have found it difficult to limit the arrows in his quiver on this occasion. The difficulty was not in having too many archers, however, as several of these appeared more than once.

The topics covered a wide range of interest, there being theological, sociological, and young people's sections, besides separate meetings for women and men and temperance.

The great theme which ran through the program was the question as to what shall be the answer of the church to the challenge of the age. The word "challenge" is a very popular one at the present time.

The Social Question.

There were a number of ringing messages given on the social question by both preachers and business men of experience with both capital and labor. The sympathies on the whole were with the side of labor, although many words of advice and counsel were uttered with the purpose of sobering and making more serious the working classes. The assertion was several times repeated that the present social unrest is not due to the desire simply for more money and less work, but that the roots are deeper, even in the souls of men. It is the desire for a larger and a fuller life, with more time and opportunity for life's enrichment. The multitude may be unconscious of this, but, nevertheless, the impulse is there. To interpret this deeper longing and to supply food for this unconscious hunger is the work of the church. There are two great hindrances to the well-being of men, the uncertainty of the supply of life's necessities, and the superfluity of the same thing. Many at both ends of the scale are in equal danger.

Conscience of Church Must Not Lag.

Rev. J. H. Shakespeare declared that the conscience of the state was now responsible for the righting of our social ills, but that the danger was lest the conscience of the church should lag behind. One speaker, in pleading for one day's rest in seven, said that he was recently reminded that the Sabbath was made for man, and his reply was that that was no reason why it should be taken away from him.

Rev. C. Silvester Horne, in one of his two or three rousing addresses, urged that we should be guided by the principle, "Let each seek not his own but his neighbor's good," in our relation with both our fellow men and our fellow nations. When the church offers heaven to certain people, let us not be surprised if they reply, "Take back your heaven and give us a portion of the earth." Some of these selfsame people ask whether it is by meekness that the landlords have inherited the earth, and whether there remains anything else to inherit if they themselves should exercise the same quality. The business of the nation, Mr. Horne declared, is not to make millionaires, but men.

The Living Wage.

A striking address was delivered by Rev. Harold Brierley, son of "J. B." of the "Christian World," on the church and a living wage. The working man, he declared, stayed away from church for the same reason that the rich man stayed away. Neither felt his need of the spiritual. The working classes, however, were crying for life, though they knew not what life was. This unrest was the hoarse cry of the travailing soul—to turn a deaf ear to it, to attempt to stifle it by parrot cries of revolution and socialism was to stultify ourselves and to be false to everything that Christ was and said and stood for. When he was told that the church as an organization had nothing to do with such questions as a living wage, he was constrained to defend the paradox that it had nothing to do with anything else. It was the prime function of the church to unveil and to interpret life to the world. Now was the church's great opportunity when the masses were crying, "We believe in life, and we want to live." "First that which is natural, afterwards that which is spiritual," was the divine way.

Rev. Richard Roberts, a rising young Presbyterian, and a near neighbor of mine, presided over several meetings of the Young People's section, and in these frequent reference was made to social questions. Mr. Roberts himself said that materialism was the great danger of our day, and declared that if China should be seized and held in the grip of the materialistic spirit, that her awakening might mean the breakdown of modern civilization within the next fifty years. He made a plea that the rich should deny themselves their luxuries. Why should the rich man have his luxurious club and deny the poor man his miserable club, the public house?

Theology.

There were two afternoon sectional meetings for the discussion of theological questions. Dr. Rendel Harris presided in a delightful manner. One section was devoted to miracles. The papers were both scholarly and devout. It was generally agreed that no one, not even the scientist, today, undertakes to say that miracle is impossible; but that the whole question hinges upon miracles and the evidence for their support in individual cases.

Dr. Newton H. Marshall, one of the most scholarly of the younger school of Baptist ministers, took the ground that miracles are essential to Christian faith. He supported his position mainly on the ground that Christianity itself is a miracle.

The modern position was set forth which contends that a miracle is the result of a force from a higher strata or order of life being brought to bear upon a lower order. It is not the overthrow of one law by another, but the accomplishment of the end through the calling in of forces before inoperative, or at least unknown in the lower kingdom.

One of the best papers in the theological section was read by Dr. Warschauer. The position which was taken was an advanced one, and yet the discussion which followed called forth in the main simply questions for further light and especially for guidance in the best methods of presenting the results of modern criticism to the best advantage. I tried to imagine what would happen if the same paper should be read before an American gathering, composed of members and preachers, not only from city churches, but also from country districts. I fear there would have been pandemonium. There are a great many people in England, however, who are still theologically very conservative, and a preacher who uses the traditional methods, and preaches the old orthodox theology with conviction, secures a large following.

An American.

Dr. A. C. Dixon seems to be having a very happy time in the Metropolitan Tabernacle. He was strangely out of touch, however, on one or two points in one of his addresses at Cheltenham. In an address on soul winning he took occasion to drag in a reference to Darwinism, and undertook to prove that Darwin's theory had a pagan origin. I was surprised to find that an American preacher of such standing as Dr. Dixon should be so slack and slovenly in his diction. It was apparent that this was largely assumed as if it were a quality to be proud of. One can scarcely think, however, that it would be found a valuable asset in speaking before an English congregation, especially one that was likely to contain a considerable number of cultured people.

Free Church Principles.

There were, of course, many references in various meetings to pet Free Church principles and special purposes. The sermon of retiring president, Rev Charles Brown, also a near neighbor of mine, was from the text: "From henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." Mr. Brown set forth, with great power, the Free Church principle of freedom in spiritual exercises and administrations. The Holy Spirit had gone over the heads of them all in choosing Saul as an apostle. He was baptized by a layman and he began preaching without consulting those who were apostles before him. Apostolic succession was broken in the first links. He had seen the Lord Jesus. He had received a personal call. This was his authority. Educational tests were said to be useful and necessary, and a certain amount of regulation and order were fitting, but these things were not to stand in the way of the divine call to the ministry.

One or two speakers referred to the Free Church opposition to priestcraft and sacerdotalism, and warning was given that in our opposition to priestcraft we ought not to forget the principle of priesthood. Every one of us is a priest unto God. The thought was also emphasized with others, that the

(Continued on Page 22.)

The Case of Richard Meynell

REVIEW OF MRS. HUMPHREY WARD'S POPULAR NOVEL DEALING WITH RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY

BY IDA WITHERS HARRISON

Twenty-two years ago Mrs. Humphrey Ward published her most popular book, "Robert Elsmere." In it, her hero, the rector of a Surrey parish, threw up his orders because he could no longer subscribe to the beliefs of the Church of England, and founded a religious brotherhood among the London working men for the promotion of a simple form of Christianity. Her theme was the conflict in the mind of a good and sincere man with religious doubts and problems, and it was the throes of this soul struggle that gave the book its universal interest and immense popularity.

In the more than two decades since "Robert Elsmere" appeared, Mrs. Ward has written many novels, dealing with varied phases of the social and political life of England. In "The Case of Richard Meynell" she returns to the problem that seems nearest her heart—conditions in the church of her choice and of her fathers. It is not strange that the granddaughter of Arnold of Rugby, and niece of Matthew Arnold, should be deeply interested in current religious thought. The two novels are linked together by a similarity of subject, and by the fact that Elsmere's widow and daughter and several other characters from the earlier book reappear in "Richard Meynell." It is assumed that Meynell has the same beliefs, or negations of belief, as Robert Elsmere, but very little is said of that; he is a man in middle life when the story opens, and has already changed from an Orthodox Anglican to a Modernist Anglican. Browning says that he always "lays his stress on the development of a soul;" the battle in Meynell's soul is fought and finished before the book begins—so we lose in the hero the very essentials of true drama.

Mrs. Ward realizes this, and tries to meet the need by grouping around him a set of people all of whom have acted with incredible and criminal folly, and so force him to choose between private honor and public duty. It is the old story of waywardness and sin, and seems, especially in the tragic close of Hester's wilful young life, to border on lurid melodrama, and to be unworthy of a writer of Mrs. Ward's poise and distinction. The central theme of the book is wanting in human passion and interest; it is the effort of Meynell, rector of a mining town, and his followers and sympathizers to hold their places in the historic English Church, while at variance with its beliefs and forms of worship; this movement is not a secession from the church like Elsmere's, but a struggle within it.

The reasons for the Modernist movement, as given by the hero, paint a dark picture of the Anglican Church. He complains of "the loss of souls—the decline of faith—the empty churches—the dwindling communicants—the spread of secularist literature—the hostility of the workmen—the need of kindling the dry bones of English religion!"

The writer of this review recalls a striking example of the empty churches during a recent visit to England. She was spending the night at Warwick, and went to the vesper service in the beautiful old historic church there. There was a fine sermon, beautiful music, and at the close a stately recessional of the vested choir and the clergy participating in the service, eighteen in all—and there were just seventeen persons in the congregation, nearly all of them tourists. One could not but wonder what was the size of the congregation when the tourist season was over!

Mrs. Humphrey Ward.

The things for which the Modernist party are striving in the book are singularly lacking in universality of interest. Much is made of their having a right to a share in the noble cathedrals and churches of their nation. Meynell complains in one of his talks with his bishop:

"Two camps! Two systems of thought!—yet both of them Christian thought; one of them only is in possession of the churches, the forms, the institutions—the other is everywhere knocking at the gates. Give us our portion, in Christ's name! We ask to live side by side with the old, sharing what the past has bequeathed. Yes, even the loaves and fishes—they ought to be divided out like the rest."

And the old bishop answers bitterly:

"Yes, reduce us to a peddling confusion of sects, held together by the mere physical link of our buildings and our endowments."

This demand for the right to worship in the churches their fathers built seems a far cry to American readers, and strangely small as one of the motives for a great religious reformation.

When we gradually and with considerable difficulty grasp what seem to be the main features of the Modernist movement, we are amazed that such negative things should be supposed to disrupt the old church. These were a revised liturgy, saying the Lord's Prayer once instead of four times, changing some of the other prayers, leaving out the imprecatory psalms and the "history of barbaric peoples," changing the marriage and burial service and tampering with the creeds. The champion of orthodoxy in the trial maintains:

"The creeds are vital! The Modernists have dealt drastically and destructively with the creeds of Christendom. A church without a creed is an inconceivable entity—a mere chaos of private opinion, where each man is a law unto himself."

For those who believe that human creeds have stood like stone walls in the way of religious progress and Christian Union, and who insist on the right of private interpretation of the scriptures, this cry receives no answering stir of emotion. In fact, as Mrs. Ward says in her "Foreword," the whole story turns on the existence of a State Church, a great ecclesiastical co-operation, which owns the cathedrals and parish churches, half the elementary schools, and is the legal religion of the great public schools, which shape the ruling upper classes; it is moreover a great political influence through the bishops in the House of Lords.

The Modernist reforms are doubtless momentous and of vital interest to the members of the Anglican Church; but for Americans, with their belief in that cardinal principle, the separation of Church and State, such themes lack the touch of nature that makes the whole world kin; they are of purely local interest and are therefore essentially provincial, and do not touch the universal needs of the human heart.

The conclusion, which is meant to be pathetic, fails to move us; even though the rector of Upcote Minor and his followers have to lose their livings, and be "wanderers and outcasts from the house of their fathers"—these were mere material losses, and did not concern their hold on the deep things of God. No one questioned their right to worship Him and to serve their fellow men—and these are the great essential rights that touch all mankind.

The book has all the charm of description and skill in character drawing that Mrs. Ward never fails to give us—and, alas! all the lack of humor that we also find in her writings. Meynell is drawn with sympathetic insight, and is the mouthpiece of the author's convictions. The passion for social service has taken possession of him, and his ministrations to the needy miners in his parish win all hearts, and is one of his great sources of power and leadership.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Disciple's Duty in a Small Village

[The following correspondence between an ardent Disciple who has removed to a small village in Florida and Mr. Samuel Harden Church of Pittsburgh was submitted by Mr. Church as having significance in the present day discussion of the problem of churching small communities. In the main The Christian Century approves of Mr. Church's letter. Our exception to a few particulars and the suggestion of a slightly different point of view will be found in an editorial on page 12.—The Editors.]

* * *

Mr. S. H. Church,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

Dear Brother:—I am a former member of the East End Christian Church, of Pittsburgh—now Mrs. ———, but then known as Mrs. ——— of that church.

Now, Mr. Church, I have come to you with an appeal. One year ago we came to Ft. Lauderdale, Fla. We have been without a church home till now, and we were very much disheartened to realize that we were so much out in the world, especially my young sons, ——— and ———, who joined the church at Pittsburgh, where our letters are yet.

Just one month ago another lady and I thought we would put forth our efforts to see what we could do. Our first steps were to have a chicken supper. We advertised it preparatory to organizing a Christian Church from that supper, and, after a canvass of the town, we have something like fifteen members.

We set out next to ask the only man of our town that is any ways well off to donate us a lot. We got the lot. We organized a Ladies' Aid two weeks ago; last Lord's Day we organized our Sunday School, and expect to organize our church just as soon as we can get a minister to come.

Now we have place to hold our meetings. The one church in town have kindly given us the use of theirs for our Sunday School at 2:30 o'clock. The Methodist and Baptist people are struggling along in the Nickelodian building, and those are the only other two churches here. There is so much church work here to do. There is a small hall in town, but it is well taken up with lodge meetings, and it is on the third floor. What we want is to get a roof over our heads, and seats to sit on, and we will be thankful. Won't you help us out with some of your offering? Dear Mr. Church, we are struggling, as you see, and if it would only be a small sum, it would go a great ways now, and it would be a good mission cause, I am sure. Please help us. Our carpenters' union will give us help, we are sure. Some have offered already, and as we don't have any cold weather, we don't need a warm house. Respectfully yours,

——— ———

Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.

* * *

My Dear Mrs. ———:—I have read your letter of December 28th with a great deal of interest, and I cannot help wondering whether your efforts to build a Disciples' church at Ft. Lauderdale is not a typical case of the waste of religious economies. I understand from your letter that Ft. Lauderdale is a small community; that there is no Disciples' church there at present; and that the Methodists and Baptists are conducting a struggle to maintain their small church organizations in store buildings. This presents a familiar situation, which has impelled enlightened religious leaders all over the world to recommend co-operation among the different religious bodies. In your case this would mean that, instead of three different denominations wasting money and scattering the energies of the people in the unjustifiable attempt to build three churches in a very small town, the people who are striving for the establishment of a church there ought to unite in one congregation, and build only one church. I know very well that, if you were to submit this proposition from me to our own people, and to your Methodist and Baptist brethren, the partisans of each one of these churches would claim that theirs is the only truly Apostolic Church of Christ, and that they could not sacrifice religious principle to any desire for the conservation of religious energies and financial resources. But the tendency of the times is to obliterate all such distinctions; and, in a crucial moment like this, when the spiritual and moral welfare of your community is concerned, I would strongly advise that the religious people of all denominations, including our own, should get together and organize one church, and build one building for their congregational devotions. It is absurd to say that we are not a sect; as long as we claim that we excel our neighbors in the truthful interpretation of religious obligation, we are a sect, and, I fear, an arrogant sect.

The question will at once arise, What name shall you give this church, and which one of the three organizations shall have its name chosen? In this case, our position would seem very strong for the selection of the name, The Christian Church; but, if the other two object to that as having a sectarian association, another name could be agreed upon, such as, The Union Christian Church, or perhaps merely, The Ft. Lauderdale Church. There is nothing vital in a name.

The next question which would naturally arise would be, What formula of service should be adopted? In most particulars, the service in one Protestant congregation is largely like all the others; so that there should be no difficulty in agreeing upon the order in which the hymns, sermon and collection shall be arranged.

You will then come to the question of Baptism and The Lord's Supper, and in this you will have to do what the whole world will ultimately do, that is, leave these things to be determined by each individual as his own conscience and intelligence may dictate. Those who believe as you and I do, in immersion, can call for that form in their own cases, while those who believe in any other form of baptism whatever, whether it be pouring, sprinkling, or, as in the case of our Quaker brethren, baptism of the Spirit, shall be admitted to this union church, in every respect upon an equality each one with all the others. As for immersion as at present practiced among our people, while I believe it to be entirely adequate, it is not at all in accordance with the primitive practice of the Apostles, who invariably baptized their converts in a river of running water, which symbolically carried away their sins—an ancient Jewish idea of purification; and to substitute for this operation the submersion of the candidate in a tank of stationary water, where sometimes a dozen persons will be successively immersed, is wholly without warrant of Scripture, besides being very unsanitary, and sometimes, as in the case of some women and those enfeebled by age, actually dangerous to life, while, among the extremely sick, it cannot possibly be administered at all. These were some of the reasons which led to its discontinuance by the ancient Church. There is therefore, abundant room for the widest possible variation of opinion and practice upon this much-overrated ordinance.

It is the scandal of the age that this question of organizing churches in small towns should lead to such a waste of resources as now prevails. Many communities are struggling to maintain from three to six churches, when one, or possibly two, at the most, would abundantly provide for the necessities of their worship.

I hope that this letter will be helpful to the good people of Ft. Lauderdale, and that you will immediately abandon the folly and waste that would result in endeavoring to build three churches, when it is, as you tell me, so difficult to find the means to build one. I have given you, as I believe, the only principle upon which religious union can ever be effected in this world. We are coming to it, very slowly, in the large communities, and are making some headway among the world's missionary forces abroad, even against the most acrimonious and bigoted opposition. Indeed, the very spirit of Protestantism requires that the righteous though narrow and innately cruel men who are dictating religious beliefs and formulas for the consciences of other people, must cease from that arrogant and presumptuous usurpation, or else take themselves back into the church of the middle ages, where alone the right to dictate religion for other man can consistently exist.

With the hope that this letter will solve the problem which is at present distracting your little commounity, I am, Sincerely yours, S. H. Church.

Pittsburgh, Pa.

Theory and Fact

An old German had gone to California. He knew of the three ways of reaching the Golden State, across the plains, over the Isthmus, and around the Horn. One day he met his nephew, Otto, who had come to California by way of Mexico.

The uncle was surprised to see Otto and naturally inquired about the way he came. The uncle said, "Otto, did you come der plains over?" Otto told him he did not come that way.

"Did you come der Isthmus across?" To which Otto gave the same answer.

"Did you came der Horn around?" said the uncle. To which Otto replied that he did not come that way.

Then the old German straightened himself up and said, with emphasis, "Then, Otto, you haf not arrived yet."

* * *

Praise for Mr. Barnes

Editors Christian Century: Allow me to congratulate The Century, its constituency, and the brotherhood, on your "discovery" of E. B. Barnes. He would have been discovered long ago but for the self complacent provincialism of most of our journalism. Mrs. Harrison's "sweetness and light" are also a great asset. Claris Yeuell.

Delphi, Ind.

———

Editors Christian Century: I congratulate you upon the acquisition of E. B. Barnes as a writer. He strikes me as having a keenness that is unsurpassed and a fearlessness, combined with a sanity of viewpoint, that makes his pen most valuable just now.

Columbia, Mo. A. W. Taylor.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

To a Young Lady on Her Birthday

By Bliss Carmen.

The marching years go by,
And brush your garment's hem
The bandits by and by
Will bid you go with them.

Trust not that caravan!
Old vagabonds are they;
They'll rob you if they can,
And make believe it's play.

Make the old robbers give
Of all the spoils they bear,
Their truth, to help you live,
Their joy, to keep you fair.

Ask not for gauds or gold,
Nor fame that falsely rings;
The foolish world grows old
Caring for all these things.

Make all your sweet demands
For happiness alone,
And the years will fill your hands
With treasures rarely known.

—Hampton's Magazine.

The Revolution of the Girl

By L. T. Mead in the Times.

Perhaps during the last sixty years, of the revolutions—whether rapid or slow—that have come to alter the world, none are so strong and complete as those which affect the life of the young English woman.

From her earliest childhood to the full, rich years of her adolescence all is completely changed. I recall, as I write this article, a vision of the girl of the past. She was made to feel her inferiority to her brothers. In the numerous households where children were many and money scarce, the girl did without. At any cost, the boys must be educated, and the girls had, in consequence, to pick up knowledge where and how they could. Knowledge was by no means thought essential to the old-fashioned girl. There were some people who even went to the length of considering it not quite nice for a girl to know too much.

As the girl grew up, she was expected to marry, and the sooner her marriage took place, the more positive were her parents and guardians that she had indeed fulfilled her life's mission.

When, in course of time, the father and mother died, a scanty provision had been enough, in short, to starve upon. Thus her gray life entered into its evening.

Now a thought entered into the heart of the pioneer woman. Why should that bright young girl succumb to such a fate? Why should not the capital which by and by was to provide $350 or $400 a year not be expended now, in her youth, on the education of the girl? It was exceedingly difficult to get the old-fashioned mothers to see that this step was the right step, and many were the struggles and repinings, the angry refusals, the jeering, unkind words. But just at this time, there appeared on the horizon those two great women whom the world must ever respect, and the girls of all time love—Miss Buss and Miss Beale. These gallant women fought for and with the girls, and gradually, year by year, more and more bright and clever young women attended at their schools. The schools grew greater; the whole scheme for the education of women flourished. Long before the end of the century the great cause of woman was won.

She may have gone too far. She may, even now, be struggling for the unattainable. But when one compares the present day girl, full of freshness and eagerness, with her sister of the seventies, it is impossible not to feel a sense of amazed delight. She is so different from the girl of the past that it is sometimes difficult to believe that she belongs to the same order of being. "Old Maid" is an obsolete term. The unmarried woman of today is the woman of affairs. She undertakes weighty duties that the married woman has no time for. The openings for her services are widening their borders every day. Her sagacity, her quick intuition, her sympathy, her profound knowledge of other women make her invaluable in many positions quite unsuitable to men. She throws herself with a passionate zest into her work. She is untiring in her endeavors. Behold her as the parish nurse, as the church deaconess, as the high school mistress. Look at her as the trained nurse in the sick room. Get her valuable opinion in all cases connected with other women. See her in the postoffice, in the kindergarten, in the home.

But are there no dangers ahead? Where so much is splendid, has nothing vanished with the passing years? May not the girl, in the beginning of her really great career, pause and think? Is there nothing to be learned from the poor, shadowy sister of the old times? In their old-fashioned, gentle way, with their thin, clinging muslin gowns, or attired in the strange lack of grace of that abhorrent thing, the crinoline, have they not something which we have lost? Did not the fairy godmother come more often to their cradles than to us? Did she not attend at the old-world christenings and bestow—not always beauty, not talent, not riches, but something better and greater than all three—charm? Do not we, in our hurry, our unending, unceasing toil, miss that elusive quality?

The old-fashioned girl was also undoubtedly womanly. Her gentle voice, her sweet manners, were not to be despised. Is not the present-day girl just a little rough now and then? In the time of our grandmothers it was the fashion for the young person to curtsey at the door, not to stand on the hearth-rug, not to sit down uninvited in the presence of her elders. These things were undoubtedly overdone, but they had their uses. The careless movements, the want of reverence to the old are not to be commended in the modern girl.

Then, also, with all our learning, our race in the great battle of life, have we not lost, just for lack of time—but, oh! the pity of it—the art of conversation? Does anyone really converse now? To "talk shop," to use slang words, to be always and ever on the endless rush—are not these the modern fashion? How graceful was the measured speech of our grandparents!

Find time, therefore, happy modern girl, for charm. So bright and captivating are her fairy wings that she is worth pursuing. Find time for gentle manners, for thoughtful kindness to the old. Cultivate that conversation which is conversation indeed. And if, with all your talent, it is not in you to talk well, you can at least be that inestimable blessing to your day and generation—a good listener.

Woman's Doings

—Mrs. Robley D. Evans, widow of the late admiral, is understood to be in such limited circumstances that several members of congress have a plan on foot to put through a bill to give her a substantial pension. At present she will receive only the regular pension of $30 a month. Admiral Evans lost much money in unfortunate investments.

—Mrs. Mary Harris Armor, W. C. T. U. leader, known as the "Georgia Cyclone," appeared before a committee at the house at Washington to speak in favor of the bill to prohibit the shipment of whisky into "dry" territory. Mrs. Armor talked so fast that the official stenographers could not keep up with her.

—Mrs. C. H. Anthony, wife of a retired business man of Muncie, Ind., keeps her shoes in a bank vault. Mrs. Anthony has been passing the winter in Washington, D. C., where she has dazzled the society buds and matrons with six pairs of shoes studded with diamonds, one pair set with turquoises, bronze shoes covered with beads of solid gold and two massive golden anklets, scintillating with gems. She has now invaded New York with many thousand dollars' worth of fine raiment, including a hat with a $1,000 bird of paradise on it.

—Lord Sholto Douglas, a son of the eighth marquis of Queensberry, and brother of the present marquis, thinks that the American girl is the classiest of the classy. The young man raves on as follows about Americans of the fairer sex:

"The American girl is the queen rose of the rosebud garden of girls."

"She is beyond the girls of all other nations."

"She was a vision of delight when first she gleamed across my sight."

"Were I not happily married to the sweetest girl in Uncle Sam's dominions, I would make an Oliver Twist-like demand for 'more.'"

"The American girl is adaptable and clever in social matters."

Sholto Douglas married an American actress in 1895 and has remained married to her.

—Women possess the suffrage, on equal terms with men in six American states: Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Washington, and California. In November, 1912, four other states are to ballot on the question: Kansas, Wisconsin, Nevada, and Oregon. In thirty American states, women have school suffrage, and in Ontario and Quebec, they have municipal suffrage. In Australia and New Zealand, woman's suffrage has prevailed for many years.

—By the death of William Alexander, Grand Duke of Luxembourg, on February 25, the crown of the little principality passes to his eldest daughter, the Grand Duchess Marie, a girl who has not yet reached the eighteenth anniversary of her birth. Unless the young princess makes herself very popular with her subjects she may have to face a grave constitutional crisis brought about by the intrigues of her ambitious cousin. This is only one of the problems which will occupy the youthful ruler's mind.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

H. H. Shick will give half time to the work of Louisville Church.

The foreign missionary offering of Denver Church amounted to over $33.

J. Frank Harbison of Paris preached for Success Church March 10.

Camargo Church is being led in a meeting by Evangelist Lew D. Hill of Decatur.

On account of the ill health of his wife, O. W. Jennings has resigned the pastorate at Granite City.

Colchester Church, F. M. Branic, pastor, had eight confessions of faith on one Sunday this last month.

Colfax Church, George R. Southgate, pastor, raised its missionary apportionment of fifty dollars.

The Wilhite Evangelistic Company will conduct a meeting at Sheldon this fall. C. R. Piety is pastor of the church.

Third Church, Danville, S. S. Jones, pastor, will begin a meeting conducted by the Roy L. Brown Evangelistic Company.

West Salem Church, G. W. Ford, pastor, will begin a meeting the last of this month, under the leadership of J. V. Coombs.

Hutsonville Church, W. J. Griffin, pastor, began a meeting March 17. The missionary offering was taken March 10.

J. W. Camp of Eureka has accepted the pastorate of Emerson Church. Mr. Camp recently preached one Sunday at Lynnville.

A conference of the Cass County Sunday-school Association was held in Virginia Church March 19, when the work for the year was outlined.

Potomac Church, E. M. Norton, minister, began a meeting March 18, with home forces. This church more than reached its apportionment for foreign missions.

There have been twenty additions at Robinson since the first of the year, when William T. Walker, formerly of Mt. Vernon, Ind., began his work with this church.

J. R. Golden, West Side Church, Springfield, and Edgar D. Jones, First Church, Bloomington, attended "The World in Cincinnati" last week.

Athens Church is prospering under the leadership of D. H. Shanklin. Since the first of the year, there have been fifty additions.

L. S. Harrington, former pastor at Bellflower, has received five into the membership of Wapella Church since beginning work there the first of the year.

There were 150 plates at the Minier Men's Fellowship banquet March 21. Addresses were made by J. W. Street of Mackinaw, N. H. Robertson of Stanford, R. B. Doan of Armington, T. A. Bierbaum and J. H. Pence, both ministers of Minier, and Manuel Brannan, principal of the local high school.

Princeton Church celebrated its seventy-second anniversary March 17. J. A. Barnett of Galesburg delivered an address at the membership banquet of the Men's Brotherhood. His subject was "Men and the Kingdom." Cecil C. Carpenter is beginning the sixth year of his pastorate with this church.

Mt. Morris Church, W. T. Hacker, pastor, exceeded its apportionment for foreign missions. A lady recently presented this church with an individual communion service. Congregation and Sunday-school are striving for Front Rank standing. The pastor speaks appreciatively of his people's liberality.

An interesting and helpful conference on the problems of the rural church was held at Niantic last week. The following program was carried out:

"The Rural Community Ideal," Miss Mabel Carney, Normal.

"The Impressionable Age," S. F. Fannon, St. Elmo.

"The Minister's Work for Women," Miss M. B. Park, Carlock.

"The Minister's Work for Men," D. R. Bebout, Effingham.

"The Future of the Movement," David H. Shields, Eureka.

"The New Country Life," G. W. Brown, Paris.

"Federation and Rural Churches," Osceola McNemar, El Paso.

"The Dawn of a New Day," C. L. De Pew, Jacksonville.

The thirtieth annual session of the Northern Illinois Christian Ministerial Institute will convene at Gibson City for Tuesday and Wednesday, April 9 and 10. The president of the association is Milo Atkinson of Bloomington. The vice president is W. E. Price of Peoria, and the secretary and treasurer, G. W. Zink of Chambersburg. Following is the program:

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 9.

Theme—Social Christianity.

2:30—Devotional, Charles W. Ross, Litchfield.

3—Welcome address, L. O. Lehman, Gibson City.

3:15—Paper, "Human Nature and the Social Problem," S. H. Zendt, of Bloomington.

3:45—Opening of Discussion, C. C. Carpenter, Princeton.

4—Discussion.

TUESDAY EVENING.

7:45—Devotional, R. Everett Stevenson, Farmer City.

8:15—Address, B. A. Abbott, St. Louis, Mo.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.

Theme—Evangelism.

9:30—Devotional, George R. Southgate, Colfax.

10—Address, "Pastoral Evangelism," J. A. Barnett, Galesburg.

10:30—Address, "Special Evangelism," F. A. Sword, Lenark.

11—General discussion.

WEDNESDAY AATERNOON.

Theme—The Bible School.

2:30—Devotional, B. H. Sealock, Edinburg.

3—Bible school, Stephen E. Fisher, Champaign.

3:45—Discussion.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

7:45—Devotional, C. C. Wisher, of Saybrook.

8—Address, President Charles E. Underwood, Eureka.

Secretary's Letter.

C. R. Piety of Sheldon speaks very encouragingly of his work; audiences increasing and interest good.

Hill and Knowles are in a good meeting at Camargo, 19 added up to the 22d. They also held a good meeting at Tallula recently. Mr. Hill goes next to Mill Shoals, and will be with J. D. Dabney at Griggsville the latter part of April.

J. W. Camp of Eureka gives full time now to the Eminence Church near Atlanta.

Evangelist C. L. Organ closed a meeting at Rock Falls with 84 added, 71 confessions, large per cent men. Roy Miller is the worthy and efficient minister there. Brother Organ is now in a meeting at Christopher.

I. A. Hall of Princeton, Ind., has been called by the church at Lawrenceville and begins April 1.

Pleasant Hill Church has called C. B. Black of New Canton for half time.

Chas. D. Hougham's meeting at Woodson was much hindered by bad roads and weather, but there were 5 confessions up to the 20th. The church wants a live young preacher at once full time. They have a parsonage. H. T. Barton, clerk.

Isaac Lamb, of Paris, preaches fourth time for the Mt. Pleasant Church in Clark County.

W. I. Griffin preaches full time for the Hutsonville Church.

Since last report the following churches have attained the Illinois Front Rank standard of excellency: Lanark, Martinton and Moline. Payson and Newman enter the list and will strive to reach the standard.

If others are striving after the Standard of Excellency please report to us. We desire to have the complete list. As soon as you attain all the points please report. It will be a stimulus to others.

Bismarck has called J. J. Cosat of Danville for half time. That church is also striving for the Front Rank Standard.

Miss Daisl S. Finger, senior in Eureka College, has been preaching a good deal during her student work and is now prepared to locate with a church as pastor. Call her.

Miss Siddie E. Olive has recently located with the church at Findlay and is doing a creditable work.

Miss Myrtle B. Parke, the popular minister at Carlock, is leading the church in a building campaign.

J. E. Stout is in a meeting at Sandoval.

W. D. DEWEESE, Office Sec'y-Treas.
J. FRED JONES, Field Secretary.
Bloomington, Ill.

Eureka College

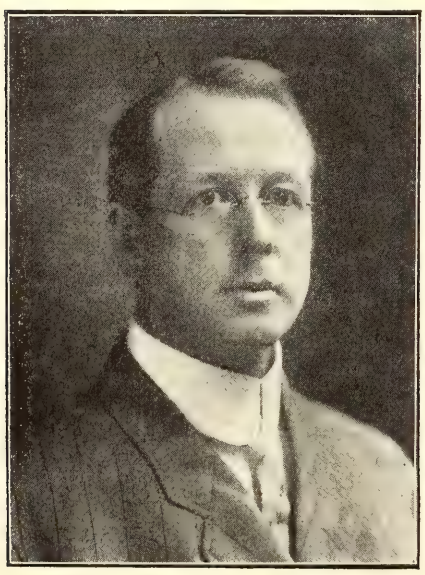
Last week we announced that the students of Eureka College had organized for a twenty-five days' campaign to raise a fund toward the new $25,000 gymnasium, which is to be erected just as soon as the money is secured. We had $847 when the campaign began March 19. The fund is now beyond $3,000. Most of this has been raised in Eureka. The students are organizing teams for active work during the Easter vacation. We hope to be able to make a good report following that. This campaign will close April 12. Further announcement will be made at that time. If the friends of Eureka College appreciate as they should the loyal support of the students in this matter, they will come forward with this fund very soon. H. H. PETERS.

Chicago

H. L. Willett was absent from Memorial pulpit last Sunday. He was University preacher at the University of Toronto.

Englewood Church has been discussing the individual communion service for some time. The sentiment against the innovation was quite strong without being arbitrary. Finally the question was settled by the adoption of a tray containing both individual cups and a common cup thus affording each communicant his choice. This arrangement is satisfactory to all.

Just when Chicago Disciples were coming to know and appreciate at something like its full value the rich Christian personality of Charles A. Pearce, for three years pastor at West Pullman, the announcement is made that he has received a call to Marion, O.,



Rev. Charles A. Pearce.

and has accepted. He will leave his Chicago field after Easter Sunday. West Pullman is on the margin of the city's suburbs. It is an industrial community. The church faces constantly the many problems due to fluctuating economic conditions, to financial limitations and to lack of lay leadership. Mr. Pierce's ministry has been one of human helpfulness in his daily contact with his people. His preaching has been wholesomely progressive and thoroughly evangelical—two qualities which men and women of our time and of all times need. His new work at Marion is in an industrial city also. The church there is party sustained by the Ohio State Board.

Church Life

Hollister, Cal., is in the midst of a campaign for prohibition, and H. B. Patterson is taking an active part in the fight.

Sturgis, Ky., Church, where C. T. Coombs is pastor, is soon to erect a $20,000 building.

D. L. Dunkelberger recently closed a meeting with his home church at Hardy, Neb., with nineteen additions.

W. H. Harding has assumed the editorial management of the Canadian monthly "The Christian" published at St. Johns, N. B.

Walter L. Martin has recently held a meeting at Lordsburg, N. M,, where D. P. Sellards is pastor. There were sixteen additions.

H. J. Corwin has accepted a call to the Third Church, Kansas City, Mo. He has been pastor at Eldon, Mo.

A. M. Harvout, pastor at Evanston, Ohio, has accepted a call to the pastorate of Central Church, Covington, Ky.

Robert Graham Frank prints in the Visitor the names of 285 contributors to the March offering for Foreign Missions. He has a right to be proud of the list.

Henry H. Webb, pastor at West Walnut Street Church, Portland, Ind., recently held a meeting at his home church with 159 additions.

The church at Kalamazoo, Mich,. recently celebrated the making of some improvements in their property by a banquet. R. L. Handley is the pastor.

The Arkansas State Convention will be held in Texarkana, on May 7-11. As a matter of fact it will be held in Texas, as the church is just across the line.

The closing address at the Indiana State Convention was delivered by Bishop Anderson, of Chicago. The subject of his address was "Christian Union."

J. J. Taylor recently closed a meeting at Sebring, O., in which 120 were added in less than four weeks. S. B. Norvail is the efficient pastor.

E. V. Huffer, formerly minister at New Holland, O., has accepted a call to the church at Leipsic, O., and is already engaged in his new work.

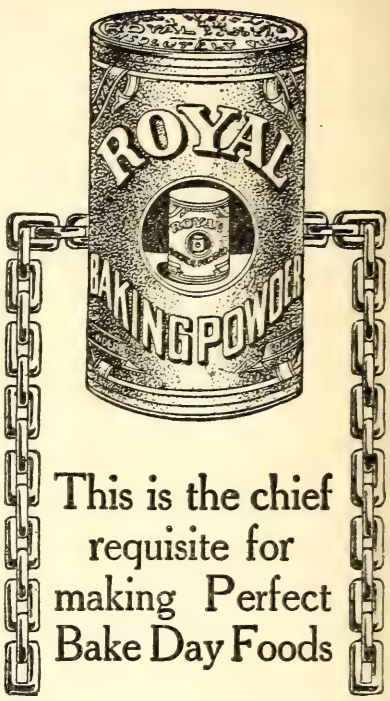
The Disciples Union of Youngstown and vicinity was organized recently at Youngstown, O., for the purpose of securing united effort on the part of the churches near. F. N. Calvin made an address.

F. M. Field, minister of the Norwood Ave. Church, of Toledo, O., recently held a two weeks' meeting at Hicksville, O., where D F. Harris ministers. There were five additions.

The Lindenwald Church at Hamilton, O., is about to let the contract for their new building, which is to cost about $15,000. Until recent years we had but one church in that city.

B. H. Cleaver, who has been in the University of Chicago for the past six months and who received the A. B. degree at the Winter convocation, has been called to the pastorate at Shelbina, Mo., and began work April 1.

Geo. L. Snively assisted Percy G. Cross in a dedication at Hot Springs, Ark., and succeeded in raising a surplus of $3,000 more than was called for. There were also thirty-five additions to the church during the day. Mr. Snively will return later for a meeting.



W. F. Reagor, pastor at Portland, Ore., recently dedicated the building of First Church, Dallas, Ore., where Leon L. Myers is pastor. The work of the church is very prosperous. The Bible-class contains 350 members.

The public schools of Kansas City closed at noon on March 26, to allow the pupils to take part in the great visitation that was planned to cover the entire city in two hours. There were 7,000 visitors and all the churches and synagogues co-operated in the effort.

Geo. L. Snively of Lewistown, Ill., will assist Edmund Miller in dedicating new church edifice at Windmere, Ind., first Sunday in May—a handsome, modernly equipped plant. Snively and Martin are in fine meeting with A. L. Chapman at Boise, Ida.

Charles R. Danial, pastor at La Junta, Colo., writes that the meeting now in progress in his church is already a success, twenty-one having joined thus far. Mr. Daniel thinks that Evangelist Findley is in every way qualified to do a great deal of work to any church.

P. C. Macfarlane, formerly secretary of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ but now living in New York and devoting himself to literary work is contributing a series of articles to Collier's Weekly on the leading preachers of America. G. H. Combs, of Kansas City, is one of the men treated in the series.

The First Baptist Church of Dallas, Tex., gave last year $47,000 for missions and benevolences. The church is large and there is only one really wealthy man in it, but the spirit of devotion on the part of the entire congregation is responsible for the remarkable showing.

The Triennial Conference of Woman's Missionary Boards held at Philadelphia, Feb., 28-29., reported thirty-eight boards represented and 150 delegates present. The jubilee report showed $1,019,000 raised. The C. W. B. M. stands the first in the amount of the jubilee offering.

There are thirty-one Disciples in Yale this year of whom twenty-three are in the Divinity School. Several of them have won honors and all are men of promise. They are organized into The Alexander Campbell Club, which is for the purpose of fostering a social spirit among the Disciples.

The bulletin of the Ulrichville, Ohio, church, where J. A. Canby is pastor, recently had an interesting account of the erection of their tabernacle which was put up in a single day by the men of the church. It will be used by the Men's Class, and will also serve for a gymnasium.

There are seven colored Disciple churches in Ohio in a colored population of about 110,000. T. J. White, southern Ohio evangelist, urges that we ought to do more for our colored brethren in our state. Surely this is reasonable. The colored brethren at Springfield are reported to have secured a lot on which they hope soon to build.

C. J. Miller, pastor at Maryville, Mo., recently joined with four other ministers of the town in a petition to the governor to commute the sentence of a condemned murderer from death to life imprisonment. The petition was on the grounds of opposition to capital punishment and also against hanging the man on circumstantial evidence.

J. W. Baker, superintendent of missions in West Washington, reports more than 300 additions for the missionaries serving in his field during the months of January and February. He himself found time to hold a meeting at Raymond, in which there were forty added to the church. Mr. Baker is now in a meeting at Camas.

Willis S. Myers of Los Angeles, Calif., and Pyrl O. Gates of Pomona, held their second meeting within twelve months at Holtsville, Calif., begining Feb. 11 and continuing six weeks. There were forty-eight additions to the church and strong resolutions of commendation were adopted by the congregation. The evangelists are to be invited back for a third campaign at some time in the future.

The Arthur Federated Council of Arthur, Ill., where H. H. Peters preaches, held an interesting session recently when two laymen from each of the four churches debated the proposition: "Resolved that the Four Churches in the Town should be United into One." Ministers were not allowed to attend and it is safe to say that some interesting opinions were expressed.

T. E. Winter, pastor at Fulton, Mo., wires us as follows: "We are having a splendid meeting with 73 accessions to date. In William Woods College Chapel, at the service on Friday, Dr. Breeden preached, and twelve girls, all who were not already Christians, confessed Christ. Thus the college is Christian in fact as well as in name. Meeting continues."

The Men's Class of the Church of Christ at Urichsville, O., have developed great enthusiasm in a handicap contest with the Men's Class of New Philadelphia. The Urichsville men were crowded for room, so they have erected a temporary tabernacle capable of seating 300 men. J. A. Canby is the minister at Urichsville, and C. A. McDonald at New Philadelphia.

The Indiana State Convention of Student Volunteers closed at the Missionary Training School Sunday night. There were 121 delegates. The occasion, the place, the spiritual atmosphere, the addresses, the conferences, the presence of so many young lives considering the mission field, was a wonderful combination of forces that builds hope for the task of world evangelization.

The American Board recently appointed a committee to see what could be done toward enlarging the quarters for our mission work in New York City. It is hoped means can be found for building an industrial plant at Greenpoint, Brooklyn. The same kind of a plant is needed in the heart of the East Side district, where our Russian Church is established. A $60,000 building fund is needed for these two places immediately.

F. F. Grim, our superintendent in New Mexico, is doing his best to keep up with the remarkable progress of this great country recently come to statehood. He has spent nearly three months of labor this year in the southern part of the state. Among other places he visited was El Paso, where our second congregation is forming, the Bible-school being already in a thrifty condition. This is where P. J. Rice is minister.

Members of the church in Anderson, Ind., assisted by members of nearly all other churches at Summitville, are making extensive preparations to entertain a large number of visitors at Summitville at the annual convention of Christian churches, Apr. 4 and 5. The district organization of the Christian Women's Board of Missions, Bible-school and missionary societies also will meet at Summitville. There are thirty churches in the district. Fifteen are in Indianapolis.

One hundred fifteen additions were the total results for the congregation of the First Christian Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, as a result of a short meeting just closed in which the preaching was done by the pastor, Harvey H. Harmon, and the singing led by De Loss Smith. Mr. Harmon will soon close the sixth year of his pastorate in that field and during this time has had the pleasure of seeing the church grow from a moderate-sized congregation to one of the largest Disciple churches in the Middle West.

The colleges are steadily adding to their equipment. Christian University, Canton, Mo., has recently received $20,000 for some needed dormitories and is at work now raising the money for their equipment. Eureka is just completing an enterprise for the equipment of a gymnasium which ought to be ready by the opening of a new year. Texas Christian University has recently sold the old property at Waco for $38,000, and will thus have more money to improve the Ft. Worth plant.

The Church of England Bishop in Argentina, recently addressed a letter to the different Christian bodies in Buenos Aires, inviting them to a conference on Christian unity. Five bodies responded, including the representatives of the Disciples of Christ, of course. While it is not expected that the initial conference will accomplish much of a definite character, yet the mere holding of the meeting will be very significant. It is the testimony of the missionaries in South America that the division of the church is one of the main hindrances to the work there as it is here.

Harold E. Monser assisted the South Geddes St. Church of Christ at Syracuse, N. Y., where C. R. Stauffer ministers, in a five weeks' meeting. There was a total of 52 added to the church as a result of the meeting. All but six of the converts were adults. This is a remarkable meeting, considering that just a year previous a meeting of over 50 was held by H. F. Lutz. This makes a total of 171 that have been added to the South Geddes St. Church since entering its new building 26 months ago. The Sunday-school has averaged 293 during March, with a record attendance of 308 Mar. 10.

Sixty Years the Standard
DR PRICE'S CREAM BAKING POWDER
A Cream of Tartar Powder
Made from Grapes
NO ALUM

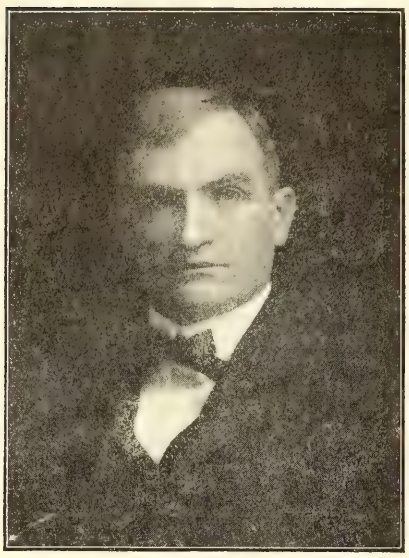
The First Christian Church in Lincoln, Nebraska, in its recent church report showed a total of $10,785.79 raised for all purposes during the year. Outside of local expenses and payments on the new church building a total of $2,194.01 was expended for missions and benevolences. The church is a Living Link in Nebraska State work with S. R. McClure as evangelist. It also supports Miss Olive Griffith as its missionary in India and Mrs. W. L. Mellinger under the C. W. B. M., at Monterey, Mexico. Out of an enrollment in the Sunday-school of 660, the average attendance per Sunday during the year was 386. The church now has a membership of 1,200, 923 of these being resident.

J. L. Thompson, pastor at Greeley, Colo., writes: "Our second 'pastor-evangelist' meeting closed with 128 additions, all bills paid and everybody happy. The meeting last year resulted in 103 accessions to the church and continued three weeks. This year we labored 18 nights with the above results. Miss Rachel Dangerfield assisted in personal work and preached one night. Brother O. J. Marks sang one week for us and it is not necessary to say that he is one of the best as he is too well-known to need this word of praise. Miss Dangerfield has been employed as county evangelist under the direction of the Bible-school Union. She is eminently qualified for this work."

The Disciples' Missionary Union of New York City is pushing its work in a thoroughly aggressive manner. With the assistance of the American Christian Missionary Society, it is proposed to spend something like $10,000 for city mission work for the next year. When the vastness of the field is considered, this seems hopelessly inadequate and yet it is a substantial advance and it is to be hoped that it will be more than successful. Every day the great weakness of the Disciples' movement becomes more and more apparent in their failure to enter the cities. We find ourselves with a large rural membership, in some communities predominating among the religious forces, and yet we have not the influence that of right belongs to us on account of the failure of our fathers to realize the importance of entering the great centers of population. There are eleven churches cooperating in the Union and the work is reported encouraging and in many respects most hopeful. The Disciples of Greater New York have the sympathy and coöperation of their brethren all over the country in their effort to meet the call of the hour.

Executive Officials of Disciples' Congress

To Be Held in Kansas City, April 16-18



Rev. Levi Marshall, of Nevada, Mo.

Rev. Burris A. Jenkins, Pastor Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Where the Congress Will Be Held.

Rev. L. J. Marshall, Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City.

At Rudolph, O., where Chas. Richards ministers, a good meeting resulting in 21 additions, mostly adults, was recently held. Z. E. Bates, minister at Bowling Green, assisted Mr. Richards for several evenings. This was a good meeting for a small village, considering the fact that a meeting with 39 additions was held there a year ago.

David N. Wetzel writes: "Many of the churches are planning for a great day in connection with the "World in Cincinnati." Some are expecting at least 4,000 of their own people on their special day. Christian Church day should rank with the best. This will be a high day for our people, and we are counting on great numbers. There will be two services, one at one p. m., the other at 5:30 p. m. These will be held in Music Hall in addition to the exposition and the pageant of darkness and light. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, A. E. Cory, of China, Dr. Royal J. Dye, of Africa, Dr. A. L. Shelton, of Tibet, will be some of our principal speakers. Never has Cincinnati and community been stirred with a religious gathering as they are at the present time.

Seventh St. Christian Church, Richmond, Va., has taken an active part in securing a Juvenile Court for Richmond. The pastor, H. D. C. Maclachlan, was appointed on a joint committee from the Juvenile Protective Association and the police commissioners of the city to put the matter before the city council committee on charter and ordinance. The council committee unanimously agreed to act upon the suggestions of the committee appearing before them in their recommendation back to the city council. The result is an established court, which has two well-fitted rooms—one a large reception room where parents and guardians will wait with their charges until the judge is able to receive them, and the other, the room for the court investigation. The latter room resembles a private office more than it does a court room. Police Justice John Crutchfield is the judge for this juvenile court, and J. Hodge Ricks is the probation officer. Judge Crutchfield will, as a good judge of young delinquents, not only pass judgment on them, but will also have inquiry made into the conditions of the home life of the children. In all the operations of the court, the endeavor will be to "get at the root of the evil instead of passing superficially over the lawlessness that resulted in the child being arrested." The Seventh St. people rejoice in this advance step that Richmond has taken, and are glad that they could have a part in it.

English Topics

(Continued from page 13)

church is in the world for the purpose of mediation and should regard herself as divinely called to minister to the world's need.

Summary.

As one looks back upon a series of meetings of this kind, one's soul instinctively gathers up those things which are fundamental and eternal, and gradually sets on one side those things which are external and passing. It is inevitable that many things which are said and done are mere acts of scene shifting. To my mind those things which are essential and eternal are not matters of form and ritual—not matters of policy and method—not distinctions between clergy and laity—not matters of wages and hours—not questions of criticism, high or low—but the question of the relationship of the individual soul to God. All of these things may be worth our consideration in so far as there is need to explain them, or to clear them out of the way, or to adjust them, or to use them for the purpose of opening up a better and a clearer avenue of approach to Him. The one who rests contented with these things alone will find himself hopeless. I do not believe that we have yet realized the greatest harm which comes from our divisions. It is not that it hinders the conquest of the heathen world for Christ—nor yet even that it interferes with the exercise of charity amongst Christian people, but it is that it draws the attention of the Christian world—yes, and the non-Christian world—away from the essentials of religion, to the mere externalities. We are at heart one. Yes, but how little consideration there is of the heart of things! Our pulpits and our platforms have been too much given to the discussion of our peculiarities and to the advancement of our idiosyncrasies. Let us get to the heart of things. Judge the next convention which you attend by this principle!

"Wringcliff," Priory Road,
Hornsey, London.

A Moonshiner Who Turned About

(Continued from page 12)

the daughter, passed before Dock Mitchell was about again. The vital forces weakened not readily withstand such an injury to the by long indulgence in the use of drink, could system, and it was the middle of July before Mitchell was fully restored to health. Mollie had been faithful on her attendance upon him. The boys were in the mill now that school was out, and their paltry earn-

Subscribers Wants

Readers of the Christian Century find its columns valuable for advertising their wants or wares. The charge is one cent for each word, with a minimum of thirty cents for each insertion. Cash must accompany the order to save bookkeeping.

DO YOU NEED HYMN BOOKS for Church or Sunday-school? Write for prices, care of M, New Christian Century Co.

CHURCH CLERK: Do you need church letters? We furnish a well designed letter in blocks of fifty at 50 cents. Write us, care of X, New Christian Century Co.

MOTHERS' DAY Songs and Program. Chas. M. Fillmore, 1914 Commerce Ave., Indianapolis, Ind.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
New York, 142 West 81st St.
Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
Established 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE INDIVIDUAL
"Noiseless"
CUSHIONED TRAYS
4 Different Features
WHY?
1st—"Noiseless"—As all cup holes are cushioned.
2nd—Dust-proof—The Trays interlock.
3rd—A short glass—no need of tipping back the head.
4th—Automatic Filler—Fills rapidly and evenly.
Does not mar the sacredness of the service.
Write for booklet. Outfit sent on trial.
DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
107 No. Dearborn St., Dept. T., Chicago.

ings were all that she had to depend on for the support of the home. As soon as her father could be left alone, she went back to the mill. As he grew stronger, she was grateful to see him assisting with the household tasks and helping to prepare the meals so that her labors would be lessened when she and her two hungry brothers came home from the mill work.

She lived, however, in constant fear that he would go back to his old haunts and felt a thrill of relief every time she came home and found him still there. She hoped that he would show some desire to go to work, but she never hinted such a thing lest he might elect to follow his old calling which she dreaded far worse than his idle ways.

* * * * *

It was a sultry night in August. The little pine church was filled with people who never lost an opportunity to attend "protracted meetin'." Men in their shirt-sleeves, collarless, unshaven; stout matronly women and young mothers with babies in their arms; young men and maidens and many little children, made up the audience. Mollie was there and so was Miss Dexie. The latter sat almost facing the audience. Already in her short acquaintance of one year she knew the life history of many of them and she looked into their tired, worn faces with sympathetic interest.

The "preacher" was a thin, spare man, his face marked with lines indicating a strong emotional nature; full of restless energy, he paced up and down gesticulating wildly, constantly tossing his arms and running his fingers through his long black locks as he denounced with fiery eloquence the sins of his hearers, and pictured with all the dramatic power at his command the terrors of eternal damnation. The people listened with breathless attention, and many responded to the invitation to come forward to the anxious seat.

Mollie Mitchell remained in her seat seemingly indifferent but in reality sad at heart as she witnessed these scenes. Her religious ideals had changed under the sweet and wholesome influence of Miss Dexie, and she regretted exceedingly that these gusty fits of weak emotionalism should be mistaken for the strong, deep forces that shaped the lives of those she trusted most. In spite of the feeling, however, she had a desire to see her father among the anxious ones. After all, it might mean something. He had been present at all the meetings standing outside with others near the open window, and apparently losing no word of the preacher's message. Tonight he stood in the doorway, and as Mollie now and then glanced at him, it seemed to her his face showed signs of a sharp mental struggle.

The last invitation had been given, and the closing hymn was being sung, and Mollie looked once more—he was gone. The meeting broke up and Mollie, wondering, walked home in company with some of the other young people. She lighted the little oil lamp and waited, but he did not come. Finally, she went to bed, and in spite of her anxieties she slept the sleep of tired youth. Next morning, as she was preparing breakfast, her father came in. He looked pale and haggard, but there was a new light in his eye and a firmness in his step, and Mollie was reassured.

Under the silent stars of the peaceful summer night, this wayward child of the mountains had kept his lonely vigil. The preacher's sledge-hammer methods had not been entirely in vain, and who shall say that the daughter's patience and forbearance had been without effect; and as he lay prone upon the ground, the stars witnessed the conflict as the forces of heaven and hell contended for allegiance within the awakening soul. The day broke, the miracle had been wrought, and Dock Mitchell was a new man.

His first move was significant. At the breakfast table he remarked, "Mollie, girl, I reckon you needn't go back to the mill any more, I've been to see Mr. Gray an' he's give me a job an' I'm goin' to work this mornin'."

It was enough. Mollie was content. The star of hope had dawned upon her horizon, bringing with it the promise of better things.

PORTABLE STOVE COOKING —AND— HEATING

Saves Fuel Bills, Saves Dirt, Work and Drudgery.

SIMPLE IN CONSTRUCTION, DURABLE, AND ABSOLUTELY SAFE

COMBINES ECONOMY, COMFORT and CONVENIENCE

COMBINED COOKING AND HEATING—The Portable Stove will boil, bake, fry, roast—cook anything. Ideal for quick meals, washing, ironing, hot water, hot milk, canning fruit, camping. Summer or Winter Stove. Oil automatically turned into gas furnishes a steady, intense heat, passed into radiator and distributed throughout the room; or condensed under cooking vessels the heat is absorbed by articles being cooked.

Two-Burner with Oven

Heat under control. Not dangerous like gasoline. No valves. No wicks—all parts open—nothing to clog—close up or get out of order.

THE PORTABLE STOVE

is simple in construction. No complicated machinery to get out of order. The oil flows from the reservoir into the open steel burner bowl, where it is converted into a heavy gas. This gas is carried into the open-air cylinder, where it is superheated and given the required amount of air to make combustion and give the greatest amount of heat for the smallest use of oil. As will be seen, all parts are open—the burner bowl, air mixer, the cylinder or chimney. Nothing to clog or close up. The stove furnishes its own heat to generate the gas.

CHEAP FUEL

Kerosene or coal oil, is recognized the world over as providing economic fuel. The difficulty has been in securing methods that would use it both economically and satisfactorily. The Portable Stove solves the problem. It furnishes the family need. It burns this common fuel, giving an intense heat, but concentrated under cooking vessel, absorbed by articles being cooked—not thrown out to overheat your kitchen. In every section of country coal and wood are getting higher in price. The continual discovery of new oil fields in different parts of the country has furnished oil in abundance. The Portable Stove is a practical method of using this fuel. It also saves work and dirt. The intense heat provides quickly cooked meals.

EASILY REGULATED

The flow of oil is easily controlled by the adjuster on the end of the reservoir. Each burner has its own reservoir and adjuster. The height of the flame is easily lowered or raised with this adjuster More oil—higher flame. Less oil—lower flame No oil—flame shut off.

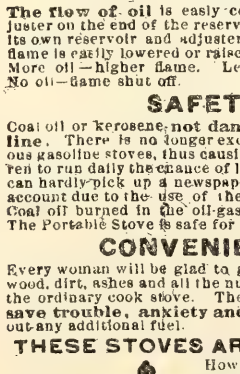
SAFETY

Coal oil or kerosene not dangerous like gasoline. There is no longer excuse for using dangerous gasoline stoves, thus causing mothers and children to run daily the chance of losing their lives. One can hardly pick up a newspaper without seeing an account due to the use of the deadly gasoline. Coal oil burned in the oil-gas stove is a safe fuel. The Portable Stove is safe for every day family use.

CONVENIENCE

Every woman will be glad to get rid of the coal or wood, dirt, ashes and all the nuisance that goes with the ordinary cook stove. The Portable Stove will save trouble, anxiety and annoyance, without any additional fuel.

THESE STOVES ARE PORTABLE



One-burner Stove and Radiator

How convenient on a hot summer day to take out on the porch for a quick meal, or for coffee on a warm Sunday night, or in the shed for washing or ironing. The Portable Stove can easily be carried to a church for a social or to picnics or to camping grounds. One of our customers, Chas. Schaufler, Calif. who is a railroad man, said he used their stove on a caboose and was able to cook with the hard and fast running of the train. We cannot imagine anything more convenient for heating a cold dining room or bedroom in winter. Being portable they can easily be moved to any part of the house and are always ready for instant use The new Model 1912 contains many valuable improvements, which add greatly to the efficiency of the stove.

DURABILITY

They are made of steel throughout, thoroughly tested before shipping. Sent complete, ready for use as soon as received. Nicely finished with nickel trimming, and they will last for years.

OVENS FOR BAKING

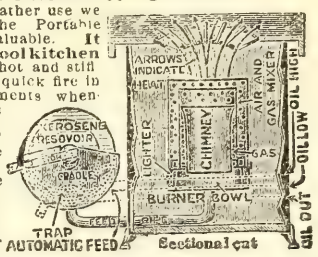
The ovens furnished with the Portable Stove are splendid bakers, handsomely finished throughout, made of sheet steel full lined with tin plate, removable shelves.

RADIATORS FOR HEAT

The radiators are placed over the burner The heat of the stove is thrown from the surface of the radiator, giving a cheerful heat. It is convenient size and when not in use can be laid to one side

SUMMER STOVE

For hot weather use we consider the Portable Stove invaluable. It means a cool kitchen instead of hot and stifling a hot, quick fire in a few moments whenever you want it Think of the time wasted in starting the old cook stove before it gets hot enough to cook, and the overheated kitchen after it is started REMEMBER this stove consumes no fuel except when in use. Put this stove in your home—you will find it convenient and a delightful stove to use in summer and winter.



WHAT USERS SAY

"It is so convenient and economical." Rev. P.V Hawkins, Ohio. "It is clean, convenient, no trouble, burns steadily; perfect baking." Henry Schilling, Ill. "For baking it has no equal." V. E. Bostwick, O. "Bakes pies, cakes, bread; never saw nicer baking done." Mrs. O. Thompson, O. "Never cooked meals so quick and easy." James Newark, Mich. "Baked, cooked, washed, ironed—can do anything my range does." Mrs. M. E. King, Ky. "Cooked for a family of 6 for 5 days with 3 quarts of oil; they are great time and fuel savers." H. M Ireyla. "Heated a room when the temperature was 10 degrees below zero with one radiator." Wm. Baering Ind. "With the radiator it soon warms up our dining room." J F. Lisson, Calif. "We are using it to heat our office." McPherson Co., K.I.

ECONOMY—E. N. Helwig, Ont., "Only used a half gallon of oil last week for cooking, baking and ironing" F. G Boylston, S. C. "Cooked for a family of six five days—only three quarts of oil." Wm Stapley, Ariz. "Your oil-gas stove was just as expected it to be after reading your description. With one gallon of oil we did the cooking for a family nine persons, six of them grown, for three days and one meal, besides doing the small ironing. The oil cost 35c. Wood cost $6.00 per cord here " Fred Hadder, Wis., "Moved my old cook stove in the wood shed. You won't catch me sawing or carrying any more wood This is a snap for me."

SAFETY—Mrs. E. R. McClellan, Ills., says "It is safe and clean as a lamp, and children that can be trusted with a Kerosene lamp can be trusted with this stove," Mrs. P. P. Leberer, Mich. "Easy to run quick to heat—no danger of explosion. D L Dennis, Ind., "Makes no dirt, no trouble to operate; takes very little fuel; no danger possible; makes plenty of heat. H. N Flora. O., "Perfectly safe, a person can operate them without constant worry of danger.

CLEANLINESS—Mrs. S. R. Croft, speaks of this when she says: "There is no smoke, dirt, or ashes to bother with. It is easy and simple to operate, very clean and safe to handle; is away ahead of coal or wood fire." E. J. Free, Me. "It don't smoke, is easy to operate, and we find it clean." Wm. Irsh, Mo. "A splendid baker and cooker, although we use the cheapest grade of oil. For good work, simplicity, economy and cleanliness, it is simply perfection itself." Mrs. J. F Hascall, Fla. "It does not leak at all; it is a great comfort. The oven is a beauty and bakes fine—not heavy to move from place to place, and convenient in size and shape W. O. Poe, Mo. says: Can cook a meal in 20 minutes; baked biscuits in 4 minutes." Mrs. Ella Holleman, Tenn., "Takes less oil to cook a meal than is often used to kindle a fire in the old stove. Cooking was a burden because of heat. This oil stove is a pleasure."

DON'T FAIL to write today for full information. The price of these stoves is remarkably low—only $3.25 up, any number of burners. No sold in stores. See catalogue with testimonials from hundreds of patrons, sent free; also full information regarding our Portable Stove

AGENTS MAKE MONEY Quick, Easy, Sure. Show stove MAKING GAS—people stop, look, excited—want it—buy. B. L. Huested, Mich. "Was out one day—sold 11 stoves." W. E. Baird, S. C. "You have the best stove on the market; sold 9 in 2 hours; I do not fear competition," (first ordered 1—200 since) Chas. P Schroeder, Conn., bought 40 stoves one order. Head & Frazer, Tex. write "Sell like hot cakes; sold 50 stoves in our town". J. W. Hunter, Ala., secured 1—tested it—ordered 100 since. J. G. R Gauthreaux, La., ordered 1; 155 since. So they go. These men MAKE MONEY. You have the same chance. You should make from $10 to $15 a day Write for our selling plan. Do it today. Send no money.

THE WORLD MFG. CO. 1372 World Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio

Great Premium Offer

in connection with

The Gospel of the Kingdom

BY JOSIAH STRONG

The Lessons in Social Christianity, published monthly by The New Christian Century Co., are now used by hundreds of classes throughout the country. The subscription price, 50 cents per year, brings them within the reach of all members of a class.

We believe the message they contain should be heard by every Bible, Adult Sunday School, or Y. M. C. A. Class, and Church Brotherhood in the country. To this end, and to repay somewhat the work of organizing classes, we offer

FREE

To Any Minister or Layman

who organizes a new class, or induces a class already organized, to take up these studies, and who secures

50 ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS OR OVER

One cloth-bound copy of The New

Encyclopedia of Social Reform

Edited by W. D. P. BLISS Price, $7.50

"A perfect mine of information."—Dr. ALBERT SHAW, Editor "Review of Reviews."

This is a great chance for you to get the most authoritative treasury of social facts and forces extant—and without costing you a cent. Remember The Gospel of the Kingdom is only 50 cents a year—it really does not cost so much as is usually paid for Sunday School quarterlies. And it comes fresh every month.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY COMPANY 700 East 40th Street, Chicago

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX April 11, 1912 Number 15

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SERMON OF THE SEED
BY IDA WITHERS HARRISON

FEATURES OF COMING DISCIPLES' CONGRESS WITH COMPLETE PROGRAM AND PORTRAITS

"YET WITHOUT SIN"
A POST-LENTEN STUDY

CASTING OUT DEMONS
BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

BARTON W. STONE'S GRAVE
BY GEORGE A. CAMPBELL

BERKELEY'S DECISIVE FORWARD STEP
AN EDITORIAL

CHICAGO

FOREIGN MISSION NEWS

In Suspense

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first half of March were very encouraging; but during the last half of the month they were disappointing. The month closed with $46,015, a loss of $7,821. The loss from the churches, as churches, amounts to $4,568. There was also a loss in annuities of $2,900. However, there was a gain of $808 in bequests and the Endeavor Societies and miscellaneous receipts show a small gain. The loss in the number of contributing churches was twenty-one. It is gratifying to be able to report that the churches gave an average of $3 more this year than last. This is a wholesome indication.

It is only just to the churches to remind ourselves that during the whole month of March the weather was very stormy and not favorable to good offerings, and the first Sunday in March was one of the worst. This greatly effects the country churches especially.

The showing for the first six months of the current missionary year has some encouraging features. There has been a gain of 202 contributing churches. The gain in regular receipts amounts to $1,271, and the gain in bequests amounts to $2,012. The loss in annuities for the first six months is $3,825 The total receipts for six months is $84,583, a loss of $541.

The above are the facts. The churches and friends should arouse themselves at once. The work will suffer if the receipts are allowed to go back. Just now we have a number of new buildings being erected on the mission fields that must be completed and a considerable outlay is involved.

Our Lord expects us to do our duty. Let us prove ourselves worthy disciples of Him who gave his life for the redemption of the whole world.

The Foreign Society has made a gain each year for the past three years, and the total gain for that period is about $104,000. We must go forward this year. It would be a real calamity to retreat. God is calling upon us as never before to move forward on the kingdom of darkness.

We ask the churches tob eprompt in sending their gifts. The money is needed. It ought to be fowarded to do the work for which it was intended by the donors. Send to F. M. Rains, Secy., Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Notes from the Foreign Society

The church at Hutchinson, Kansas, was compelled on account of bad weather to defer its offering until the last Sunday in March. O. L. Cook, the pastor, says, "It was the most enthusiastic service ever held. The responses from those present were almost unanimous." This good church is a Living-link in the foreign society. It is growing and prosperous. It has the evangelistic temper and the missionary spirit.

The Forest Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y., took its offering March 31, which amounted to $535, and it will reach a higher mark. This church supports H. A. Baker, who goes to Tibet. C. H. Plopper is the useful pastor.

News comes that the plague is very bad in Damoh, India. This is the first time plague has come to that place in its history. The city is nearly deserted, only about 1,000 left. It is said the plague will cease only with the coming of the hot season. This is certain to interfere somewhat with our great work in that important center.

Dr. C. C. Drummond, Harda, India, writes as follows: "Our work goes on about as usual. During February we treated 750 outpatients. The attendance at the dispensary was 1,741. We go to Jubbulpore next week to attend the annual convention."

Dr. C. C. Drummond, Harda, India, reports the baptism of their youngest son, Clarence.

W. R. Holder of Birmingham, Ala., has been appointed a missionary by the foreign society to Africa. He starts on his long journew May 15. The churches in Birmingham will support him.

H. A. Baker and wife, new missionaries of the foreign society for Tibet, will sail for China May 4, on the S. S. Persia. They will stop in China until about August, when it is hoped that Dr. A. L. Shelton will be able to join them and return to Batang to continue their work.

Leslie Wolfe, Manila, P. I., under date of February 15, says, "During the month of January 68 were added by baptism in Manila, and 14 in the Tagalog Province, or 82 in all for the Manila Station. We had 237 baptisms here for the calendar year 1911."

The great University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa, takes its foreign missionary offering on Easter Sunday. They are hoping to make it the largest offering in the history of that splendid congregation. It is indeed a great missionary center.

The church at Covina, Cal., D. F. Stafford, minister, expects to make the first Sunday in June a great day and raise the salary of E. R. Moon, their living link in Africa.

H. C. Connelly, minister of the Grant Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Minn., sends about twice as much as the church gave last year for foreign missions, and says, "I am determined not to be satisfied until the church becomes a living link."

The Congo's Call for a Physician

It is estimated that there are five million people in the comparatively small district for which our missionaries are responsible in the Congo. For this vast number of people we have but one medical missionary, Dr. L. F. Jaggard. He has been home on a necessary furlough and is just now returning to his post at Longa. For each five million people in America there are 12,000 physicians. The Disciples of Christ in America probably have over 3,000 physicians to their credit. Can all these men stay in the Homeland with a clear conscience when poor Africa cals so loudly for help? Dr. Jaggard is the only physician in the midst of a population as great as that of Illinois.

For two years the Foreign Society has called for a physician to go to the Congo. There should be three to go. We have four mission stations and they have been granted by the government with the specific understanding that a doctor would be located at each. A medical missionary is the entering wedge to the people's heart in Congo. Not only so, but the sickness and suffering of the people without the aid of Christian medical science is dreadful. Not only so, but the keenest anxiety is felt for our missionaries. Some of them have been absolutely inaccessible to a physician for months. Now that Dr. Jaggard returns, a number will be one hundred miles from him. We dread to think of the consequences if any of these faithful workers should be stricken with illness. We are very grateful to God for His wonderful care during these recent months. Is there no young, qualified physician among us who will give his life to this great field? Only the heavenly Father can measure the service of such a life. The needed physician should sail at once. The people are dying; the lives of our workers are in jeopardy; the hour calls for men who are not afraid. Dr. Zenas Loftis said on his way to far Tibet: "I am thankful that you sent me way up here where the people are so much more the bond-servants of sin, that I might give myself to the most needy people in the world." Who will answer this challenge and respond, "Here am I, oh Lord, send me?"

Playing at Missions

The gate receipts at the six games between the Philadelphia Athletics and the N. Y. Giants for the world's baseball championship exceeded the total receipts of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society for the past year. A. McLean used to say that we are only playing at missions but it is to be feared that we are not even playing a game that is interesting enough to bring in a creditable amount of funds for admission to see the performance.

Funny Givers

Mr. A., a vestryman of Mt. Zion parish, listened to a missionary statement of the work of a new mission in a destitute neighborhood. "It is a good work," said he, "a very good work. I'll give a dollar to help it on." The next day Mr. A. went on a pleasure trip to a distant city; stopped at a first-class hotel, and rode around to see various points of interest. The trip cost him $100.

Miss B. took out of her purse fifty cents to help buy some coal for a poor widow's family in a back street, but left in the other compartment of the purse a $10 bill that was to be used for buying some trimmings for a new dress.

Mrs. C. was very much interested in paying off the church debt. She finally concluded that she could afford to give $10, but finding that the ring she was about purchasing was more expensive that she at first thought, changed her gift to the church to $5. The other $5 went to help pay for the ring.

Accused and Found Guilty

The Missionary Educational League of Detroit, Mich., has recently conducted a trial in which the church was indicted by the missionaries to Moslem countries for the failure to bring the message of Christ to the inhabitants of the Moslem lands. The "attorney for the prosecution" read the following indictment: "The missionaries working among Moslems unite in accusing the Christian church of most glaring negligence in view of the fact that they have held their Savior Jesus Christ too much to themselves, and have not shared him with the 200,000,000 Moslems, who blindly and in fatalistic fear follow in the belief that Mohammed was the true prophet of God. The Moslem situation has come to such a point today that unless the church arouses itself to the situation, the possibilities of a Pan-Islamic movement will make the very foundation of Christendom totter. Islam in Arabia is in a condition of stagnation; in Persia, disintegration; in Egypt, attempted reformation; in Morocco, degredation; in China, neglect; in India, opportunity; in Java, conversion of Islam; and in Africa, a peril. The accusers realize that Jesus Christ alone can bring life to Arabia, unity to Persia, rebirth to Egypt, light to Morocco, penetrate the neglected parts of Moslem China, win Malaysia, meet the opportunity in India and stop the aggressive peril in Africa. In view of these facts, the Christian church is accused of neglect in regard to its duty and privilege in relation to the Moslem work."

The Christian Century
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The Sermon of the Seed

I SUPPOSE THAT MOST OF US HAVE wondered, at some time or other, why it is that Spring never grows stale to us. We know the usual law of life—that the frequent repetition of a thing robs it of its charm; but we find this beautiful season casts the same spell over us in mature years that it did when our childish hands gathered its first snowdrops and crocuses.

* * *

There are many reasons why this is so; one is that the beauty of Spring is enhanced by strong contrast—the contrast of its own light and warmth and color and fragrance and music, against winter's cloud and cold and storm and death. And beauty, I take it, is not only the satisfying of our senses, it is also the satisfying of our souls—it is one of the fulfilments of our upward reach after ideals. When I see the beauty of a flower, a sunset, a woman, the heavenly beauty of a child, it is not only my eye that is delighted; when I hear some lovely cadence in music, it is not only my ear that is pleased—but in some mysterious way, my soul's craving for perfection is satisfied.

* * *

This beauty of Spring has its own peculiar and haunting charm because it is so brief and fleeting. How quickly it comes, this ephemeral blush of peach and apple bloom—there seems something of magic in it. I remember one morning in spring looking at my peach trees as I left home, and noting that they were not yet in bloom; when I returned in the afternoon they were clothed in all the bravery of their pink blossoms. And they go as quickly as they came—the jonquil, the daffodil, the lilac, the syringa; they have the evanescence, the glamor, of a vision—you hardly dare call them your own ere they are gone. I believe in these times of brief and beautiful bloom we should make it a duty, as far as possible, to lay aside the cares that infest most of our days, and yield ourselves entirely to seeing and thinking on these things that are altogether lovely. Herrick's lines To Daffodils give us the underlying feeling of pathos that the beauty of these fleeting flowers always suggests:

Fair daffodils, we weep to see
  You haste away so soon;
As yet the early rising sun
  Has not attained his noon.
Stay, stay, until the wasting day
  Has run but to the even-song;
And having prayed together, we
  Will go with you along.

We have short time to stay as you,
  We have as brief a Spring,
As quick a growth to meet decay,
  As you, or anything.
We die as your hours do, and dry
  Away like to the summer rain;
Or as the pearls of morning dew,
  Ne'er to be found again.

But the deepest reason for Spring's undying hold on our hearts is because it is full of parables that help us to explain some of the problems of life. The question of miracle has been much discussed, in a very rationalistic spirit. But every student and lover of nature sees miracles all about him at this crowning time of the year; yet custom has blinded many of us to wonders as inexplicable as those wrought by our Lord. One of the greatest scientists of the day, Sir Oliver Lodge, has this to say about miracles:

"The reign of the miraculous has been hastily and illegitimately denied. So long as we do not imagine it to be a region denuded of a law and order of its own, akin to the law and order of the psychological realm, our denial has no foundation. . . . Miracles are no more impossible, no more lawless, than the interference of a human being would seem to a colony of ants and bees."

* * *

Why should it be thought incredible that God, the Giver of life, should raise a being from the dead? I believe it is George Macdonald who says that death is as great a miracle as resurrection. A man, instinct with life and energy touches an electric wire, and in an instant that masterpiece of creation, who lives and loves and thinks and works, becomes a lifeless clod—and in a brief time is dissolved into the earth from whence he came. What becomes of that something, call it spirit, or soul, or mind, what you will, that made him a man, rather than a lump of clay? And yet, no one thinks of denying the marvel of death, because it cannot be explained. Each Spring gives us a fresh and vivid answer to that old question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Our Lord has given us the most familiar and expressive picture of our life after death in the bare grain, and the corn of wheat. Nothing tells that story of hope like the seed we plant—small, insignificant, with nothing about it to prophesy the coming glory of leaf and flower and stately growth. And if God so clothes the seed, that can only win its fruition of bloom and beauty by burial and death, how much more will he clothe us with the immortal spiritual body—though our poor vision can only see the natural body, sown in dishonor and corruption?

* * *

This is the message of unfailing interest that Spring brings. If we have but eyes to see and ears to hear, each seed that we plant is a preacher of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. And this linking of Spring's most common and humble things with the deepest and highest cravings of the heart—surely, this is the secret of its perpetual charm, and its undying hold on our affections!

It would seem, then, that this peerless season, when the air is full of murmuring voices, telling of the victory of life over death, was the inevitable time for the world's great central event to take place—the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ.

I. W. H.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Roman Catholics and the Juvenile Court Act

The work of Judge Lindsay in Denver has made the Juvenile Court known and esteemed throughout America. The idea of trying juvenile offenders under a specialist with extraordinary powers for dealing with the delinquency, has approved itself to the public mind. The work of Judge Pinckney in Chicago has been faithful and efficient even though less known than that of Judge Lindsay. During this past year several attempts have been made to break down the force of the Juvenile Court act through certain amendments that would entirely devitalize the system. Peter Bartzen, the celebrated "rampaging Peter," has been interested to interfere with the workings of the civil service that he may take care of his political pets. He has created needless positions that henchmen may fill them and demoralize the county institutions so it will take years to repair the damage. Since the Juvenile Court disposes of many children in a year to institutions, the celebrated Bartzen found in this court an enemy of his kind of administration, and a hindrance to his schemes. Two institutions in the city that have thrown the weight of their influence to the Bartzen administration are Catholic institutions. These refused to submit their records to an official audit and to protect themselves against further demands of this sort have turned to fight the whole merit system and the Juvenile Court act along with Peter Bartzen. These facts have for some time been matters of common talk among the social workers of Chicago, but it has only been in very recent times that the evidence has come to be sufficiently conclusive to permit careful journals like the Survey to take cognizance of the facts. Catholic interference in politics is always bad but specially unfortunate when they fight such great institutions as the Juvenile Court.

The Municipal Voters' League

The recent aldermanic election in Chicago brings to our attention again the Municipal Voters' League. In 1896 fifty-eight out of sixty-eight of the Chicago aldermen were organized for spoil. At this time the league was formed and after only four years it had a majority in the council and after four more years only seventeen out of seventy aldermen did not enjoy the full confidence of the league. The method of the organization has been to look up the records of the different candidates and give publicity to the facts. There are certain notorious wards where even the facts have no weight and through the years the city keeps "Hinky-Dink" and "Bath-house John." However, these individuals have in recent years found their powers very greatly curtailed. Chicago now has the best city council of any of the larger cities. The reason we still suffer from graft and corruption is to be found in the divided authority of the great city. Without a new charter that will give Chicago home rule and a concentrated authority, corruption will go on.

Anti-Saloon Progress

The recent elections in Illinois give the usual record of victory and defeat as various municipalities wrestle with the problem of the saloon. The return of Rockford with its population of 45,000 to the dry column makes the net result of the elections a heavy loss for the saloon men. This is the second time Rockford has gone dry in recent years. There has been an interim of saloon rule in which period the saloons have been usually disorderly and criminal. During the years the business men have studied the effect of the two kinds of policy upon the city and have decided that all business gains by the absence of saloons. The factory men continue to spend most of their wages but now it goes to the grocer and clothing man instead of the saloon. Collections are found to be much better in the dry rule. The city council anticipated the change this year by arranging their budget before election in such way as not to need the saloon revenue which was fifty thousand per year.

The Socialists Lose in Milwaukee

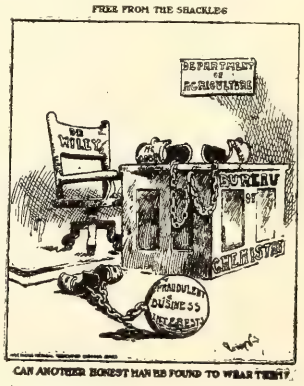
Since Milwaukee was the largest city in the world that was under Socialist administration, it was an event of more than passing importance for the party to be defeated this Spring. There is to be a fusionist administration to replace the regime of the Socialists. The issue in the campaign just closed was phrased by the fusionists as Americanism against Socialism. The election showed that the thirty thousand votes for the Socialist ticket are genuine Socialist votes and not mere votes of protest. In a previous election, a corrupt political machine was rebuked by the Socialist vote but this year the choice was a different one. The Socialists were defeated not by growing weaker but by having their opponents of the two old parties unite against them.

Now that the Socialist administration is coming to an end, we may begin to assess its value. It has suffered from the handicap of inexperience in administrative work on the part of new officials. It has also had difficulties in financing its programs owing to the opposition of the money power in Milwaukee. It is to be admitted, however, that many excellent reforms have been inaugurated. The Augean stables of a corrupt party regime have been cleansed. New parks have been projected and public works of important carried on. Some of the biggest plans of the party were never realized owing to the fact that there was no enabling legislation on the part of the state legislature.

If one can prophesy about the politics of the municipalities of America, it would seem that we are soon approaching a day when in every large city it will be a contest between Socialists and a fusion of the old parties. The old parties have no distinctive policies in the municipality worthy the name. The Socialists have. As it now stands, the Socialists in municipal politics are the constructive element. The other political forces are out for the spoils and have no platform. Unless the political conservatives think through the municipal problem in a larger way, it will fall to the Socialists to rule the cities.

The Resignation of Doctor Wiley

After twenty-nine years of service as chief of the bureau of chemistry in the pure food service of the department of agriculture at Washington, Dr. Harvey W. Wiley has been forced to resign his position. According to his own statement, incongruous elements in the administration of the pure food department have made it impossible for him to carry on his work successfully in behalf of the people. For years Doctor Wiley has waged war on the manufacturers of fraudulent foods and bad patent medicines. He has been the relentless enemy of powerful interests which have made adulteration of foods a science and enriched themselves at the expense of the people. Says the Journal of the American Medical Association, by whose courtesy we reproduce the accompanying cartoon: "To Doctor Wiley, more than to any other one man, the public owes the pure food and drug act and to Doctor Wiley it owes whatever of good has been accomplished by that act." Doctor Wiley's work in behalf of the public is not ended. He has entered the editorial field and hereafter from his desk in a private laboratory, conducted by the Good Housekeeping magazine, he will bombard food and drug adulterers and fakirs unhampered. Meanwhile the selection of a successor is awaited with a feeling somewhat of resentment rankling in the hearts of the people. The president made a good start toward getting the right man by telegraphing to the presidents of a score of the leading universities of the land, asking each to recommend some chemist for the position. But the choosing of a great chemist is only half. The man to fill the position must be "fundamentally honest; a man who has the good of the public and not of the 'interests' at heart; and one, above all, who has honest convictions and has the courage to carry out such convictions." We cannot escape an almost inevitable conclusion, that any man fitted to fill that position will refuse to take up the duties fettered in the same shackles which Doctor Wiley just escaped. There will have to be further changes in the pure food department before another worthy man can be found who will accept the responsibility of chief of the bureau of chemistry.



FREE FROM THE SHACKLES
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY
FRAUDULENT BUSINESS INTERESTS
CAN ANOTHER HONEST MAN BE FOUND TO WEAR THEM?

—Between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 women will have a vote for President at the coming election, according to a Washington estimate. Women will vote in Wyoming, where they have been exercising the franchise since 1869; in Colorado, where they have been voting since 1893; in Utah, Idaho, Washington, and last—but by no means least—California.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Hindering While Helping Unity

A writer in the Living Church (Episcopalian) presents a fine example of the way in which the problem of union should never be approached. The Disciples have done this same thing so many times that they may be helped by seeing others as others see them. The confidence, the finality, and the proposed remedy are so apparent, so familiar, that we cannot afford to pass them by. What repels us is likely to repel others; and herein is the opportunity to study how this problem should be met.

In your leading article of the issue of March 9th you well say: "Christian unity never will come by 'giving up'; it must come by 'giving to.'" What can we give to divided Protestantism? That which is their greatest need, "The Doctrine of Grace as expressed in the Sacramental System." When it is admitted that we have no power to do good works acceptable to God without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, and that sacraments are effectual signs of grace by the which God doth work invisibly in us, then will sacraments be prized. But sacraments demand a priesthood, and a valid priesthood requires a valid episcopate, which in turn postulates continuity from the apostles hands. When all who profess and call themselves Christian accept the Catholic doctrine of grace, the first and the essential step will have been taken towards Christian unity.

To Disciples "priesthood and sacraments" have an unpleasant sound. It is certain some of our cherished doctrines fall as unpleasantly on Episcopal ears. What shall we do? We can profit by the errors of others, and take counsel from the errors we have made in pronouncements similar to the one under consideration. It is easy to say "giving to" will solve the problem. But suppose no one will take! The giving to in this case is an indirect way of asking some one else to give up. But the fundamental fact in the problem of unity seems to be that none of the historic communions is yet ready to forfeit any of its distinctive doctrines, and that the apparently insuperable difficulty is to be met with the generous offer of giving something. The situation remains as it was before.

Christianity's Gains in India

While figures are inadequate to fully express the growth of the Christian religion in any land, it is encouraging to have figures that really establish the growing power of our faith. Arithmetic is a factor in Christianity, but we must depend upon the leaven to permeate the whole lump, and that can never be expressed in numerical terms. The Continent (Presbyterian) gives us this excellent summary:

The latest census of India gives a population of 315,000,000. The Christian growth is shown by the following figures: In 1881 there were 1,862,634 Christians; 1891, 2,284,380; 1901, 2,923,241; 1911, 3,876,196. In the native states of India the advance has been relatively greater than in districts where the British exercise complete governmental powers. The civilians of European or American domicile or pure descent in India number about 125,000. More than five-eighths of these belong to the Anglican communion. The Roman Catholic faith is held by about one-fifth. The Presbyterians have 15,000 adherents and the Methodists 7,000. The Eurasian Christians number about 101,000, as against 89,000 at the previous census. Considerably more than half of them—57,000—are Roman Catholics. Some 3,574,000 of the Christian population are natives of the country; Roman Catholics take first place with 1,394,000 adherents, as compared with 1,122,000 in the previous enumeration. The Protestant total in 1901 was 970,000, the increase for the ten years not falling far short of half a million. The Baptists advance from 217,000 to more than 331,000, and the Anglicans advance from 306,000 to 332,000. The Congregationalists have grown from 37,000 to 134,000. The Presbyterian Indians have grown in the decade from 43,000 to 164,000, and the Methodists from 68,000 to 162,000. The Lutherans and allied denominations have advanced from 154,000 to 217,000.

Un-American Pretensions of Rome

The pretensions of Rome are known wherever Rome is known. To exploit herself upon all occasions where conspicuousness can be regarded as an acknowledgment of her claims is a duty which is performed with conscientious skill. The newly created "princes" of the church will not be slow to improve all opportunities that will minister to ecclesiastical vanity and aggrandisement. In Boston, the home of the new Irish Catholic Cardinal O'Connell, there is a governor who, while not disrespectful to the Romanists, showed that the spirit of the Puritan has not been buried beneath Plymouth Rock. But this was not a religious question so much as an attempt to parade ecclesiasticism before the public at the expense of the governor of a great state and was met by Gov. Foss of Massachusetts as it deserved to be met. The following account of the episode is taken from the Christian Register (Unitarian).

Gov. Foss deserves praise for maintaining the dignity of his office. At a recent banquet in Boston the President of the United States, Cardinal O'Connell, Mr. Denis McCarthy, and Gov. Foss were to appear in that order. Gov. Foss very properly objected on the ground that his place was next to the President. The explanation given, and, so far as we know, never contradicted, was that the Cardinal had commanded the committee to arrange the speakers in this order. As obedient Catholics of course they could not disregard this command. Efforts were made to induce the Governor to take the place assigned to him, and the explanation given was that the State was represented by the President, and therefore there were no slurs cast upon it if the Church came next. But in Massachusetts the explanation does not serve, for we do not recognize foreign princes as having higher rank than the chief magistrate of the Commonwealth, and certainly no church of any creed or class is entitled to take precedence on such occasions. We believe that the Governor's decision will be approved, not only by all Protestants, but by a majority of the members of the Catholic Church in this country. The Independent has cited a list of Catholic journals that look with disfavor upon the absurd pretensions of the new-made "Princes" of the Church.

Fake Advertising in Religious Journals

Within recent years there has been a great improvement in the matter of advertising in religious papers. The days when the religious press was "wide-open" to almost any species of fraud have about passed away. True, the papers all needed the money; but so does the highwayman. That argument has been silenced forever. It ought to be said, on the other side of the question, that a proper support of church papers would never have driven publishers to the extreme of guilt in order to maintain their journals in a worthy manner. When men rail against the sins of publishers they should save a few of their invectives for the delinquent and for the subscriber who never subscribed. The following indicates the progress that has been made in the right direction as recorded in the Northwestern Christian Advocate (Methodist):

The Journal of the American Medical Association finds that no class of publications has made greater progress in censoring advertising than the religious journals. "Four or five years ago," says the Journal, "the various Church publications fairly reeked with advertisements of nostrums of the most fraudulent kind. A wonderful housecleaning has taken place in the past half-decade, and most religious journals of the better class have dissolved their previous coalition with the 'great American fraud.'" Thereupon it proceeds to flay a member of the Advocate family for giving a half-page advertisement to a device which, for curative purposes, has less than the value of "a tomato can with a string tied to it." There is no class of advertisements so difficult to deal with as the so-called "medical ads." Some specifics which come under this classification are used freely by the medical profession and have shown undoubted curative value. Others are, of course, the cheapest of humbugs and positively deleterious. The safe way is to roll up a good subscription list for the religious weekly and relieve the publishers of the necessity of taking questionable advertisements. When one is confronted with a deficit the advertisement that pays well (and medical advertisements pay better than others) is inevitably judged with a bias in its favor.

Counting on Big Growth

Presbyterians are enlarging the business operations of the General Assembly through an Executive Commission which sits between annual assemblies. In former years Presbyterian benevolences made appeals to the churches and to individuals each in its own way and time. For the first time this year, in what is regarded as nearly perfect form, a financial statement is sent out to churches, over the name of the Commission, apportioning amounts that are to be given to each of the benevolent boards. Authority is put behind the appeal and business supervision placed over expenditure of money.

The Commission, in its statement that will go to Presbyterian churches within the next ten days, adds $300,000 over the amount given last year, doing so because the Laymen's Missionary Movement and similar agencies, especially those of the laymen, have waged expensive and extensive campaigns. Presbyterians bore their part of the cost, and the Commission now feels expectation of a considerable advance to be justified. The whole sum expected in 1912 is $3,360,515. One hundred and eight years ago the whole sum actually given was $2,500.

The 1912 sum asked of Presbyterians for missions at home is $1,238,000, for foreign work $1,300,000, and the balance for the eight other agencies, the largest of which is aid for colleges.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN. ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

Unselfishness in Service

"My business is serving the Lord; I make a living by cobbling shoes," was the answer of William Carey the first American missionary when he was asked about his business. He did not misrepresent himself. It was his chief ambition to prove himself a man in the service of Christ. There are many who hold this view of their business. To them the church and the Sunday-school owe much of their prosperity.

We can serve the Lord by means of the occupation that gives us a living. Honest work is of fundamental importance. The man who slights his work cannot bear testimony to the power of the Lord to save and expect his testimony to be taken seriously. The crooked business man's pious statements to his Sunday-school class are powerless to start a spiritual revolution in any soul.

The use to which wealth, power and knowledge are devoted is one of the most commonly applied tests of the quality of a life. Do the men who own the mines of this country have the proper sense of responsibility toward the people who use the products of the mines? Have all the members of labor organizations adopted the golden rule as their guide in dealing with employers and with the public? Are educated men and women aware of the debt they owe to humanity?

Speech betrays the motives beneath our actions. When Mr. Gladstone was bitterly attacked by a young member of parliament, instead of retaliating and humiliating the young man, as he could easily have done, he complimented him on his promise of usefulness in the house. The little man feels that he must "get even" with his enemies and if he has a sharp tongue, he employs it freely. We are apt to answer rudely those who criticise the church. Does this indicate unselfishness or selfishness? Perhaps the man outside of the church would have a better impression of Christianity if we showed the spirit of gentleness.

The quality of the life is never more apparent than when it is necessary to get at the motives of a deed. Selfishness shows itself as suspicion, envy, jealousy, greed, uncleanness, and every other evil quality that has ever marred the souls of men. Generosity searches for the better motive, for extenuating circumstances, for signs of repentance and of future uprighteousness. We are all engaged in the business of assigning motives. The higher life of the church and school and of business depends upon the unselfishness of the people in judging one another. The foundations are destroyed by lack of confidence.

It ought not to be a strange doctrine to the disciple of Jesus that the good must bear the sins of the bad. The lesson, however, is hard to learn. We must suffer for the sins of our associates. The church always has the unworthy in its membership. The cowardly and mean spirited try to cast off their share of the burden imposed by the flagrant sins of their associates and thus they add the heaviest burden that must be borne by the faithful disciples. We are all tempted to defend ourselves by criticising our colleagues when we ought to uphold them and accept our share of the criticism which their mistakes cause. The selfish husband tells the neighbors of the faults of his wife. The wife may be industrious in giving information about her husband's delinquencies. Both are evading their solemn obligations.

The planting of churches affords an opportunity for the exhibition of unselfishness. Pride in one's own religious body is commendable when it results in service to missions and education. It becomes blindness and selfishness when it leads to the establishment of congregations where they are not needed. It may not always be easy to determine when another congregation is needed in a community. It is easy to discover villages and towns that have two or three times as many churches as they can support. The people who expect their preaching on Christian union to escape ridicule must be the most unselfish is practicing what they preach. Their power does not depend upon the number and size of their congregations alone but also upon the evidence of their sincerity and intelligence in pleading for the co-operation of the Lord's people in good work. The theory may be correct, but few will believe in it if it is advocated by a group of persons bent on their own exaltation. Kindness and humility have more than once given force to erroneous teaching: they make the truth vital. [Mid-week Service, April 17. I Pet. 5:1-6.] S. J.

"Yet Without Sin"

A POST-LENTEN STUDY.

The long forty days of Jesus' fasting came at last to an end. During that fateful time he had passed through the successive stages of eager anticipation; high contemplation of the great task before him; urgent planning of his campaign as the true leader of his people; increasing anxiety as the actual conditions in church and state confronted him; extreme physical weakness and suffering; depression of spirit; appalling struggle with the suggestions of doubt and evil; approach to the depths of questioning and hesitation as to whether his work could possibly succeed; intense struggle with insidious and malignant suggestions of opposition, incompetence and failure; resolute summoning of the supreme utterances of holy Scripture to strengthen his spirit; and final emergence into the calm and exaltation of complete victory. But in that hour of final triumph there was no reaction. He had met the enemy and conquered. Even the awful weakness of his famished body did not now distress him as in the days of his first acute suffering. He had won through to a lasting peace.

* * *

It is not without meaning that one of the evangelists mentions the presence of the wild beasts about the Master during these days of his suffering. That he was ever conscious of danger from these denizens of the wilderness there is no hint. With a high serenity of mind which counted all living creatures his brothers, in the wilderness as in the city, he passed the days of his temptation. Perhaps there was a sort of sympathy between the man of sorrow and these living things of the desert on whom, as on all the animal creation, have fallen so many of the ills of this unhappy world order. If with Paul we believe that "the whole creation groans and travels in pain, waiting for the revealing of the sons of God," may not these beasts of the earth have felt some dim sense of comradeship in the sufferings of the Son of Man, and some touch of sympathetic hope that the sorrows through which he was passing might in the long years bring to them too some measure of emancipation and larger human interest?

* * *

And when the days were over in which Jesus felt the strong urgency of silence and of prayer, he prepared himself for his return to the haunts of men. He was following in the footsteps of the great teachers of the past. Tradition insisted that both Moses and Elijah had spent their forty days of silence, fasting and prayer amid the holy hills. Jesus was fulfilling, therefore, the high urgencies of similar self-dedication to the divine purpose. And now the moment had come for him to take up the active tasks of his ministry. Perhaps now that he had found peace after the strife of spirit and the urgency of contending choices it seemed hard to leave the region which had proved so notable a school for his spirit. If he had hesitated as he found himself thrust across the frontier of his new life at the Jordan, how much more might he now tarry for a further moment before opening that campaign which was certain to prove so impressive in the spiritual history of the world.

These must have been his thoughts in the final hours of his stay among the mountains.

* * *

Does it not seem probable that out of such an experience Jesus must have come bearing the marks, both physical and spiritual, of the struggle? Never could life be again just what it had been before. Some choices had been made forever. He had grown with the stature of years since his departure from the Jordan. The marks of that conflict were upon him. The stigmata of holy self-devotion were already stamped upon his flesh and spirit. When his mother saw him again, must she not have noted the lines in his face that told not merely of physical suffering but of mental conflict? When John looked upon him again at the banks of the Jordan, may there not have been a new glory in his face, which caused the preacher to point him out with the revealing words, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh the sin of the world"? There are certain testing times through which men pass only to bear henceforth the tokens of a new experience. It was supremely so with Jesus. He had trodden the wine-press alone and he alone of all men knew the mighty secrets of a life-and-death struggle with the powers of evil.

* * *

Yet it must not be supposed that Jesus had once for all felt the searching power of temptation. To be sure, in its most appalling forms it had swept upon him only to be thrust back by his mighty will. But it was by no means the last time of attack. There is a volume of suggestion in the words of one of the narrators that Jesus was left "for a time." Constantly through his human life the temptation to use the lesser good haunted his ways and dogged his footsteps. Such a temptation came to him when the people sought to make him king. He was no more allured on that occasion than in the wilderness to the vain pomps of the world. But he felt again, with much of the force of his first temptation, the appeal of a leaderless company to him who could so well understand how to make their ways lead onward to the highest good. When Peter refused to believe that the Master must pass into the shadow of reviling and of death, and insisted that there must be some mistake, Jesus turned upon him almost fiercely exclaiming, "Get thee behind me, Satan. Thou understandest not the things of God, but only the things of man". The temptation to use force in the establishment of his kingdom, to rely upon compromise and compact rather than upon sheer faith in God and in the moral order of the universe, were a constant atmosphere of evil surrounding our Lord. But those later and lesser temptations he met with peremptory denial. In his case, as in all human experience, the first victory makes the later ones an easy achievement, while temptation once submitted to makes all recovery increasingly difficult.

* * *

And what is the meaning of that mysterious sequel to the scene of the temptation, "Angels came and ministered unto him"? Is that a mere concession to the Jewish belief in angels as the protectors and comforters of the children of God? Whatever may be one's view as to the reality of present-day angelic ministries, we may not doubt that all the forces of the universe, human and divine, are set for the protection and comfort of those who set their faces to the right. There are many mysteries of the spiritual life whose solution we have not yet achieved. And perhaps we go comfortless and unprotected in many such ways where we might experience the profound satisfaction of spiritual companionship. But we may not doubt that those secrets were open to our Saviour's knowledge and appropriation, and that it is no meaningless word which the Evangelist records when he tells us that the angels ministered to the Master in the moments of his victory over the great temptation.

* * *

And so from the hills where he had spent the days of his mysterious struggle with evil Jesus returned, following at first the foot-paths made by shepherds and hunters, then coming into more travelled thoroughfares, and at last joining the companies of men and women who were making their way toward the Jordan where John still preached his message of repentance and amendment. Jesus had made the great decision. The powers of evil had no more dominion over him. He was ready to take up the mighty task of his life. From that day forth he went forward unhasting and unresting to the consummation of his enterprise, the revelation and establishment in ampler measure of the Kingdom of God.

"God has his best things for the few
Who dare to stand the test;
He has his second choice for those
Who will not have his best."

Berkeley's Decisive Forward Step

The action of the Disciples' church at Berkeley, Calif., in opening its doors to admit into its fellowship all members of the Church of Christ is a significant step in the direction of the practice of Christian union. The result of the vote, as announced in The Christian Century last week, was 184 for to 65 against the resolutions. The total membership of the church is 325. The intrinsic importance of this action, together with the publicity already given the event by Pacific Coast papers and the Disciples' press, prompt The Christian Century to make a somewhat extended comment upon it.

The proposal to practice Christian unity had been under advisement by the congregation for many months. There was great deliberation in the proceeding—one wonders that a proposal to extend the right hand of fellowship to other members of the Church of Christ should require so long a time for consideration by a group of Christians committed to the practice of Christian unity! But in view of the confusing counsel by which a simple question like this is often darkened it is much better to take time enough for adequate discussion and a thoroughly intelligent decision.

The facts presented in our report last week reveal the active coöperation of almost the entire body of office-bearers of the church. The laymen are described as taking a hearty interest in the proposal, holding the common sense view that the considerations against the policy were too fine to weigh against the substantial and obvious interests of the Kingdom of God. These laymen are men of the best religious training and intelligence and would promptly repudiate the assertion that they were unduly influenced by their pastor, Rev. H. J. Loken, whose leadership they art glad to follow, but not blindly. Mr. Loken believes that the tendency of sentiment in all the churches is decidedly away from the old disputes and tests of fellowship. He says:

I venture to suggest that we in Berkeley are not so very different from many other Christian churches. The ministers of our churches would perhaps be astonished at what the laymen in their pews, the men who are active in the Men and Religion Forward Movement, in the big business operations of today, and in touch with life at many points, are thinking on matters of this kind. I believe if they were given a chance to decide the policy of the church and to express themselves freely their expressions in the matter would not be greatly different in the East than in the West.

That the matter lies graciously in the mind of the minister himself is disclosed in a letter of which the above quotation is an extract. The letter was sent to the editors of The Christian Century in response to a request for information. Mr. Loken betrays no shallow feeling of triumph, no hard determination to force an issue through in spite of an opposing minority. On the contrary he is prayerfully solicitous that division of sentiment shall result in no division of forces. He holds a modest view of the event, rightly describing it as "not a reformation, but simply a step in the direction of Christian union." "We feel," he continues, "that we have been led of God in this matter No one planned it. It came upon us uawares." He then describes the specific occasion in which the issue arose:

Six people from our sister churches, denominational churches, had applied for membership among us. When they found they were expected to be immersed they were not ready to take such a step. I advocated publicly from the pulpit that we admit them on their Christian status as accredited members of other evangelical churches of Christ. A meeting of the church was called to consider the matter and there we found that there was already a member with us, one of the leaders of the young people, who had come into the church in a similar manner by mistake, although his case was well known to several members of the church. It was also discovered that brethren who had never been immersed had served in official capacity on our official board. In other words, we found that we were tacitly, in our practice, already favoring the principle that had been suggested from the pulpit. This is but another illustration of the temper of the church on this question. There was from the very beginning a great enthusiasm in favor of the plan and our chief problem has been to so carry on the educational work and the formal procedure as not to offend those good brethren who were opposed to the plan.

The possibility of division in the church has been faced with deepest concern by Mr. Loken from the first. It prompted him to conceive the issue as a problem in education to be solved not by partisan methods but by instruction. He therefore engaged the church in a study of the Disciple's history and original ideals, and delivered a series of instructional sermons on the teachings of the New Testament bearing on the practice of Christian unity. He believes profoundly that had not outside influences entered in, especially the embittering counsel of certain national newspapers, his own patient policy of instruction combined with the gracious spirit of the majority would have effectually put a division of the forces out of the range of possibility. He would even yet have hopes of conserving the unity of the congregation "were not the denominational papers actively fanning the flame of division."

It would seem, therefore, that the guilt of division, should division occur, will not rest primarily with the minority who may be led away, but with those who from the outside have injected bitterness into what otherwise would have been a strained but not broken situation.

The good example set by this Disciples' church has already been followed by others: "Since this matter was first mentioned here in Berkeley," says Mr. Loken, "three Baptist churches around the Bay region have taken similar action and other movements in the interest of a larger fellowship are in progress. It is a time that calls loudly to the Disciples. May God grant that as a people we may be humble but courageous to heed his call!"

To pastor and people at Berkeley this step seems to have been taken as a means of bearing the full testimony of the Disciples on the duty of Christian union. This testimony they do not believe it possible to bear so long as they maintain a sectarian practice in their own fellowship. They have adopted Thomas Campbell's axiom of Christian unity: to receive all whom God has received. Farthest from their thought is any design of proselytism. Whether their new practice increases their membership or not is not their immediate concern. They must be obedient to their Lord. Those among them who hold that Christ has specifically commanded them to practice immersion—and we have no doubt a large majority so hold—see with equal clearness that He also commands them to practice Christian unity with all members of his Church. And they find joy in the discovery that these two commands may both be obeyed.

With a growing company of our churches the Berkeley church now leaves behind this one surviving feature of the sectarian order which the Disciples have carried with them ever since their unfortunate identification with the Baptist church in 1812. The practice of closed membership is a Baptist practice and in clear conflict with essential Disciple ideals. The consummation of our mission lies in the direction of that larger fellowship into which such Disciples as those at Berkeley are now joyously entering.

Dr. Garrison's Electric Words

Dr. J. H. Garrison, speaking through his always interesting department of the Christian Evangelist, the "Editor's Easy Chair," makes a clear, strong deliverance on the Christian status of our evangelical neighbors and their churches. His statement is absolutely unequivocal. It rings with conviction. It rings, too, with indignation toward those who have recently represented the Disciples to the Christian world as holding that Presbyterian and other churches are not churches of Christ nor their members Christians. That Dr. Garrison held this view there was no doubt in The Christian Century's mind when, nearly a year ago, we appealed to him to offset certain hesitant utterances which had appeared in his paper whose implications raised serious doubts as to the fraternal attitude of the Disciples. We felt that there should come from him a statement without any reservation or qualification or ambiguity, and without any pharisaic qualification on account of "imperfect obedience," setting forth that the Disciples regard those to whom their plea for unity is addressed as just as truly Christians as are they themselves. His splendid statement now appearing satisfies every requirement. There is no "if" or "as it were" or "in a sense" in his utterance. He believes Presbyterians and the others are Christians in the New Testament sense, members of the New Testament Church of Christ, the only Church of Christ of whose existence either he or anyone else knows. Dr. Garrison says:

> Think of representing to the public the leading and representative men among the Disciples of Christ, some of whom hold important official positions, as denying that there are other churches of Christ than their own and other Christians outside their own membership! And this because such men believe there has been a departure from New Testament Christianity, which it is the mission of our movement to correct, as far as possible, in order to the union of Christendom! Is loyalty to Jesus Christ, then, at enmity with Christian charity? It is fog that makes it appear so. For centuries the Roman Catholic Church was the only Church of Christ in existence Did Luther's Reformation imply that there was no Church and no Christians in existence when he began his work? Certainly not. But it was a corrupt Church needing reformation. None of the reformers have sought to inaugurate a new Church, but to reform the one which has been in existence since Pentecost. . . . The insistence with which it is now being urged that loyalty to Christ, as we understand him, involves the uncharitable conclusion that all others are non-Christians, is a contention that has no foundation in Scripture, in reason, or in history.

The Christian Century feels deep satisfaction in reading these electric words from Dr. Garrison's pen. We cannot quite repress the regret that the control of the Christian Evangelist has passed from his hands, so as to make it necessary to affix to his statement the explanation that he is speaking only for himself personally. We could wish that the Christian Evangelist might speak editorially in tones like these. In sharp contrast to Dr. Garrison's words was its recent editorial written by I. J. Spencer which denied that the Disciples hold Presbyterian churches to be churches of Christ or their members Christians in the New Testament sense. It is, no doubt, to Mr. Spencer's editorial that Dr. Garrison's indignation is directed, and to similar utterances by Z. T. Sweeney which The Christian Century has been engaged of late in repudiating.

Dr. Garrison's words will go a long way toward dispelling the "fog" which he so aptly says has settled upon the minds of some prominent Disciples. Christian charity, as he says, cannot be at enmity with loyalty to Christ. Indeed, we would add, the practice of Christian love in a fellowship as wide as the Church of Christ is an elemental act of loyalty to Christ.

Let America Get Out of God's Way!

The analysis of the situation in China by Dr. J. L. Barton, secretary of the American Board (Congregational), which was recently presented to an inter-denominational conference of missionary secretaries and leaders and published in part in The Christian Century, has been commented upon widely in the religious press. Dr. Barton, it will be recalled, urged the strategic necessity of a united Church of Christ in China to meet the new and intricate problems attendant upon national reconstruction. There was no vagueness in the words he used in declaring that denominationalism, its machinery and spirit, should be straightway withdrawn from the Chinese mission field. Among the approving comments on his address that of the Continent is particularly keen-edged. It asserts that America stands in the way of China, that sectarian interests in our country are projecting distinctions into the fast-forming Church of the Orient, which will work immeasurable damage in the future unless our mission policy is changed. The missionary secretaries of all denominations do not dispute this. Missionaries themselves are one voice in reporting that "the Chinese and missionaries in China would very quickly create one church for all China if the denominations at home would only take hands off and let them do it." The Continent continues:

> But the thing which makes all this uncomfortable to many of the secretaries is their fear of the rank and file of their denominations at home. They think they can't afford to say plainly to their American constituents that American denominational lines ought to be wiped out in China. A secretary of this sort will confess frankly that his denomination would not likely give much to support Chinese missions if it understood that it was building up over there a church not of its own name, order and creed. So rather than risk a slump in the revenues, he warns the workers who represent his board in the Chinese field not to get into any closer relations there with other churches than people of his denomination are willing for at home. The assumption is that the missionaries would rather abate something of what they think beneficial to the Chinese than to spoil the popularity and reduce the income of the boards which sent them out and are supporting them.

Christianity has been deep-enough planted now in China to justify the extension of wider liberty to the native church than past missionary policy has allowed. Moreover the type of Christianity that has been planted is "a spiritual, evangelistic Christianity." "Let the church of China take form now," says the Continent, "and it will be a church genuinely kindred with the historic company of those who have lived and died for Jesus and his cross." But what about our differences? Shall we cease to insist upon them on this mission field? Leave them to the Spirit of God who dwells in the Chinese Church, says this splendid editorial:

> Is a man convinced that immersion is the only baptism pleasing to God? Then let him join with non-immersionist Christians in the compact that the new church in China shall be left, under God's guidance, to settle the question itself. If immersion is the only baptism, will not God make it plain to the Chinese? So with bishops—if any man believes that the true church must needs have bishops, let him for once omit the question from argument and leave it to Providence.
>
> Any American who professes to believe that the Spirit of God has power to bend obedient men to his will among any race of humanity should be ashamed to try to lay down terms to define what the Church in China created by the Spirit shall hold and do.

The Visitor

Among the educational institutions of the Dominion of Canada the University of Toronto holds an honored place. In fact, it is approached only by McGill University at Montreal and Queen's at Ottawa. Its organiation is unique. It combines the central and unified academic work of the leading American universities with a grouping of collegiate foundations after the manner of Oxford and Cambridge. Its buildings occupy commanding ground near the heart of the city of Toronto, and the spaciousness of its campus affords ample room for future structures as they are required. It is a state institution, maintained by the Dominion government, and under the present leadership of President Robert H. Falconer it is rapidly rising to greater importance in the educational field.

About it there are grouped five important colleges, all closely affiliated with it in administration and instruction. Knox College is the Presbyterian school, with an attendance of about one hundred students. Victoria is the Methodist college, with five or six hundred students. Trinity is the High Anglican institution, with some three hundred students. Wycliffe is the Low Anglican, with less than a hundred students, while St. Michael's, the Roman Catholic college, has about three hundred scholars. All these schools give academic instruction in the arts courses and in theology, but for most of their scientific work and all the higher courses of a graduate character they are dependent upon the University, which is divided into University College with some eleven hundred under graduate students, and the university proper which comprises the graduate and special faculties, and whose attendance is something like four thousand.

* * *

Outside this admirable group of the university and its federated colleges there is the Baptist institution, McMaster's, whose attendance is quite large. It was founded by a Baptist who was formerly a Disciple. The conservatism of the Disciples who were in the control of our churches in the Dominion at that time was uncongenial to him, and he took his membership to the Baptist church. After his death it was discovered that he had left a large fortune to the founding of an institution of education for the Baptists in the Dominion. But for the unfortunate incident of his departure from our brotherhood, the Disciples might today be the possessors of McMaster's college with its splendid equipment.

Our brethren some years ago organized a college at St. Thomas, intending to try the experiment of an educational institution in the Dominion. Considerable money was spent in that enterprise and good results were obtained while the work was continued. But it has now been abandoned and there is no educational institution maintained by the Disciples in the Province. This is unfortunate. Our churches in that region need the strength that would come from a college suitable for the education of their children, and prepared to train young men for the ministry. As it is, our churches in Canada must depend almost wholly upon a ministry imported from the states, and this can never be as permanent and satisfactory as one trained up at home. The experience of the St. Thomas school is not without value, but when the Disciples establish a new educational foundation it ought to avail itself of the valuable advantages offered by the University of Toronto. It could be organized either as a separate school federated with the university, or for a time at least as a section of one of the colleges already existing there, like Knox or Victoria. It would be only a question of time until it were capable of assuming an important place in the educational life of the Dominion.

* * *

The university religious service on the Sunday is an impressive one. It is held at eleven o'clock in the large Convocation Hall, and is attended by seven or eight hundred members of the university, students and faculty. A considerable body of the faculty compose the procession, which marches to its place upon the platform in academic cap, hood and gown. The services are conducted by the president of the university or some member of the faculty, and the visiting minister of the day finds himself in the presence of as attentive and inspiring an audience as could be desired. The music is rendered by one of the university choirs, and the congregational singing is hearty and reverent. The preachers are chosen from the universities and pulpits of the United States and England, and as there is a new voice for each Sunday the number of men heard during the academic year is large and representative.

On the evening of the Visitor's stay in Toronto he had the privilege of worshiping with the Cecil Street Church of Christ. This church has an excellent building not far from the university. Among its former pastors have been J. R. Gaff, A. W. Connor, W. J. Lhamon, C. T. Paul, now principal of the Indianapolis Missionary Training School, A. T. Campbell and J. M. Van Horn. The present pastor is C. O. Reynard, who came a year ago to Toronto from the second church at Warren, O. The membership of the congregation numbers about 390, and there have been eighty additions during the past year. The church has recently become a living link in the Foreign Society. One of its most efficient officers is Assistant Professor E. F. Burton, who holds an important position in the department of physics in the university, and will undoubtedly succeed to the headship of the department within a few years. It was a pleasure to meet the members of this earnest and hospitable church. Their affection for their ministers past and present was clearly manifested.

* * *

There are some twenty churches of the Disciples in Ontario. Not more than five or six of these, however, are strong and effective. Only with the establishment of an efficient educational institution can the Disciples expect to hold and increase their strength in Ontario. At the present time there is much talk of the union of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational churches in Canada. The Presbyterians recently voted on the question, approving it by a small majority, but the union sentiment has to be cultivated before it can become wholly effective, and surely the Disciples ought to have an important place in the movement which promotes this desirable end. It seems pathetic that we should not have representation in any place where efforts are being made to unite the people of God, and be counted out or ignored in such an enterprise. No matter how weak our churches may be, they have still the duty and privilege of testimony, and that should be always clear and insistent on the great theme which has given us our historic reason for existence.

Editorial Table Talk

Didactic and Personal Evangelism

Dr. B. B. Tyler, of Denver, Colo., calls our attention to an earnest editorial in the Christian Worker of Des Moines, Ia., on personal evangelism which deserves to have much wider reading than is afforded by the local constituency for whom this bright paper is published. It will be remembered that some years ago Dr. Tyler devoted himself for a considerable period after resigning the pulpit of First Church in New York City, to an itinerant ministry among the churches in which his name became a veritable symbol of "didactic evangelism." The throngs that waited upon his ministry of "unfolding the word of God" were hardly surpassed by any modern sensationalist. And many are the churches whose thought life and spiritual life were so enriched by his instruction that they continue after nearly twenty years to speak of his visit with grateful enthusiasm. Rev. Finis Idleman's great Central Church of Des Moines is one of these grateful congregations. This church has had all manner of evangelistic meetings, but two stand out pre-eminent—that of Professor W. F. Black in 1889 and that of Dr. Tyler. Both these meetings built gold, silver and precious stones into the House of God, and both were entirely devoid of manipulation, with the instructional purpose all the time in the fore-front. Personal work,—earnest, artless, friendly solicitude for others' souls—reënforced the messages of the preacher. It is good to know that this church, despite its difficult down-town problems, is committing itself more and more consciously to the finer ideals of spiritual evangelism. Mr. Idleman's editorial to which Dr. Tyler refers contains the following:

If there is any settled conviction in the mind of the church generally which is more a unit than any other, it is that the gospel is to be carried to the last man by personal evangelism. The trend of thinking is against parade. The thrilling night parades of thousands going into the slums of a city, the spectacular march of Christian men through the streets of a city, carrying Bibles, may encourage those who participate but such exhibitions do not convert anybody. The demand for practical results of the Christian life and spirit will not be stilled by any marshalling of hosts. Neither will the flashing of the news of multitudes converted in a day impress this generation. There is already too much mill for the amount of wheat ground. One Christian deed that reminds men of what Jesus would have done, is of more convincing power than increased statistics. The humblest church which illustrates Christ's love within its membership and Christ's service toward others attracts more attention than all the scores added in a great revival.

It is to this end that we, at Central Church, conduct an after meeting each Sunday evening. Personal workers meet for conference about and prayer for those who are not Christians. Hundreds of calls are made. A personal acquaintance is established between visitors and their friends. The practice of speaking to others about the things of the kingdom is established. Our services are being crowned with responses to the invitation. The church is glad. The sense of joy, which is keenest in Heaven, is felt among us.

The Church in the White House

The Christian denominations are pretty well represented among the candidates for President just now. President Taft is a Unitarian, former President Roosevelt belongs to the Reformed Church, Woodrow Wilson is a Presbyterian, Champ Clark is a Disciple of Christ, Judson Harmon is a Methodist, and Congressman Underwood is a Baptist. So these are the six bodies having White House leadings if not leanings. Singularly, three of the six candidates have Episcopal wives, and two of the candidates defer, in matters of church alliance, to their wives in marked degree. So it can be said that, perhaps, the race has seven contestants, or might it be better to say six and a half? Champ Clark and Woodrow Wilson will stick close to their respective bodies, families and all. That is, they will if they maintain as President of the United States the stands they have maintained as congressman and university president. President Taft and Theodore Roosevelt allow their wives to bring their own church into prominence. Congressman Underwood changed his religious ideas and ideals to some extent, it is said, while at the University of Virginia, and still more upon his second marriage. Is it advantageous to a religious body to have a member of it occupy the White House? Some so regard it? Others say it is not. So far as can be discovered, Protestant churches care little one way or the other.

A Popular Delusion Dispelled

Our contemporary, the Christian Evangelist, makes an announcement of its editorial plans for the future. After denouncing the belligerent and warlike editor as a nuisance, and wishing extinction for his tribe—our wish is a prayer—it indulges in some noble sentiments worthy of the highest journalism. Among other things it says that "the religious newspaper ought always to be a leader," and for such a declaration we offer our warmest congratulations. In all our dreams no suspicion of such heresy on the part of our contemporary, ever entered. It was our honest opinion, formed after careful reading of its columns from the day it passed out of its old estate into the new, that the ambition of the Christian Evangelist was to walk abreast of about a million of our tried and true brethren, the editor-in-chief occupying the post of honor in the center of the line.

Forgive us dear brethren for entertaining the delusion that no advance movements were to be made unless there were footprints on the sands of time made by our illustrious forefathers in which you could plant your own inconspicuous feet. We really believed that it was your one object in life to follow a trail, and that to blaze a trail were an offence to be committed only by such extremists as those whose heresies it would be your delight to censor. Indeed, some have been heard to say that the sole mission of the Christian Evangelist was to be a stenographer for the brotherhood; while in matters of progress, you would be content to think the thoughts of the majority after them. Happy are we to know that trailing is to be abandoned for leadership. Of late, we must confess, we have seen little to admire in the timid and hesitating course of our contemporary. We have been pained at its faltering in the presence of serious issues when it should have stood four square. But gladly do we forget the past in the light of the splendid promises for the future. Our sincerest wish is that following the new line of march the editors will not grow weary and faint by the way.

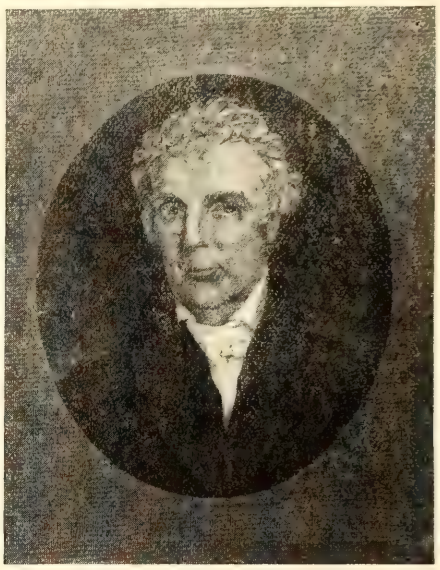
—The Foreign Society is constantly calling for money. Money provides equipment, builds schools and churches, supports missionaries. But here is a call for a man, a physician, to go to the Congo country in Africa. It is a loud call. It has been sounded forth for two years. A plaintive strain can now be detected in it. Some great heart should be moved by it to undertake so significant and rewarding a task.

—The observance of Men's and Boys' Day on April 28 will engage churches of all denominations represented in the Men and Religion Forward Movement. The Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ has arranged a plan for the services for that day which includes features for the Sunday-school, the morning and evening services, a men's mass meeting in the afternoon and a prayer meeting for men at 7 p. m. This day can be made a live and fruitful occasion if pastors will conceive it aright and prepare for it.

Interpretations

Barton W. Stone's Last Resting Place

In strolling through an old cemetery, known here as the Baptist cemetery, I was surprised to run upon a tombstone marking the burial place of the wife of Barton W. Stone. The date of her death was given as 1857. This started a query in my mind as to where her noted husband was buried. Since my boyhood his name had been very familiar to me. His picture with those of Walter Scott and the two Campbells had long had a place on the walls of my memory.



Barton W. Stone.

I consulted Mathes' life of Stone, which, by the way, I notice belongs to the Disciples' Divinity House library. I hereby make public confession in the hope that I may be forgiven. I wonder what the accumulated fine will be by this time! This biography makes clear that he died in Hannibal in 1844.

Several prominent Disciples visited him just prior to his death and had conversation with him pertaining to the reformation. He steadfastly maintained firm belief in its principles till the last. A brief obituary eulogy from Alexander Campbell appears in the chapter that deals with his death. But the only word with regard to his burial place is that "he was interred in his own locust grove where repose his remains till the morning of the resurrection." I inquired of many of the older citizens here as to his burial place but none of them knew for sure. Most of them had opinions but were not certain. Among the burial places suggested were Palmyra, Mo., and St. Louis, but most thought that as there were no railroads in 1844 he must be buried in Hannibal. Shortly after I discovered the grave of his wife, A. McLean, who is exceptionally well informed as to our history, visited Hannibal; but he was uncertain as to where Stone was buried. He thought, however, he was buried at Jacksonville, Ill.

* * *

The oldest resident of Hannibal, Col. Wm. H. Dulany, who though past ninety-four is wonderfully well preserved both in body and mind was quite sure that his body was taken by wagon to Jacksonville and that it now reposes there. Consequently I wrote Clyde Darsie, the pastor at Jacksonville, and in answer received the following note:

Jacksonville, Ill., March 16, 1912. Dear Brother Campbell: Replying to your note recently received would say that Barton W. Stone was at first buried in the graveyard at Antioch Church, seven miles northeast of Jacksonville. Afterwards his body was taken to Cane Ridge, Ky., where it now lies. Fraternally, CLYDE DARSIE.

I also have a recent letter from A. McLean corroborating the statement of Mr. Darsie. Since he was in Hannibal he has met some one who gave him the facts. Of course these facts are doubtless known to many.

Nevertheless, how soon the great of earth are forgotten! No one in Hannibal, the place in which Barton W. Stone died, knew for certain the place of his burial. A commission appointed by the State of Minnesota, to place a marker at the birthplace of Mark Twain has great difficulty in deciding in what house the great humorist first saw the light of day. Their decision when reached may be wrong; for the evidence is not convincing.

There is a pathos in the fact that the graves of Barton W. Stone and his wife are so widely separated. I presume neither had any thought but that they would be buried side by side. What vicissitudes of life separated their graves I do not know, but as I accidentally ran upon Mrs. Stone's tombstone bearing the name of "Elder Barton W. Stone" and noticed how neglected of love's attention it was, and as I learned afterward that now only negroes are buried in this cemetery, many of the graves of the white people having been moved, I felt somewhat saddened, and was impressed anew that the glory of the great of earth is most brief.

* * *

The life of Stone by Mathes states that he was married twice. His references to the family relationships are very brief. The biographies of the reformers would be much richer if they contained more human touches and revelations. How a man loved is perennially more interesting than what doctrine he affirmed. But in most theological biographies the doctrine all but crowds out the love. This is the reference to his first marriage:

"In 1801, July 2d, he was married to Elizabeth Campbell, of Mulenburg, Ky."

This is the entire statement as to the bride, Miss Elizabeth. Very revealing of the mind of the author is the next sentence: "Soon after, a great meeting came off at Cane Ridge." The second statement as to his family relations is this:

"In 1809 his first wife died, and his only son by her, Barton Warren, also died, leaving him with four little daughters, the eldest not more than eight years old. October 1, 1811, he was married to Celia W. Bowen, near Nashville, Tenn., cousin to his former wife."

It will be noticed by the above dates that the union with his second wife was from 1811 to 1844, the year of his death. Their graves are now separated by several hundred miles. And there was only thirteen years between their deaths. Four daughters and two sons, Samuel and Barton, were present at his death. Both these sons must have been the children by his second wife.

Hannibal. GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Christian Union Without the Disciples

Of late it has been my privilege to read several volumes on the subject of Christian union. Reviews of some of them appeared last week in The Christian Century. Of all of them it can be said that they are feeling after union; some of them have surer ground under their feet than others; but to most of these writers unity is a dream, a new discovery, a much desired experiment. To Mr. Silas McBee, as editor of the Churchman, much credit must be given for the agitation of the subject in Episcopal circles. Among Congregationalists there is a growing sentiment in favor of union, but, for the most part, the growth in all churches is slow, the views ranging from indifference because of the conviction that union is impossible, to the hope that even impossibilities here as well as elsewhere may be overcome by the power of God. But the difficulties are fully recognized.

In recent literature many good things are said; but when all credit has been given the fact remains that every fairly well read Disciple has within his reach a literature on this subject which in its comprehensiveness has never been approached. The spirit of union among our people, inherited from the fathers, the minute examination of the systems which in their day hindered the approach to union and even divided the united, the unceasing war on human creeds as bonds of union, the proposals for peace, and the terms of union as suggested by the Campbells and their immediate successors, have given us an impulse and a body of literature which would be to the authors of the volumes we have in mind, did they but know of its existence and our own desire for unity, an unfailing source of supply from which they would have drawn to great advantage. From 1865 until now no literature has appeared on the subject comparable to that which appeared among the Disciples from 1823 to 1865. Beginning with the Christian Baptist, to say nothing of the Declaration and Address, until the final volume of the Millenial Harbinger, the Disciples have furnished all who desire to contribute to the subject inspiration and information which would make their additions to the subject of untold value, as compared with that value untouched by the riches of the Disciples' literature. And if confirmation of this opinion were needed it can easily be found in the masterly address of Dr. W. T. Moore in the latest issue of Christian Union Library, of which Dr. Peter Ainslie is editor. In small compass that covers as much ground as some volumes of 200 pages I have read. It goes straight to the mark.

As we read these later volumes we find ourselves asking, Why do we meet no references to the Disciples, and their contribution to the subject? And, in some cases, we console ourselves that as the writers live in sections remote from our activities they know nothing of us. On the other hand, here for instance is a volume entitled "Church Unity," published in 1896, containing six addresses by noted men, and not a single reference have we found to the work of the Disciples. Not even in a chapter on "Irenic Movements since the Reformation," by Bishop John F. Hurst of the Methodist church, are we once mentioned. And that in view of the fact that the efforts of George Calixtus, John Durie, Hugo Grotius, John Owen, Richard Baxter, and Robert Hall are mentioned. But that does not unduly surprise us, as all these are Europeans. It is only when the omission occurs when we read of the efforts in America that we have a right to be greatly surprised. How many have ever heard of Abraham Van Dyke, Esq., who in 1836 published a book entitled, "Christian Union; or an Argument for the Abolition of Sects?" How widely is the fact known that his argument was warmly reprobated by the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Kentucky, Dr. B. B. Smith, and Dr. Charles Hodges in the Princeton Review? We find recorded the formation of the Brotherhood of Christian Unity in 1893, and of the League of Catholic Unity in 1895. Is it possible that Bishop Hurst considered the opposition of Bishop Smith of Kentucky to the proposals of the lawyer Abraham Van Dyke, of more importance than the voluminous contributions of the Campbells? Certain it is that we cannot charge the Bishop with ignorance of their existence. It will not avail to say that we have been sectarian in our propaganda for union, or that we have not realized our own desires in this matter. The Bishop was giving a history, and if a review in a quarterly could be included, we fail to understand why the Declaration and Address should be ignored, or the presence of more than a million people who are devoted to union on the basis of the Restoration of apostolic Christianity. Such silence is a perversion of history. Robert Hall and Bishop Smith of Kentucky devoted a few pamphlets to the discussion of Christian union; Alexander Campbell devoted his life. Union discussions in the Princeton Review were mere incidents; such discussions in the literature of the Disciples have been predominant. There is no justification or excuse for ignoring a movement which the Independent, some years ago, was generous enough to declare had leavened every denomination in America.

I sincerely wish that we would drop every other issue among us for a year at least, and allow once more the passion for union to dominate both pulpit and press. Our basis makes its appeal to all creeds that accept the Bible as a rule of faith and practice. If it be urged that we bring to an end our own dissensions before making an effort to heal the divisions of Christendom, I am sure none will ignore such a proposal; but it may be after all that the best means to such an end would be to lose sight of the smaller issues in our devotion to the larger. If we can learn the sinfulness of division as observed in our own discords they shall not have been in vain. For the same power that makes the stormy wind to fulfill his word is able to turn our tumults into calm. It is possible that for the sin of abandoning our pristine mission a rebuke has come to us in the storms of later days, and that our unrest may be a trumpet voice to call us back from our wandering. For certain it is since we became enamoured of organization and the "photographic journalism"—thanks to The Century for that phrase, which will certainly become historic—we have made history which should teach anew the blessings of union. With it came a new vocabulary in which are found the slogans, "the Old Book," "the Old Ship," and "the Old Guard," and these have been shanghaied into dishonorable service all too often. The crux of nine-tenths of our problems has been how to reconcile the claims of an Establishment with the breadth and freedom of a Reformatory and Restoration movement. In the meantime the Disciples have been ignored by large sections of American Christianity, evidently on the ground that our own problems were too serious to allow our giving aid in the solution of other people's.

But the Disciples must be heard. And our task in the years that are upon us should be a consideration of any sensible plan that will put in the fore-front the plea which needs no revision, and that affords such a reasonable basis of union that those who give it serious consideration will not be likely to turn aside from it with indifference. As has been pointed out several times in recent years, ours may be an introductory word. Let us be content with that as a beginning, and equally content to say that it is not the final word. E. B. B.

BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

The Casting Out of Demons

"Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast it out? And He saith unto them, Because of your little faith."—Matthew xvii. 19, 20.

"And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word by the signs that followed." —Mark xvi. 20.

The Church of God is the body of Christ, and therefore the instrument of his activity in the world. The work of Christ, according to his own declaration, was that of seeking and saving the lost. That is still his work in the world. In this economy of Pentecost, by the Spirit of God through the church, he seeks to carry out this great mission.

I desire to speak of one particular phase of that work to which the Church of God is called, and to which indeed, every individual believer is called in some measure. I want to discuss in the light of my texts the very widespread failure in one particular phase of the work of seeking and saving the lost.

In this work of winning men there is an element of conflict with the powers of darkness. I am not referring to our personal conflict against these rulers of the present darkness of the world in spiritual places. I am referring rather to our conflict with them as they possess, and master, and destroy, the men we desire to win.

The whole question of demon possession is one of great interest, and as I personally believe of vital importance, and one that is altogether too much neglected. I am not proposing to deal at all fully with the subject. I touch upon it merely by way of introduction. There have been special manifestations of this fact in the history of the world. During the earthly ministry of our Lord it became apparent in a most remarkable degree as these gospel records reveal. Over and over again, when he has come by the way of his Evangel and through the work of the missionaries of the cross, into new territories there have been similar manifestations.

Special Manifestations.

This fact of demon possession has had special manifestations also in connection with outstanding spiritual movements in the history of the Church of God; for, be well assured that wherever there may be some new movement of power on the part of the Holy Spirit, we may expect to see new manifestations of spiritual antagonism which are entirely evil.

In connection with that wonderful spiritual awakening associated with the name of Edward Irving, there were manifestations of the presence and power of evil spirits. We are not without such evidence in our day. The very elect are in danger of being deceived, as Satan disguises himself as an angel of light, and his messengers appear in forms which imitate the activities of the Spirit of God.

We go back to the Dark Ages, and we remember the idea which then obtained, that men sold themselves in some mystic and awful way to the devil, bargained themselves away to him. We consider that idea unwarranted, although we are still interested in reading literature that bases its thought on that assumption. Yet was the idea wholly untrue? It is terribly true that by yielding to Satan for some imagined—and in a sense for some real gain—men pass under his power; and that not subjectively merely, but objectively and actually. Men yielding themselves to some enticement of the devil, some allurement of Satan, weaken their own power so far as to become actual instruments of Satan, mastered by evil spirits, possessed by demons, as surely today as in the days of Christ.

Face to Face With Them.

In the work of winning souls, we are constantly brought face to face with such men and women. Alas, that there are so many who bear the name of Christ and are enrolled within the number of his earthly church who never make any attempt to win souls. Anything I may say will be to them a foreign language. There are, however, multitudes of those who see the importance of leaving themselves at his disposal that he may fulfil his mission through them; and I venture to affirm that even if they have not named this fact as I have named it, they have been brought face to face with just such cases as are in my mind.

I desire to clear the way by saying that I am speaking largely out of my own consciousness and experience; out of my own sense of frequent failure; out of the consciousness of hours that I have spent upon these premises, hours in which alas, all too often, I have been brought face to face with my own ghastly failure. If I say that to you with perfectly honest sincerity, you will have the key perhaps to the somewhat strange and unusual burden of my message tonight.

And I propose to give this message, not by any discussion of the difficulty speculatively, but by going back to one of the familiar gospel stories which is remarkably illuminative in this respect, qualifying it by Pentecost as we must necessarily do; for preaching on a subject so solemn as this, indeed in preaching on any of the New Testament writings, we must ever remember on which side of Pentecost we are living. We shall always fail if we take the narratives of the gospel and forget that since these men companied with Jesus, the Holy Spirit has been given, and the whole relationship of men and women to him has been entirely changed by that Pentecostal effusion.

The Story.

Let us first refresh our memories as to the story. The Lord descended from the Holy Mount, the Mount of Transfiguration. What did he find in the valley? A boy demon-possessed. One of the evangelists uses a phrase full of light concerning him; the father declared to Jesus, This is "my son . . . mine only child"; quite literally the father said, This is my only begotten boy. Jesus also found his disciples baffled, beaten, and unable to deal with this particular case. He found the scornful scribes questioning them. He found the multitudes watching, listening, observing. He immediately put forth his power, and with authority commanded the unclean spirit to come out of the lad, and as the story tells us with a touch of beautiful tenderness, he gave the boy back to his father.

Then the disciples privately took their Lord aside and asked him, "Why could not we cast it out?" The answer, as I have said, and as I shall ask you carefully to notice, is perfectly clear and distinct, "Because of your little faith." Mark records the answer as having been, "This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer." Faith was lacking; prayer was lacking. Faith is the principle. Prayer is the practice proceeding therefrom.

With the qualification of Pentecost as already suggested, let us apply the story in three respects: first considering the defeat of the disciples; secondly, the explanation of the Lord; and finally, the secret of success in the presence of such cases as I have described, and as herein revealed.

Their Defeat.

Their defeat was patent, undeniable. Now, the remarkable nature of their defeat consists in the fact that they had cast out demons before. Unless we remember that, we may imagine they had come to the limit of their power, that never before had they been confronted by demon-possessed men, and that they were not to be expected to cast out demons. But as a matter of fact, when the Lord sent them out, he gave them authority over all unclean spirits, and they had been successful in speaking the word of power whereby demons had been driven forth from men. Something had happened, and they were not able to speak with authority. They had lost the power they had been given. That is the point of the story.

But now let us consider another fact. The disciples were concerned about the failure, and sought the Lord's explanation. The most deadly and appalling phase of the powerlessness of many of us is that we are not concerned about it. May God drive all of us who are conscious of this failure to inquiry.

Doubted the Cross.

I am perfectly assured in my own soul that there can be no interpretation of this story unless we take in a wider range of observation. Where did this happen? All three evangelists set this story at the same point, and in the same relationship to other facts; in the same relationship to one movement at that period of the ministry of our Lord. We must see the whole movement. We go back to Cæsarea Philippi; and to Peter's confession. The Lord for the first time in response to that confession told these men of his Cross with clear detail.

From that time began Jesus to show unto his disciples, how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be raised up. And Peter took him, and began to rebuke him, saying "Be it far from thee, Lord; this shall never be unto thee." But Jesus turning upon him said, "Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art a stumbling-block unto me: for thou mindest not the things of God, but the things of men."

When he told them that the way of the crowning was the way of the cross, that the way of triumph was the way of travail, that the secret of his own authority over all the forces of evil was his co-operation with that "determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God" whereby he would finally come to the Cross, and must come to the Cross; they were afraid, became filled with fear; faith failed and they fell out of close communion with him. The following days were shadowed days of distance between them and himself.

The next story is that of the Mount of Transfiguration; the story of how three of them were rebuked by Heaven for not listening to Jesus, when he told them of the coming Cross.

The next story is that of the disciples baffled, beaten, defeated by demons in the valley. That was earth's rebuke for unbelief. They had failed to follow him by the way of the Cross. I do not say that those men failed because they did not understand the Cross. If I must understand the Cross in order to succeed, then I shall never succeed, for its mystery is infinitely beyond my comprehension. When their intellect failed to grasp the necessity which he expressed in the word, he Son of Man must; they fell back, they lost touch with him, they passed out of communion with him. Faith wavered; prayer, communion, ceased; and the demon laughed at them.

A Distinct Difference.

Over all that we must throw the light of Pentecost. There is a very distinct difference; but to understand the difference is but to emphasize the responsibility and make more terrible the failure. These men were sent with authority, they were delegated, and given power within themselves. We are not. We are no longer separated from our Lord in that way. We are members of his body, indwelt by his spirit. He does not now delegate us, or send us with authority, as apart from himself. Today he says, severed from me ye can do nothing. Consequently today if we are in the presence of failure such as this, we must understand that that failure is more terrible, for all the resources of his unlimited power are at our disposal in just such hours of need and difficulty.

There are demon-possessed men today. If you so will, for the sake of argument I will put that in another way; there are men today, into contact with whom we are constantly being brought when we are on the business of soul winning, who are gripped by forms of evil over which they are entirely powerless. Here is a man in the grasp of sensuality. It burns like a fire in his blood. It mocks his highest dream, and laughs at his highest endeavor, and re-asserts itself over and over again. Here is another man or woman in an equally iron grip, the grip of drugs; mastered by an awful passion. Here is another man—the story does not seem so vulgar but it is almost more terrible—all the powers of his life are under the mastery of greed, he is forever gaining, attempting to satisfy some awful passion within him, the passion to get, to hold. Here is another human being, almost weirdly yet tragically unable to be truthful, a liar. The tragedy of our neurotic age is that we laugh at that man, and speak as though he were to be pitied. He is to be pitied; but not with that pity which regards lying as something to be excused. Sensuality, drugs, greed, untruth, and others I have not named; these forces are wounding men, mastering them, destroying them. We know it; and they know it.

Want Release.

Many of these people are brought to the point where they do most earnestly and sincerely desire release from these forces which master them. I am only dealing with such. Alas, we have to admit that we have also been brought face to face with men in the grip of evils such as I have described, who seem to have no desire to be set free from them. For such we have no responsibility. I am speaking of those who have looked into my eyes and with the agony of hell in theirs have asked me, Is there no deliverance? They have yielded to Satan until Satan, through an evil spirit, has actually taken possession of them and mastered them. Coming face to face with such men and women we are constantly powerless. They have even come to take counsel with us who name his name and who know in our own lives the power of his wonderful deliverance; we have come to the moment when there ought to have been the actual consciousness of power, and we have broken down. I have no desire to involve any man in condemnation who is not involved. In the presence of God, I am speaking for myself. The tragedy of this powerlessness has been sometimes the greatest sorrow of heart that I have ever known in my life. It is that which has driven me back to my New Testament and to this story with earnest inquiry.

Side by side with that, place another fact of to-day. Then, our Lord came personally face to face with the boy, and with a burning word that was full of dignity, He threw the evil spirit out; not within pain and suffering to the boy in the process, but with complete triumph. To-day, he repeatedly does the same thing. We have seen it happen. Men are actually set free from every one of the forces of which I have spoken. The man steeped in sensuality;—one needs some other word, reeking with it—swirt as a flash of lightning, is set free! My mind goes back to my early days here, to a man who was a familiar figure in our services seven years ago. What was the story of Shorey? The story of a man reeking with drugs and alcohol in New York; who suddenly, through the ministry of one who was a true instrument of Jesus Christ, came face to face with the Lord, and the power of all the old habits was broken; and for a generation he knew himself master of the things which had mastered him. There is no need for me to argue, the witnesses are innumerable.

How are We to Succeed?

How are we to succeed in such cases? Here again let me remind you that popular human ideas are all wrong, and the suggestions which we too often hear are insufficient. How are we to deal with these demon-possessed men and women?

By new societies? How we are multiplying them! I sometimes think if there is sorrow in heaven, what sorrow there must be among the angels and the saints over our multiplication of societies, and our futile attempts to cast out demons by manipulation of our own resources.

By a new study of humanity, the study of psychology? You cannot teach children now unless you have studied child nature! You cannot preach unless you understand psychology! Let no man think I am fool enough to undervalue psychology; but if we are going to put psychology in the place of Jesus Christ, we are going to have disastrous failure. Real knowledge of the child includes the recognition of the fact that we go astray from our birth speaking lies. The true knowledge of man includes the knowledge of the foreign element, which is nevertheless the destructive element, of sin. To know evil is to know that we can neither end or mend it.

Or again there is to-day a widespread appeal to the will; we are urged to call young people to high heroism! But save as men seek first the forgiveness of sins, resulting from the passion of God in the Cross, there will be no high heroism that is not doomed to disappointment and defeat.

We are face to face with paralysis and failure because we have trusted in the wrong things to do this work.

Two Great Words.

Let us hear the Lord. What is the secret of success. I take two words, one from Matthew and one from Mark; faith and prayer; faith is the principle of relationship; prayer is the practice of relationship.

And again, we must not forget the qualification of Pentecost. These men were given authority and sent out. To-day the last word of Jesus is this, "All"—and I wish I knew how to say that "All" as I feel it—"ALL authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth." What then are we to be? We are to be the media of his authority; men and women through whom he can speak. If we will trust him; not sing about it, or talk about it; but do it, then we shall be able to cast out demons.

You turn upon the preacher with perfect propriety and ask, Can you? I answer you out of my heart; I have got as far as the father of the boy; Lord, "I believe; help thou mine unbelief."

She Should Marry a Minister

"If I were a minister's wife," said a lady in the car, who was talking too loud not to be overheard, "you may rest assured I should take an interest—an active interest—in my husband's work. I should say to him: 'Richard, if you want to do well next Sunday, preach short! If you want your congregation to grow larger and larger, preach short! If you want to draw them to this church, that church, and the other, preach short! Always preach short! But, Richard, have something to say, always! Condense, condense, and condense, and then have an air about you as if time were worth something and you could not afford to lose a minute of it.' If on a Sunday morning he seemed to be in an extra amiable mood, I would venture to say: 'Richard, dear, don't be all day in giving out your notices! Don't blink over them and clear your throat, and go poking along through them as if you had never seen them before and were pondering them in your mind as you call attention to them! Don't, I beg you, Richard, read them straight forward and then say them all over again backward! There is nothing so tiresome!' I am not sure but some Sunday I should say: 'Richard, if you get the least mite tedious today I shall fuss with my bonnet-strings as a warning! And when you say, "In conclusion," don't for pity's sake go on until you reach a "Finally," and after that, "One word more," or "Just another thought." I do think it is such a mistake to try to tell all one knows in one sermon.'"

Just then the auditor was obliged to leave the car, but he could not help exclaiming to himself, "What a sensible woman!" It is to be hoped that some day this sensible one will marry a minister.

Knew the Accused

A Wheeling (W. Va.) lawyer says that he has heard many queer verdicts in his time, but that the quaintest of these was that brought in not long ago by a jury of mountaineers in a sparsely settled part of that state.

This was the first case for the majority of the jury, and they sat for hours arguing and disputing over it in the bare little room at the rear of the courtroom. At last they straggled back to their places, and the foreman, a lean, gaunt fellow, with a superlatively solemn expression, voiced the general opinion:

"The jury don't think that he done it, for we allow he wan't there; but we think he would have done it ef he'd had the chanst."—Harper's Magazine.

Somewhat Premature

Old Jake La Rue was a very crusty man, full of gouty aches due to age and overeating. He lost patience with his physician one day because the latter did not make enough fuss over the pain his patient suffered.

"Doctor," he thundered, "you don't understand! You don't seem to grasp the case! You talk as if there were nothing the matter with me, whereas I am suffering the torments of the damned!"

"What, already?" queried the doctor, in apparent amazement.—Lippincott's.

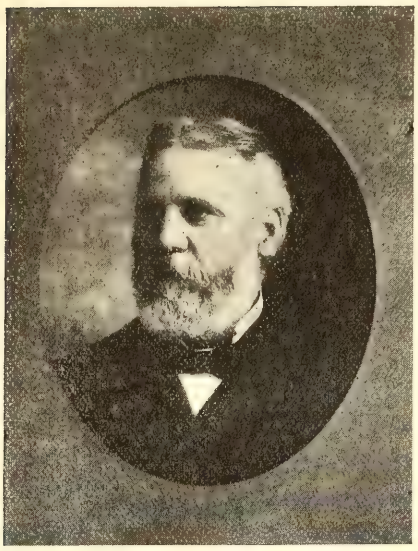
Recognized Some Words

"My dear!" called a wife to her husband, who was in the next room, "what are you opening that can with?"

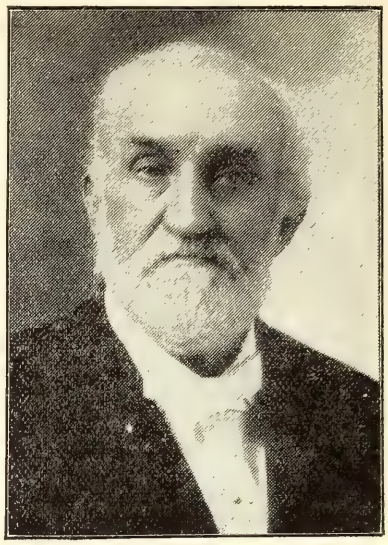
"Why," he said, "with a can opener. What did you suppose I was opening it with?"

"Well," replied his wife, "I thought from your remarks you were opening it with prayer."—McCall's Magazine.

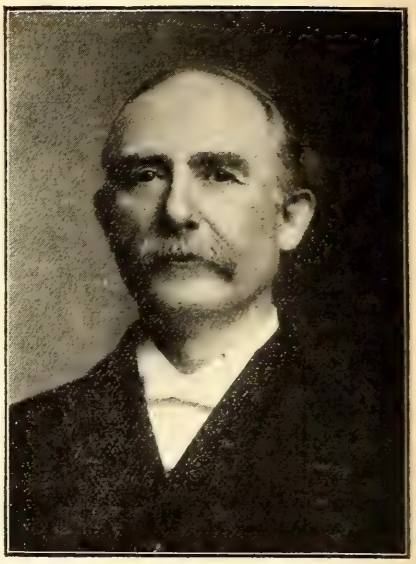
THREE PROMINENT CONGRESS SPEAKERS



Rev. J. H. Garrison.



Rev. J. B. Briney.



Prof. S. M. Jefferson.

The Congress of the Disciples

Kansas City—April 16-18—Linwood Boulevard Church

The thirteenth annual Congress of the Disciples to be held next week promises to embody all the features of an ideal congress—a large attendance, a program of live and urgent topics, representative speakers, a wide margin of time for general discussion, hearty and competent hospitality, and manifold opportunities for Christian fellowship. It will be a great week. The program committee has been most fortunate in securing two Baptist leaders, than whom their denomination has none more authoritative on the subjects upon which they will speak. Professor Batten is contributing more than any other man to the efficiency of the commission on Social Service of the Federal Council of Churches. His address on Wednesday evening has the same title as his book recently published. His message will be illuminating. Dr. Bitting is a vigorous and gripping speaker. He was an aggressive leader of his denomination in the organization of the Northern Baptist Convention some two years since, which brought order and organic consciousness into that communion of churches hardly less individualistic than are the Disciples. With J. B. Briney to say why Disciples should not be so organized every attendant may expect a debate that in itself will repay the cost of the trip. As to the rest of the program it speaks for itself to every one at all familiar with Disciple problems and personalities. The Christian Century republishes the program herewith because in our previous announcement the days and hours for the respective papers had not yet been fixed.

Program

TUESDAY EVENING, April 16.—Judge J. N. Haymaker, of Wichita, Kans., presiding.

7:45. Devotional.

8:00. Paper. John Ray Ewers, of Pittsburgh, Pa.
"The Principles of Scientific Management Applied to Church Work."

8:40. Second Paper. Thomas W. Grafton, Kansas City, Mo.

WEDNESDAY FORENOON, April 17. Robert Graham Frank, of Liberty, Mo., presiding.

8:45. Devotional.

9:00. Paper. Dr. W. C. Bitting of St. Louis, Mo.
"The Development of Baptist Denominational Organization."

9:40. Second Paper. Rev. J. B. Briney, Pewee Valley, Ky.
"Is a Similar Development Legitimate in the Case of the Disciples of Christ?"

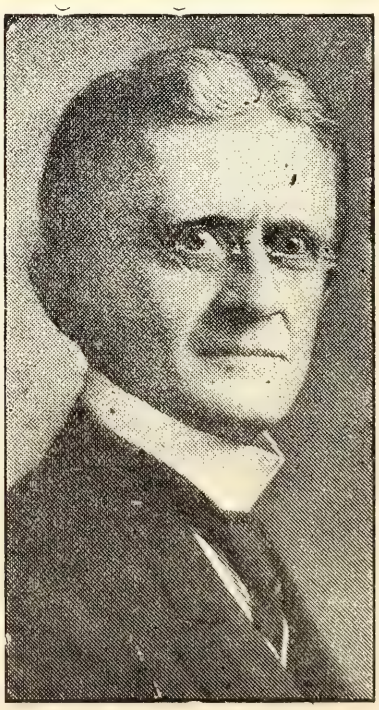
10:10. General Discussion.

11:45. Noon Intermission.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON. Pres. W. P. Aylsworth, of Cotner University, presiding.

1:45. Devotional.

2:00. Paper. Dean Frederick O. Norton, of Drake University.



Samuel Zane Batten, Prominent Baptist Educator.

"The Problem of Christian Union in the Light of New Testament Study."

2:40. Second Paper. Burris A. Jenkins, of Kansas City.

3:10. General Discussion.

4:30. Business.

5:00. Adjournment.

WEDNESDAY EVENING. Prof. Alva W. Taylor, of the Bible College of Missouri, presiding.

7:45. Devotional.

8:00. Address. Prof. Samuel Zane Batten, of the Baptist Social Service Commission, Des Moines, Iowa.
"The Social Task of the Church."

THURSDAY FORENOON, April 18. A. C. Smither, of the Christian Board of Publication, presiding.

8:45. Devotional.

9:00. Paper. Prof. S. M. Jefferson, of Transylvania University.
"Is Christian Union Possible in the Light of History, Psychology and Logic."

9:40. Second Paper. Prof. Herbert Martin, of Drake University.

10:00. General Discussion.

11:45. Noon Intermission.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON. Pres. T. C. Howe, of Butler College, presiding.

1:45. Devotional.

2:00. Paper. Charles Clayton Morrison, of The Christian Century, Chicago, Ill.
"The Essential Plea of the Disciples of Christ in the Light of Their Origin and Aim."

2:40. Second Paper. J. H. Garrison, of the Christian Evangelist, St. Louis, Mo.

3:10. General Discussion.

4:30. Business.

5:00. Adjournment.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Charles Manford Sharpe, President and Acting Secretary, Columbia, Mo.
C. M. Chilton, St. Joseph, Mo.
Levi Marshall, Nevada, Mo.
L. J. Marshall, Kansas City, Mo.
T. W. Grafton, Kansas City, Mo.

Our Readers' Opinions

Other Matters to Consider

Editors The Christian Century: We are having trouble in California over the question of admitting other Christians to membership. The First Christian Church in Alameda is divided, and the First Church in Berkeley is to vote on it next Sunday and we fear division. I have long seen and felt the inconsistency of our practice of open communion and our refusal to admit to membership those we welcome to the Lord's table. A restudy of this question is legitimate. But while we are at it, let us consider some other things. Baptism for the remission of sins is one of them. We have many brethren who think that sprinkling and pouring are not baptism, and that, inasmuch as baptism is for the remission of sins, therefore those who have been sprinkled for baptism are yet in their sins.

If this be true it ought to bar them from the Table of the Lord as well as from membership. This is the bald logic of the question.

You go back in your presentation of the question of receiving the pious unimmersed to the teaching of the Campbells, before Walter Scott began preaching baptism for the remission of sins.

Both Thomas and Alexander Campbell were slow to receive this view, and only admitted its truthfulness in a formal sense.

The view that remission of sins is a sovereign act of God, and may take place in connection with what we call the change of heart, is not generally received by our people. Many of our preachers have taught that it takes place at the time of baptism. I have heard some contend that it takes place at the time of baptism just when the candidate is buried out of sight, and before being raised out of the water!

All our members, holding this view, are horrified at the idea of receiving the unimmersed into the church.

But your readers doubtless would like to know what I do when these good people wish to worship and commune with us. I invite them to do so, making them welcome to all the privileges of the church if they will live a pious life.

I do not enroll them as members of the church, but as sojourning believers in Christ Jesus. I keep their names on my private memorandum and when they remove, I give them letters, stating the fact of their sojourn and that their Christian conduct was worthy. This offends no one, and it will make no difference in the day of judgment if the Lord Jesus has their names in His book of life, whether we have them enrolled on our church book or not. In this I leave to their own souls the question as to whether the Lord has forgiven their sins and bestowed the gift of God which is eternal life. This is the true basis of membership and of union for all His disciples.

Santa Cruz, Cal. J. H. McCollough.

Three Inquiries Answered

The Christian Century is in receipt of a letter of kindly criticism from Mr. Stanton E. Hoover, of Croton, O. Mr. Hoover says that "the point the Disciples have always sought to hold before the world was that the New Testament church had certain well-defined boundaries, and that New Testament Christians were made by a rule, and in accordance with a well marked plan not at all hard to find out but clearly revealed to us in the words of Jesus and his apostles." He asks the following questions:

1. Do you believe the New Testament gives us enough of the history of the churches of that day to enable us to establish or know the same kind of a church today? If so, do you think we can improve it any, or do you think that that description is good enough?

2. Do you think that the New Testament tells us enough of the manner in which men became Christians in those days that we may make Christians in the same way today? If so do you think we can improve that way, or is that plan good enough?

3. If there is a Church of Christ on earth, and if there is revealed to us in the New Testament a plan for making Christians and bringing them into that church (which I regard as one and the same thing), what more do we need?

OUR REPLY.

1. The New Testament most surely gives us abundant information concerning the primitive church to enable us to identify the same kind of churches today and to establish them. We certainly cannot improve on the New Testament ideals for the church, though we can and actually do improve on the practice of the church whose history is partially recorded in the New Testament.

2. The New Testament way of becoming a Christian is very plain. Thomas Campbell's statement that the book was "intentionally intelligible" on this point is almost literally confirmed by the consensus of evangelical Christendom's opinion. There is very little difference among protestant bodies as to how men become Christians. Methodists and Episcopalians, Baptists, Presbyterians, Disciples and others are pretty well agreed on this point. The New Testament way is good enough for The Christian Century.

3. The Christian Century knows of nothing more that we need save that all who are members of that Church of Christ "revealed to us in the New Testament" shall practice in the eyes of the world the unity they already possess in Christ their common Head.

A Social or Sacrificial Death

Editors of The Christian Century: The interview with J. R. Perkins of Alameda in your issue of March 28, is interesting from several standpoints.

1. It gives The Century a standing for fairness in publishing both sides of an affair of national and international importance, as it relates to the brotherhood.

2. It reveals the attitude of the "modern mind" toward an interpretation of Christ's sacrifice which to "old timers" is nothing short of a denial of the atonement.

3. And yet it brings to view a great truth which those who have come into vital fellowship with Jesus must know by experience to be necessary to Christian growth and progress, viz.: That we are saved by his life and not alone by his death.

But to exalt the life at the expense of the sacrifice of Christ is, in my judgment, not good theology, or good sense. Suppose we say that we are saved by both—the blood of Jesus and the teaching of Jesus. Some power must wash a man and loose a man from the past.

I should like to know who in the brotherhood teaches, outside of Mr. Perkins, that Jesus died for himself.

When it is said that "Jesus died the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God," can that be said of any other man? Truly, if every man who dies for the truth is a saviour, then there are as many saviours as martyrs. Let those believe it who can that even Lincoln, the gentle, the kind, the noble, was a saviour as Jesus was. Though his death was no accident, he lived as he did, and he died as he did, because he was what he was. But is this all that can be said of the Son of God?

I do not think any one who appreciates the New Testament statements regarding the extraordinary death of Jesus will be satisfied with this. If Mr. Perkins is right in his interpretation we might as well shut our eyes to Easter and Pentecost; for in endeavoring to bring Christ's life and death down to the level of human lives—even the best, that is what it comes to.

Put the words of Jesus: "This is my blood of the new covenant, shed for many for the remission of sins," in the mouth of another, and how would they sound? Would it not make the man a consummate egotist?

If the Perkinian theory of the atonement be correct, why should it ever occur to any one to call Christ the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world, or to say that he bore our sins in his own body on the tree, or that he died for our sins, or that he loosed us from our sins in his own blood, or that God made Him to be sin for us, or condemned sin in his flesh, or that we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of our sin?

The truth is, our young men who have set to discover the trend of the modern mind and the new duties that are given this age, are removing the very foundations of faith and hope in Jesus Christ. Instead of explaining the atonement, and showing it meets the demands of man's nature and sinful past, it is a stumbling block in the way of human progress, that has to be cautiously evaded or laboriously explained out of existence. Dispense with the cross of Christ, as a means to procure salvation and crucify Jesus on a literary cross, as Emerson and others have done, and you take the very pith and marrow out of the gospel story and make Easter and Pentecost a farce.

And, then, of course, if the thing itself is not necessary, the symbol can not be.

Kansas City, Mo. James Small.

[The Christian Century holds no brief for Mr. Perkins' opinions, but it feels that our genial friend Mr. Small has read into Mr. Perkins' statement a negative meaning which his words do not justify and which, if we may venture a guess, Mr. Perkins would not approve. The quotation is taken from a daily newspaper interview for which fact due allowance should of course be made before registering a criticism on specific points. But the statement even as it stands is one which The Christian Century could approve heartily without denying the Scriptures to which our correspondent refers. Following is the statement: "The death of Christ saved only as a man was willing to live the things that caused his death—he died for the very principles of life, and we find our own redemption in our fidelity to the things that he would not surrender—the great ethical factors that underlie our civilization." This is a profound utterance. The Christian Century is evangelical to the root, not a whit less so than Mr. Small, but it would like nothing better than to defend Mr. Perkins' thesis.—The Editors.]

Two Irishmen were comparing notes about politics, jobs, hard times, and the like, when Pat O'Rourke, a third one, joined in the discussion.

"Sure and I'm satisfied with things," said. "I've a pache of a job."

"Is that so?" said the others. "And what might ye be doin'?"

"I'm pulling down the Episcopal Church," replied Pat, "and I'm gettin' paid for it."
—Everybody's Magazine.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

Modern Girls and Modern Chivalry

"The women in the Middle Ages certainly asked a lot of the men who liked them, didn't they?" remarked the girl in the lingerie waist, absorbed in the discussion of an historical novel and the consumption of a peach sundæ.

"Guess they did," agreed the girl in tan linen, indifferently. "They had to fight duels and carry secret messages and do all that sort of thing most all the time if they were going to make the heroine notice them at all. I've seen that in dozens of books, and I 'spect it's true. Oh, by the way," she added, with a sudden accession of interest. "Jack was 'round at the house last night and brought two pounds of candy, and May was there, and Tom—we had lots of fun. Wish you'd been there, too. Jack's awfully nice. He comes to see me once or twice every week, and he always brings a box of candy or a new book, or something, and he's always taking us to the theater, and Willow Grove and the Park. That's the kind of a man I like."

The talk drifted on to personal matters, carelessly—little foolish bits of girlish gossip. But, sitting at the next table to the two girls, a man heard the light remarks anent mediæval demands upon chivalry and the liberality of "Jack." And it made him think.

He knew dozens of "Jacks"—generous, light-hearted young fellows, who worked hard all day, and who had plenty of nice girl friends whom they liked, and with whom they enjoyed spending an evening.

And he knew dozens of girls like these—merry, good-humored, unthinking, fond of fun and fond of society, nice girls for a chap to know, all of them, and yet making constantly, demands that few young men on a salary could meet.

And, as he sat there at the little table in the confectioner's shop, he remembered one of these same "Jacks" whom he knew—a boy who had fallen into low company, and whom he had helped to set on his feet again. And he thought of the boy's hot young accusation—

"I tell you, a fellow who hasn't lots of money can't afford to go with nice girls. I can't be getting five-pound boxes of chocolates, and flowers, and theater tickets, all the time. I simply haven't the money—I'm not a millionaire. And it sort of forces a fellow down—somewhere else."

"But the average nice girl makes a chap spend money on her all the time. If he doesn't bring her little presents, and take her to the play, and send her flowers on her birthday and a dozen other days in the course of the year, and 'show her a good time' generally—well, he's out of the running. She hasn't any use for him. 'If you haven't any money, why, you needn't come round'—that's just it.

"It isn't the fellow who's the nicest, or cleverest, or jolliest—in the last analysis, it isn't even the fellow who cares the most about a girl—who wins out. It's the man who can give her the most presents, spend the most money on 'showing her a good time.'"

As the man sat there at the little table, and thought of what the two girls had said, it seemed to him that the boy's bitter charges came near being true. These were nice girls—the one in the lingerie waist and the one in the tan linen suit; they were likable, well dressed, representative American girls. And, all unconsciously, he thought, they were judging their men friends by a standard of dollars and cents—not generosity, though they called it that—but a weak spendthrift extravagance.

Not because they really wanted them, but because, through some feminine folly in setting fashions, it seemed "the thing to do," they were requiring as the price of their friendship gifts of bonbons and books and bouquets, constantly. They were hurting themselves, the man reflected, cheapening themselves a little; but that was as nothing beside the harm they were doing to other persons—to those same Jacks and Freds and Toms of whom they exacted tribute.

And, thinking of what the girls had said about demands made by the "ladies fair" of mediæval legends and historical novels, the man wondered whether, after all, the "women in the Midule Ages" had really "asked such a lot." They had demanded, the girl in tan linen had said, that their knights should "fight duels and carry secret messages and do all that sort of thing all the time." And these things were doubtless hard to do, and dangerous. But at least, the man told himself, smiling whimsically, at least they were romantic; at least they carried with them their own inherent possibilities of adventure.

What was it, he asked himself, that they had demanded, these fair-haired heroines of old romance? What but courage and loyalty and devotion—honesty of purpose, purity of mind, generosity of spirit—things fine and good and worthy.

And as he thought of the tribute that must be paid to the modern girl, as his boy friend had described her, and as the young woman at the next table had typified her desire, it seemed to him that she had fallen far below her "exacting" and imperious sister of the old story books. For the things that girls asked today, he thought, scornfully, were stupid things, commercial things, matters of convention and careless pleasure and a superficial homage. A reckless extravagance, the pitiless servitude to "money worries" and the haunting thought of debt, the well-nigh unattainable tokens of an unworthy chivalry bought with dollars and cents—these the modern "nice girl" required—unknowingly, but with none the less tyrannous exaction. And these things were not fine, nor good, nor noble. They bound one, insolubly, to the merciless serfdom of the second-best.

No, the man decided, it was not the "women of the Middle Ages" who "asked a lot." It was the women of today, who have cheapened themselves until they are not worthy of great respect.—Exchange.

Chinese View of Millinery

(From the Pekin News.)

Speaking to a Chinese gentleman the other day an Englishman asked him if the Chinese ladies will emulate the men and go in for Western headgear. In reply he beamed a smile most childlike and bland.

Pressed for something more definite, he remarked: "Did you not know that it is a well known fact among the Chinese that the reason so many European husbands look harassed and care-ridden and the further reason why so many of your young men refrain from marriage is this very question of millinery. Ladies' hats cost so much that they spell ruin and so we Chinese have told our women folk that we absolutely forbid them to follow Western fashions in this regard, whatever they may do in other directions."

Woman's Doings

—Miss Margaret A. Haley, the well-known Catholic teacher of Chicago, has been campaigning for the single tax in Seattle, without pay. A single tax amendment was submitted at the late election, and lost. Miss Haley says: "It was a great battle in Seattle. Not for the single tax, for this it was only a preliminary skirmish; but for civic decency and manhood and womanhood. And in the election of George F. Cotterill for mayor, manhood and womanhood won."

—It is announced that Lord Strathcona, the Canadian high commissioner, will invest the $47,000 secured for the Dickens fund in Canadian securities which will yield an annual income of $750 for the next five years to each of the granddaughters of Charles Dickens. After that time the money will be used to purchase annuities which will yield each of the women $850 a year.

—Miss Suzanne Bernard, the second woman to meet her death while flying, seems to have been a victim of overconfidence in her ability to manage her aeroplane. The accident occurred on the Etampes aerodrome, in Paris, France. She had started to qualify as an air pilot. Her comrades, who knew her daring, begged her to be careful, but she hardly listened to their warnings. Miss Bernard was only nineteen years old, and took up aeroplaning last September.

—Queen Mary's so-called primness, plainness, and common sense do not forbid of her wearing that most expensive fur—sables—when a large part of the citizens of her country are hungry. Since her return from India, she has been wearing some magnificent sables. They were the coronation gift of King George. The coat and muff are of picked Russian sable skins and are of as fine a quality as those of the Empress of Russia. It is said that for years the queen had wished for these furs, but declined to possess them because of the expense.

—The department of health in New York has been asked by a number of women to begin a crusade on "long and dangerous" hatpins. As a beginner, the health commissioner has been asked to have printed slips, which can be passed out in subway trains and surface cars warning those who wear them of the menace they are to others.

—Mrs. A. Emmagene Paul, for many years Chicago's most widely known street cleaning inspector, died last week. She was born at Webster, N. Y., and received her education at an Eastern seminary. The advent of a woman in the street cleaning department of Chicago was ridiculed at first, but the remarkable aptitude for the work in hand soon stamped her as the most successful street inspector in the city. At the time of her death she was still connected with the street department.

—Senator Robert M. La Follette, according to the April installment of his biography, will take the stump in Wisconsin next fall in favor of woman's suffrage.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

A revival meeting is being held at Hutsonville by S. R. Gilbert.

The churches at London Mills and Hermon are now being ministered to by A. C. Stewart.

R. O. Rogers, pastor at Carterville, is holding a revival meeting for his home congregation.

In a revival meeting at Sessor, being held by D. G. Dungan, there were fifty-five additions at last report.

Sailor Springs church has employed Steven T. Fogate to become its pastor. He is already at work with this church.

J. V. Coombs is in a revival meeting at West Salem, which began the first of April. The pastor here is G. W. Ford.

P. M. Durham of Albion is preaching for the churches at Belmont and Maud, giving one-half time to each church.

Major Griffith is preaching for the congregation at Aetna two Sundays out of the month.

J. M. Francis has removed from Newton to Knoxville, where he has lately become pastor.

O. W. Jennings has resigned the pulpit at Granite City. His work will be terminated the first Sunday in April.

The church at Washington is soon to be pastorless from the resignation of E. H Reed, which takes effect about the first of May.

Fred Wilson of Des Moines, Ia., is the new minister of the church at Rushville, his pastorate having begun there the latter part of March.

During a recent three weeks, there were eleven additions at Watseka church, where Ellmore Sinclair is pastor. Of these additions seven were on profession of faith.

J. M. McColley, who has been pastor at Paxton, has resigned to accept the ministry of Shelbyville church. His duties at the latter place will begin the first of May.

Milo W. Nethercutt, who has done a satisfactory work with the congregation at Onarga, resigned there to become pastor at Moweaqua. His removal took place the first of April.

D. H. Shanklin, on March 17, witnessed seven confessions at regular services. Mr. Shanklin has been with this church since the first of January, during which time there have been fifty additions.

In the revival meeting at Camargo, led by Lew D. Hill and his singer, Mr. Knowles, the additions have so far numbered twenty-three. The meeting was to be concluded in a few days.

At London Mills, where A. C. Stewart is pastor, there were four additions on profession of faith in a recent Sunday morning service. Mr. Stewart gives only one-half of his time to this congregation.

A four weeks' meeting at Chandlerville, conducted by Dr. Barton Aylesworth and Roy Williamson, resulted in the addition of a large number of new members.

Lawrenceville pastorate, which was recently vacated by B. F. Cato, who moved to Georgetown, Kentucky, has been accepted by T. A. Hall of Princeton, Indiana. His ministry began there the first of April.

Fife Brothers, in their meeting at Onarga, report ninety additions, all but two being by baptism. The ministers and churches of the town had been most cordial in their support of the meeting.

On the seventy-second anniversary of the church's organization at Princeton, Cecil C. Carpenter entered the seventh year of his pastorate with this church. The double anniversary was celebrated in an appropriate way.

John R. Golden of West Side church, Springfield, filled appointments at Danvers and Girard in the interest of the local option campaigns being waged in those towns. He spoke to large and enthusiastic audiences of people.

Howett Street Church, Peoria, continues to prosper under the ministry of William Price, who has been with the congregation for five years. The pastorate is to be continued without interruption, for which the congregation is congratulating itself.

The ministers and churches of Petersburg co-operated in holding services during Passion Week every evening. The ministers of the town alternated in preaching the sermons. The pastor of the Christian church here is A. I. Zeller.

A union revival meeting is being conducted at Clinton by Evangelists Beadles and Fischer. Partly as a result of this meeting, there were thirty-eight additions at the Christian church on a recent date. The pastor here is J. F. Rosborough.

This week the congregation at Gibson City is entertaining the Central Illinois Christian Ministerial Institution. A good program has been provided, which doubtless will attract many ministers and some laymen from the central part of the state.

The congregation at Twin Grove is to erect a new structure of concrete material. This church had the misfortune last fall of having its building demolished in the storm. They are now preparing to have one of the best country structures among the Disciples in Illinois.

DeLand church, from which George W. Wise recently resigned to become pastor at Lincoln, has extended a call to J. H. Stambaugh, who has been ministering to the Mt. Vernon church. The call has been accepted and the new pastorate will be assured at an early date.

The fourteenth year of his pastorate was recently entered into by D. E. Hughes at Monmouth. The congregation very wisely granted an increase of salary amounting to two hundred dollars. This pastorate is one of the most conspicuous of the Illinois pastorates, both for its efficiency and for the duration of time through which it has extended.

Macomb church, ministered to by Allen T. Shaw, will be led in a revival meeting during this month by the Fife Brothers. This church, though impeded in its giving by a large debt, exceeded its apportionment and the offerings in previous years for foreign missions.

Pekin church, through its minister, O. C. Bolman, with the assistance of State Secretary J. Fred Jones, set apart Leroy F. Sargent to the ministry on the evening of April 3. Mr. Sargent is now in Eureka College, preparing himself for the ministry.

Fifth District Evangelist, Charles Hougham, with the assistance of Miss Alice Taylor of Springfield, held a meeting at Woodson, in which there were five additions. The meeting was concluded on account of impassable roads and stormy weather. The pastor here is Dr. G. W. Miller.

The evangelistic services at Bridgeport, conducted by Evangelist J. E. Stout, were concluded with a total of one hundred three additions. Of these, eighty were received by baptism. This church has been served for several years by George W. Shroeder, who has recently been called to the church at Winchester, Indiana. His successor will be T. A. Lindenmeyer, who has been pastor at Salem. Mr. Lindenmeyer will begin his ministry here at once.

The three churches of Springfield with their pastors, F. W. Burnham, John R. Golden, and Gifford Ernest, co-operated with the other churches and ministers of the city in celebrating Passion Week. A union service was held at the noon hour every day in the First Methodist Church. The various ministers of the city led the service and delivered a fifteen-minute sermon. The singing of hymns, prayers, the sermons, and the union spirit, together with the meditation upon our Lord's passion, were a source of inspiration.

McLean church has greatly profited by a revival meeting held by John H. Booth, secretary of the Church Extension Society, of Kansas City. The church here has been without a pastor for some considerable time, but as a result of the impetus given the work by Mr. Booth's meeting a pastor has been engaged, F. L. Starbuck of Eureka, whose services will begin there immediately. Mr. Starbuck is a student of Eureka College, who has already proved his capability and efficiency in other fields.

Chicago

Dr. E. S. Ames addressed the Chicago Presbyterian ministers last Monday morning on "The Value to the Minister of the Study of Psychology." Dr. Ames received twelve additions to Hyde Park Church during March.

A. H. Jordan, of Lorain, Ohio, preached at Monroe Street Church March 31, to delighted congregations. C. C. Morrison preached there on Easter Sunday.

Austin Hunter reports twenty-seven confessions on Palm Sunday, at Jackson Boulevard Church.

W. F. Shaw, of Sheffield Ave. Church, read a paper on the Devotional Life, before the Ministers' Association April 1.

Church Life

C. H. Bloom of Elmira, N. Y., has accepted the pastorate at Cadiz, O.

The Minges company had 501 additions the first week in their meeting at Pittsburg, Kan.

The church in Owosso, Mich., has received 11 additions during the five months' pastorate of C. R. Wolford.

It has been reported that eight foreign missionaries and their children were murdered in the riots at Sianfu, China.

The church at Fairmount, Ind., has purchased a prominent lot and will begin a new and adequate building very soon.

At the close of a sermon by Mr. Guy, of Berkeley, Calif., Jan. 24, four young Japanese men confessed Christ.

There were six additions recently at the Findlay, O., Central Church, of which E. K. Van Winkle is minister.

The church at Woodbine, Ia., regrets to lose their pastor, B. F. Hall, who has resigned after seven years of service.

S. A. Cook has resigned at Coggon, Ia., and will be glad to consider calls. He has been two years at Coggon.

John King, father of Philip F. King, passed away on March 11, at Austin, Tex., aged 82 years. He was a graduate of Harvard and a pupil of Longfellow.

Central Church, Sherman, Tex., where G. F. Bradford is pastor, is compelled to enlarge its building to keep pace with the growth of the work.

M. J. Maxwell has resigned from the pastorate at Findlay, O., after a pastorate of more than nine years. He will take work with the church at Gibsonberg, O.

L. H. Graham has been assisting the pastor, W. T. Barber, in a meeting which has been planned to follow up the union meetings that have just closed in Rockville, Ind.

There have been 126 additions so far in the meeting at Mishawaka, Ind., where O. E. Tomes is pastor. Wilhite and Shaul are the evangelists and their work is highly commended by the pastor.

The Pomona district convention met with the church at Covina, Calif., Feb. 20. Russell F. Thrapp of Los Angeles, C. R. Hudson of Pomona, and Miss Florence Miller were among the speakers.

W. M. Williams, the new endowment secretary of Texas Christian University, Ft. Worth, has made a good beginning at his work, several thousand dollars having already been subscribed.

G. W. Brewster at San Jose, Calif., has been using a moving picture machine in the work of the church and has, so far, found the results highly satisfactory. The apparatus has been in use about two months.

Eighty-eight women were present at the banquet of the class at Burlington, Ia., recently. The two oldest members were given places of honor. Their ages are respectively 75 and 76 years.

A Japanese Church of Christ has recently been organized in Los Angeles, Calif. It now has about seventy members. It also maintains a thriving Bible school. There are about 2,000 Japanese in that city.

Bruce Brown, pastor at Fullerton, Calif., recently preached a sermon on "The Knights of Modern Chivalry," to the lodge of Knights of Pythias, who attended in a body in full uniform. The service was a great success and the sermon was reported in full in the daily press.

Charles Reign Scoville, the well known evangelist, sailed with his company from San Francisco to Australia on Apr. 3. He is to conduct meetings in Melbourne, Sydney and Adelaide. His last meeting was held at Muskogee, Okla., where there were more than a thousand additions.

On the first Sunday in March the Euclid Avenue Church of Cleveland, O., made an offering of $1,240.81 to foreign missions. J. H. Goldner is the minister. We believe that this congregation has the finest and most expensive building of our people in that state.

The China Famine Relief Committee, coöperating with the Red Cross, is raising a million dollars for the relief of the famine districts in China. This is reported to be one of the worst famines in modern times, affecting three millions of people. Our Foreign Christian Missionary Society is seeking aid for this need.

The ministerial alliance of St. Joseph, Mo., is attempting to secure the recognition of the authorities for a vice commission to investigate the conditions in the city as was done recently in Chicago. If the city authorities do not coöperate, the committee will probably act independently. C. M. Chilton of First Church is an active member of the alliance.

At a recent Sunday evening service at Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., the foreign missionary appeal was presented in a new way. A supposed appropriation was to be voted during the evening and a representative from each of the mission fields appeared in costume to claim the money for his land.

J. D. Armistead, after a pastorate of eighteen months at Walla Walla, Wash., returns to Kentucky to succeed W. E. Ellis as pastor at Cynthiana. Mr. Ellis, as already announced, goes to Paris, Ky. Mr. Armistead's work at Walla Walla has been exceptionally successful. The membership has been increased sixty per cent and a $6,000 debt provided for.

Elvin J. Curry of the First Church, Los Angeles, Calif., was chairman of the Institute of Social Service, which was the largest of all the institutes of the campaign of the Men and Religion Forward Movement which recently was closed. There was a greater number of men registered for the institutes in Los Angeles than in any other city

Warren, O., the county seat of Trumbull County, has a population of about 10,000. It has two churches of Christ, and they are both strong congregations. The attendance at their Bible schools has been in the neighborhood of 1,200 for several weeks. We know of no other town of its size in which our people are so numerous and influential.

Cadiz in Harrison County, O., has until the present been one of the county seats of our state in which we have no church. The Ohio Christian Missionary Society recently sent a man there to hold a meeting. About fifty Disciples were found, and these, with about forty more who were added as a result of a meeting, were organized into a church. Charles H. Bloom, of Elmira, N. Y., will become their minister at once.

The churches in Greater Kansas City are making great preparations for the entertainment of the Congress of Disciples which meets with Linwood Boulevard Church, Apr. 16 to 18. The Missouri Christian Lectureship is to combine its sessions with those of the congress so that a large attendance is assured, and the program which we publish again this week is attractive enough to repay a long pilgrimage.

Sumner T. Martin writes us from Rialto, Calif.: We have a congregation here, made up of Baptists and Disciples of Christ. The church is known as Church of Christ (Baptist and Disciple). We have just had a two weeks' meeting with 13 added, seven baptisms. Arthur Polk Brown, pastor First Baptist Church, San Bernardino, and myself preached on alternate nights. All was peace and harmony. The fellowship was perfect, and all are happy.

Mrs. De Loss Smith, who has been presiding at the instrument through the meetings in which her husband has been directing the music, underwent an operation for appendicitis at a hospital at Lincoln, Neb., last week, and we rejoice with these good people, known to so many of our brotherhood, that Mrs. Smith is recuperating rapidly. Mr. Smith remains in Lincoln for a short time to conduct the music for the eight day campaign of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, after which he and H. H. Harmon of the First Church will assist J. W. Hilton at the East Side Church in a short meeting.

Bernard Gruenstein, pastor of the First Christian Church, Selma, Ala., writes that it was his privilege to send $52.00, more than the congregation's apportionment, to Secretary F. M. Rains. This is the highest missionary offering ever given by this church. Since 1909 the church gave nothing. He also writes of a steady growth of the church. On January 1 the membership was 121; at the end of the quarter on March 31, it totaled 144. Of this increase, 11 were baptisms. Mr. Gruenstein resigned, to take effect not later than June 15. In four months and a half, he raised $1,054.38 to liquidate an obligation that was five years overdue. He has no field as yet in view, and may be still addressed at Selma, Ala.

W. D. VanVoorhis reports from Parkersburg, W. Va.: "The Protestant churches of Parkersburg have just closed a very helpful union meeting under the leadership of Dr. Herbert Booth of London, the youngest son of the founder of the Salvation Army. Mr. Booth was first called to our city by the First Methodist Church, and the first services were held in their auditorium. As the time seemed ripe for a city-wide campaign, one of the leading opera houses was secured and we all entered into the work on a large scale. Considering the fact that very little advertising was done before the meeting, and almost no preparation was made in the way of organization, the meeting was successful. The religious forces of our city were united; the leading workers in our churches worked side by side; our ministers showed themselves to be large-hearted, large-minded Christian men, working for the good of the kingdom. There were about one hundred and fifty decisions for Christ. The general results, such as the quickening of a spiritual life among Christians, the raising of the standard of social righteousness, were all out of proportion to the numbers which will be received into the churches. Herbert Booth is one of the most Christ-like men I have ever known. His preaching is strictly biblical. He avoids everything that smacks of the sensational. He seems to care little for numbers, and insists continually on an out and out stand for Christ. He is especially strong in his portrayal of Bible characters. Being a born dramatist, he is able to call the great men of the Bible to life, to sin and struggle, to fall and rise again before his audiences."

De Loss Smith, Popular Evangelistic Song Leader, Who Has Been Given Charge of Vocal Music in Columbia University, New York, for the Coming Summer.

G. Lyle Smith, pastor at El Reno, Okla., is holding a meeting at Hobart, Okla.

J. Boyd Jones, pastor of the Anderson, Ind., church, was in charge of the dedication of the church at Kennard, Ind., recently.

The Christian women of St. Louis are to have the entire support of an entire mission station through the C. W. B. M. The work will require $1,500 to $2,000.

A. M. Haggard recently dedicated the new church at Marshalltown, Ia., which has had a very successful revival resulting in a larger Sunday-school.

W. R. Motley of Newcastle, Ind., recently delivered a dedicatory service for the church at Kennard, Ind., celebrating the completion of some improvements to the church.

It is only a fitting recognition of his ability that DeLoss Smith has been chosen to have complete charge of the voice work at Columbia University, New York, during the coming summer session.

Wm. R. Holder has been appointed a missionary to Africa and expects to sail for Bolenge on May 15. Mr. Holder is a member of the church in North Birmingham, Ala.

The Texarkana, Tex., church recently burned the mortgage against their church, thus freeing the property from debt. Clifford Weaver, who spent a term of service in Japan, has been pastor of the church for six months.

C. R. Daniel, pastor at La Junta, Colo., writes us that there have been 40 additions in the meeting now being held by J. F. Findley. The meeting is attracting the attention of the community and the evangelist is commended in the highest terms.

There is a Russian colony in the city of New York of 157,000 people. The Disciples have one man working in the heart of this district. The Chicago Disciples are also maintaining a mission among the Russians of the Illinois metropolis.

Rev. Linley Gordon, Chairman of Louisville Convention Club.

J. M. Lowe writes that there have been several additions in his meeting with Paul E. Wright at Santa Anna, Calif. Mr. Lowe has May and June open and prefers engagements in the central states. He would also consider a summer supply. His address is Des Moines, Ia.

J. F. Quisenberry, pastor of Roanoke Church, Kansas City, Mo., has a printing office in the basement of his church where he sets up, prints and edits his local church paper, The Chimes. He has also organized a brotherhood for the betterment of social conditions locally by the men of his church.

Another church that has outgrown its quarters is located at Frankfort, Ind., where it is planned to build a tabernacle to accommodate the growing Sunday-school. The building will be built in a single day and will cost about $1,200. The work will be done May 1.

Harold H. Griffis, pastor of Calvary Christian Church, Missoula, Mont., prints in his Weekly Bulletin this statement: "The individual who stays away from Missoula because the saloons are closed on Sundays is an undesirable citizen and the decent people of the community do not need him in their business."

J. C. Ogden did not arrive at his old home in Carlisle, Ky., till the last day of March. It was a joyous home coming after seven years of service in Tibet in the remotest of mission stations. The little daughter, Clara, born in Tibet, was not the least of the attractions to the friends who welcomed the party home.

The Dixon Street Church, Gainesville, Tex., where E. C. Mobley is pastor, is suffering for lack of room in which to house its Sunday-school. A local furniture company has agreed to let the church have the use of a large warehouse which will hold 200. The church will have to be enlarged to accommodate the growth of the work.

G. W. Henry, pastor of First Church, South Bend, Ind., is holding a meeting at the Indiana Ave. Church in that city. The Indiana Ave. Church has been without a pastor for some months and it is the desire of all the brethren that conditions should be so straightened out as to allow their work to go on and prosper once more.

A. D. Harmon of St. Paul, Minn., has received the unanimous call of First Church, Omaha, Neb. With A. D. Harmon at Omaha and his brother, Harvey H. Harmon, at Lincoln, Neb., there will be a splendid team for these two strong churches. There were 115 additions to the church at Lincoln in a meeting that has recently been held in the First Church.

Rev. H. J. Loken, Pastor of Berkeley, Calif., University Church, Whose Congregation Has Voted to Practice Christian Unity as Well as Plead for It.

The Central Church of New York City is planning to get the most out of the meetings planned for April in connection with the Men and Religion Forward Movement. The campaign has been conducted in the different cities over the country for several months and now the culmination of the whole effort is being planned in the metropolis.

There is a Bible class with headquarters at Nelsonville, O., which is unique, so far as we know. The membership is made up of traveling men who are on the road most of the time but the activities of the class consist in the gathering together of the traveling men in the hotel where the members happen to be spending Sunday and studying the Sunday-school lesson. There are many Christian traveling men who will be grateful for the activities of such a class and there are many more who will doubtless be glad to take advantage of the opportunity.

It is repeatedly stated that there are about 4,000 fewer preachers among the Disciples than there are churches and that the number of ministerial students is not sufficient to provide that the number remain stationary, as the loss by death will more than compensate for the new additions to the ranks of the ministry. This fact is viewed with alarm by some but others are more complacent. It would seem at least that the difficult matter of the adequate support of the men who are actually in the ministry would be easier if there were fewer to maintain. The problem of union is also affected.

While the election at Waukegan, Ill., resulted in a defeat for prohibition by a small majority, nevertheless, it is felt by the Christian people of the community that much good resulted from the effort. Many speeches were made which can be thought of as educational in their ultimate effect. But better than this, there was a complete and thorough-going union of the Christian forces of the city for the purposes of the campaign. The Catholics and the Protestants spoke from the same platform, called each other brother, and in every way coöperated for the end in view. After all, it is plain to some of us that the only agency that will unite us is the pressure of our tasks which we shall find too great for the ability of the separated forces of the church.

The Brotherhoods in the English churches are keenly alive to the importance of social questions and have adopted a program which is what might have been expected from that most progressive land. Only recently have we realized the fact that ours is the land where progress is being at present retarded and the mother country is in the van so far as economic and social legislation is concerned. We rejoice in what the English brthren are planning to do. Their program includes: Destruction of the prevailing war spirit, abolishment of gambling, annihilation of the curse of drink, prevention of tuberculosis, prevention of the waste of life due to dangerous machinery and occupational diseases, salvation of the nation's childhood.

S. G. Fisher prints in his local church paper at Trenton, Mo., the oath taken by the young Athenians on assuming the responsibilities of citizenship, and exhorts the Christian voters, on whom grave responsibilities rest this presidential year, to resolve to be at least as devoted to their country. This is the oath: "We will never bring disgrace to this, our city, by any act of dishonesty, or cowardice, nor ever desert our suffering comrades in the ranks. We will fight for the ideal and sacred things of the city. We will revere and obey the city's laws and do our best to excite a like respect and reverence in those above us who are prone to annul and set them at naught. We will strive unceasingly to quicken the public sense of civic duty, and thus, in all these ways, we will transmit this city, not only not less, but greater, better, and more beautiful than it was transmitted to us."

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ has forwarded a petition to President Taft asking that he do what he can to prevent the impending coal strike. The petition declared that such interests are so wide that the limited and classified groups of men immediately concerned should not be left alone in the solution of them. It is one of the signs of the times that such a purely economic question as the wages of a collier should be made the subject of a petition by the representatives of the largest federated body of Christians in the nation, to the nation's head. The churches are finding that the confused ethics of the industrial order is one of the causes of the social unrest and that the remedy does not lie in simply preaching moral ideals to either or both parties. We must take an active part in the settlement of the concrete problems that confront the laborers and capitalists alike.

Convention Club President

Although Louisville Disciples have set about to make the International Convention in their city, October 15-22, distinctly Kentuckian, they appear to have evolved a happy idea in the selection of Linley Gordon, a native of a foreign land, as the president of the convention committee or Convention Club, as they have termed it.

His election to the presidency of the club comes directly after his election to a like position in the Disciples' Ministerial Association and his appointment to the pastorate of the Clifton Christian Church of the same city.

At fifteen Mr. Gordon left his home in Australia for Kentucky University, from which he was graduated with honors four years later, returning thereafter to his native land where he labored until his return to America to accept the pastorate of the Clifton Church.

Rev. W. C. Bitting, D. D., Leader Among Baptists, Who Will Speak at the Disciples' Congress Next Week on What Baptists Have Done in Unifying Their Independent Congregations. Rev. J. B. Briney of Pewee Valley, Ky., Opposed to Representative Organization for Disciples, Will Review Dr. Bitting's Paper.

To Indiana Churches

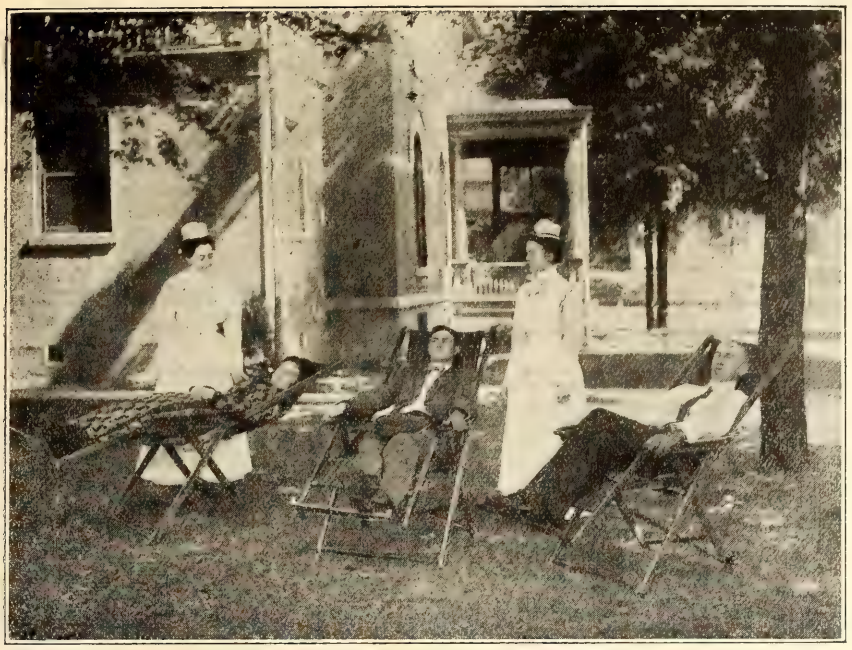
Our fiscal year ends April 30. The report will show that many more churches gave to home missions this year than last year. We will not reach the number we had hoped to reach. But there is a renewed interest in home missions, and we believe next year will be the banner year for the churches of Indiana. In the expectation of larger receipts we have assumed larger responsibilities. The partnership with the National Society will continue with a slight change in the contract. We will agree to take care of all Indiana missions except Gary Central, and will contribute half the amount appropriated to that work. This will give us Whiting, Indiana Harbor, Tolleston and Glen Park. Churches have been established at all these places and encouraging progress has been made toward building up self-supporting churches within two or three years. Next year we will be required to provide not less than $1,200 for these missions in the Calumet district. The work of building up churches in these manufacturing cities must be done now. If we let this opportunity pass we will suffer great loss. These churches have property valued at more than $20,000.

The first Sunday in May is the date set for a general offering for home missions from all of our churches. No matter what the plan for raising missionary money, the special days should be observed. Information should be given from the pulpit every Sunday in April. The new literature prepared by the National Society should be freely distributed. "The Fields and Forces," "Foreign Missions at Home," "The Russians in America," and "Do You Know?" are all exceedingly interesting and filled with just such information as our people need. Give out one each week. However, the pulpit will be the chief source of information for the average member. Let the preacher furnish the facts and the inspiration and the example and the response will be gratifying. A great responsibility rests with the preacher. Our "church problems" are largely preacher problems. "Like priest, like people" is as true today as ever. Send for supplies and get ready for a great offering on the first Sunday of May. The churches of Indiana ought to give $10,000 for home missions next year. Suppose we adopt for our watchword, "Four hundred contributing churches and $10,000 for home missions." What do our preachers say? Can we do it? We will have to nearly double the number of churches and raise a third more money. It ought to be possible.

Begin now to prepare for the offering.

L. E. Murray, Cor. Secy.

416 Majestic Bldg., Indianapolis, Ind.



Convalescing at the Valparaiso, Ind., Christian Hospital.

Benevolent Association News

T. S. Handsaker has been employed for part of his time to represent the Association in the Northwestern territory. Brother Handsaker will give his special attention to the interest of the home for the aged and the young at Walla Walla, Wash. He is a most devoted friend of the Gospel of the Helping Hand, and has done much to advance the interest of the association.

The Association has just received a bequest of $2,000. The testator was a life-long friend of the widow and the orphan. While a mansion was being prepared for him in the skies, he sought to prepare comfortable homes on the earth for some of "the least of these my brethren." His was an example worthy of imitation.

It will be noted that the eleven institutions of the Association are located in nine states, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Georgia, Texas, Colorado, and Washington. It is the policy of the Association to locate these homes with reference to the needs of the churches and their service to the cause of primitive Christianity.

The Association is conducting three distinct lines of work; the hospital, through which it seeks to aid the sick poor, especially those of the church; the home for the aged, in which it seeks to provide for the worthy aged poor of the church; and the home for children, through which it seeks to care for three classes—the widow with her child, the child that must be saved for vicious environment, and the full-orphan child.

The Association has one of the finest babies' homes in the country, located at 2951 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis. It is a department of the Christian Orphans' Home, of which Hastings Hart said "It is the most nearly ideal I have ever seen."

The Association is aiding scores and scores of mothers. All of its homes receive mothers with their children. The home in St. Louis specializes in the aid of mothers with their babes.

The Easter offering should all be sent to 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis. If the donors desire to favor any particular home of the association, that home should be named. The association is responsible for the support of each of the eleven institutions.

The association does not undertake to do all the relief work of the country. It does not ask the churches to bear the burden of the state. It is not seeking to make a record of numbers. It is seeking to serve the churches by aiding them in the care of all who have a legitimate claim upon them, and it is seeking to serve God by aiding all who are worthy that it can aid to his glory.

The association came into existence in response to a felt need. It was formed by and is controlled by the churches, and not by a group of self-appointed individuals.

It is not necessary for our churches and their members to send their poor to state institutions or to place them under the care of their religious neighbors. We can care for them as cheap, or cheaper, and as good, or better, in our own institutions. Whenever an aged brother or sister, a widow or an orphan child is in need of a home, the church upon which the responsibility of their care would naturally rest is invited to communicate with the nearest institution of the association. A prompt response will be given and aid will be extended.

True Economy

The difference in cost between an alum baking powder and the highest-class cream of tartar baking powder would not amount for a family's supply to one dollar a year.

Dr. Price's is the standard cream of tartar baking powder. It makes the food delicious and healthful.

NOTE.—You cannot, if you value good health, afford to use cheap, low-grade, alum baking powders. They are apt to spoil the food; they do endanger the health. All physicians will tell you that alum in food is deleterious.

The association invites a study of its annual report. It seeks to frankly and openly account for every dollar received. The most rigid economy is practiced in all its business affairs. Its contracts for printing and stationary are placed on competitive bids.

JAS. H. MOHORTER.

"I see that old Blenkinsop wears motor goggles all the time. Has he a car?" asked Wilks.

"No," said Jiggers. "It's merely a case of auto-suggestion. By wearing those goggles and sprinkling his handkerchief with gasoline instead of cologne he thinks he conveys the idea that he has one."—Harper's Weekly.

A Quartette Reared in One of the Homes of the National Benevolent Association.

Hands Across the Sea

The office of the American Society at Cincinnati is in possession of some interesting correspondence between Joseph Keevil, superintendent of missions in New York City, and Ivan S. Prokanoff, of St. Petersburg, Russia, throwing more light upon the teachings of a large body of Russian Christians who approach very near to the undenominational position of the Disciples of Christ. Some three months ago the Disciples Missionary Union of New York City sent a cablegram of greetings to the convention of this Russian brotherhood, then in session at St. Petersburg. The precise significance of the message was not understood until a delegate, Timothy Badianoff, who had previously lived in New York and had been a member of the Disciples Russian Mission there, arose and told the convention about the size and substantial strength of the Disciples in America, indicating also the similarity of ideals which characterized the two bodies. Subsequently the correspondence above referred to was exchanged. Mr. Prokanoff was the president of the Russian convention receiving the cablegram. Following is Mr. Keevil's letter:

Mr. Ivan S. Prokanoff, St. Petersburg, Russia. Dear Brother: Brother Johnson called our attention to the gathering of the Christian convention, meeting in St. Petersburg. It was too late for us to send the convention a greeting by mail, so we took advantage of the cable and sent one by wire, which I hope was received before the convention closed.

We have heard Brother Johnson and also Brother Sandler speak very much of you and the great and splendid work you are doing. Our hearts rejoice and we wish you great success in giving the glorious gospel of the grace of God to the dear people of your great country.

If I am not asking too much of your valuable time, I would very much appreciate your answer to the following questions. Let it be understood, I refer in my question only to the Christian movement in Russia with which you are identified.

1. When did this movement commence?
2. Who were the leading persons that directed the movement at first.
3. What are the general and fundamental principles advocated?
4. What form does the church organization take?
5. What is your present strength in Russia, and the rate of increase?
6. Have you any church literature, schools or colleges?
7. Are you related to the Baptist church in any way?
8. What name do you give your church?
9. Have you any authoritative statement of doctrine for the church besides the New Testament?
10. Are there any books in the English language giving information about the movement, its aim, principles and growth?

No words of mine can express the appreciation of even a brief answer to the above questions. It seems to me that in both Russia and America there has been a distinct movement, directed of God, to give to the people the pure faith once for all delivered to the saints. If we are both working at the same great problem, may we not stretch across the great Atlantic and give to each a friendly hand in this great and glorious work?

Waiting with very great interest for a reply, I am fraternally, JOSEPH KEEVIL.

Joseph Keevil, New York City. Dear Mr. Keevil: Yours of 31st received safely. We were very glad to receive from you a congratulatory telegram at a sitting of our conference. It was a great joy although we did not exactly know from whom it came.

I am identified with the movement which bears the name of All Russian Evangelical Christian Union.

1. This movement commenced at St. Petersburg about 1875-76 through the visit of Lord Radstock (of England) and through the conversion of Col. Pashkoff and others.

2. The leading persons were: Col. Pashkoff, Count Korff, Count Bokrinsky and others.

3 and 4. General fundamental principles: Personal conversion (repentance, new birth) of every Christian; believers' baptism, breaking bread according to practice of apostles; the living church, consisting of persons who believed, experienced new birth and baptized by immersion in death of Jesus.

5. Our numbers it is very difficult to ascertain because we have just (three years) started to gather our churches; they have been scattered and sparated.

6. We have a confession of faith, and a few pamphlets: (1) on laying hands; (2) on service of sisters at the church; (3) on Sabbath day (Sunday); (4) on marriage and divorce.

7. Our Evangelical Christian Union is altogether independent from the Russian Baptists' Union, but we belong to the World's Baptist Alliance, preserving our full liberty.

8. The name of our church is: The Evangelical Christian Church.

9. Besides the New Testament and a confession of faith, we have no special statement of our faith.

10. No books in English which would give information about the movement.

Should be glad to give you any further information. Kindly send some information about your church. What is the relation of your church to the Baptist church in America.

If you send me a book on history of your church and on its doctrines, I should be especially thankful.

I am sure our better acquaintance will be of great value for both churches. We should be very glad to stretch across the great Atlantic a friendly hand. May God help us in this aim.

We don't admit the doctrine of perfection, and (2) of regenerating power of the water baptism. Do you? Yours very truly,

I. S. PROKANOFF.

P. S. Two or three brethren of us would be glad to visit your church in America to get better acquainted with your church, work, etc.

This Russian community of Christians was formerly a part of the Baptist denomination, but now separate from the Baptists save in being affiliated with the World Baptist Alliance.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
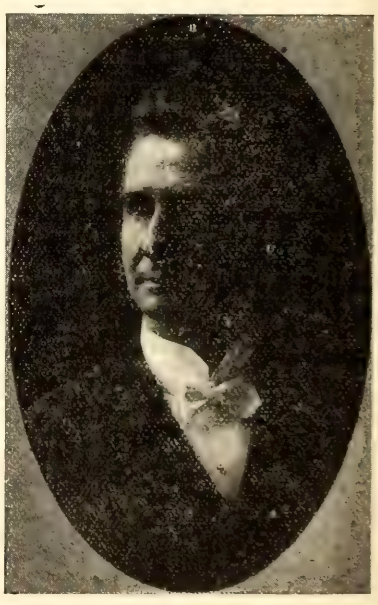
Absolutely Pure
The only Baking Powder made from Royal Grape Cream of Tartar
NO ALUM, NO LIME PHOSPHATE

Meeting at Fulton, Mo.

One of the best short meetings in the history of the Fulton church was closed March 28. The preaching was done by Dr. H. O. Breeden of San Francisco, Cal., who was assisted by Prof. and Mrs. G. P. Rockwell of Chicago, Ill. The meeting lasted just eighteen days, and there were ninety-five accessions, the great majority of whom made confession and were baptized. The people were delighted with the kind of meeting Dr. Breeden gave us; his is a thoroughly "sane" evangelism; he does not depend upon manipulation or upon emotionalism or sensationalism, though there is much of the best emotion evident in the meetings. His power is in the simple, beautiful, loving way in which he preaches Christ and persuades men to accept him. One remarkable thing about the meeting was the large number of people from the other churches who attended the services regularly. There was nothing in the preaching which would offend them and yet no one ever presented our plea more faithfully. No apology is ever needed for Dr. Breeden's method of preaching the old plea. During the meeting special effort was made to double the Sunday-school attendance; great interest and enthusiasm were manifested, and on last Sunday we had 321 present. The meeting seems to have greatly stimulated all departments of our work.



Dr. H. O. Breeden.

Prof. Rockwell came to us with seven years' experience, and showed that he was a splendid chorus leader, and could inspire the congregation to enter heartily into the song service. Mrs. Rockwell sang with him every night in a duet; these simple gospel songs were sung very effectively, and contributed very greatly to the success of the meeting.

T. E. WINTER, Pastor.

The Madison Avenue Church, Covington, Kentucky, Which is Being Built by the "Fourth Street" and the "Central" Congregations.

A SIGNIFICANT UNION IN COVINGTON, KY.

Following a series of tabernacle meetings in the autumn of 1909, a congregation of Disciples was organized and chose the name, "The Central Christian Church." The congregation has continued to worship in a private dwelling since its organization, though its membership has reached about 100 and a flourishing Bible-school is maintained. Two years ago a lot costing $3,500 was bought, and $1,500 has been paid on the obligation. C. L. Garrison, of Newport, who has devoted most of his time to journalistic work since resigning the pastorate of the Central Church in that city, has supplied the pulpit of the new church here during the last fifteen months. Since its organization, in 1875, the Fourth St. Church has been located on Fourth St., near Greenup. The place of this church, among the Christian churches of Kentucky, is too well-known to require any comment. Last June a member of this church offered to give to the congregation a lot, if the church would agree to build an appropriate house of worship on the new location, which was left to the officers to select. In July the officers resolved to build a new house and a lot was selected, but an unexpected delay was caused by inability to obtain possession of the property chosen. Thus the present winter began before either of these churches had actually done anything in the way of building. During the enforced delay many came to see the wisdom of building at some more centrally located point one new house of worship which should meet the needs of both congregations, if organized as one church. After some conferences, the plan to consolidate was adopted by both congregations and an agreement reached as to the new location. The lot selected is in a splendid residence district and on one of the best squares in the city. The lot has been purchased at a cost of nearly $8,000, and has been given to the "Fourth St. Christian Church." On this location will be built a house of worship costing about $40,000. At its completion the new house will be occupied by the united congregation. The old Fourth St. property, which is free from debt, will be sold, as will be the lot bought by the "Central Church," and the proceeds of these sales, together with all other assets held by either church, will be used in the new building enterprise. Undoubtedly, this is the most significant step taken by the Disciples of Christ in this section in many years! Since the 15th of November, 1904, Joseph W. Hagin has been the minister of the Fourth St. Church, which has increased his salary twice and extended to him a call for an indefinite period.

Brother Hagin has done a most valuable piece of work for the cause in Greater Cincinnati, and the prospect is that under his continued leadership the church in the new location will become one of our strongest in the entire city.

Cincinnati, O. ROBT. W. HOPKINS.

Subscribers Wants

Readers of the Christian Century find its columns valuable for advertising their wants or wares. The charge is one cent for each word, with a minimum of thirty cents for each insertion. Cash must accompany the order to save bookkeeping.

DO YOU NEED HYMN BOOKS for Church or Sunday-school? Write for prices, care of M, NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY Co.

CHURCH CLERK: Do you need church letters? We furnish a well designed letter in blocks of fifty at 50 cents. Write us, care of X, NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY Co.

MOTHERS' DAY Songs and Program. Chas. M. Fillmore, 1914 Commerce Ave., Indianapolis, Ind.

MOTHERS:—Keep posted on Social Purity, Send 25c for a year's subscription to The Educator, Best Purity and Social News. Dept. C. National Home Educator, Maryville, Mo.

—Women will not be allowed to take active part in bull fights in Spain any more. The Spanish minister says so, in an edict which gives hope that something may be done in the future to prevent men from doing the same.

REMEMBER

CHILDREN'S DAY

For Foreign Missions

FIRST SUNDAY IN JUNE

SUPPLIES FREE

THE UNUSED CROSS.

ONE HALF THE WORLD IS BEYOND THE REACH OF ANY MESSENGER OF JESUS CHRIST.
AND I, IF I BE LIFTED UP FROM THE EARTH, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day Supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Bible Schools observing the day in the interest of Heathen Missions.

FREE SUPPLIES

1st. Coin Pocket Missionary Collectors. These are a great improvement on the missionary boxes formerly used. Attractive, convenient, suitable for old or young.

2d. Darkness and Light. The new Children's Day exercise by P. H. Duncan. Filled with beautiful songs, exercises, and recitations. Good for older pupils as well as little folks. Adapted to any school.

ORDER AT ONCE. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance. Write to

STEPHEN J. COREY,
Box 884. Cincinnati, Ohio.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
CENTRAL CHURCH
New York, 142 West 81st St.
Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

BOWLDEN BELLS
FOR CHURCH AND SCHOOL
Sweet Tone
Far Sounding
Durable
Catalogue Free.
AMERICAN BELL & FOUNDRY CO., NORTHVILLE, MICH

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE
The Thomas Special Self-Collecting Cushioned Tray excels anything on the market. Is noiseless, dust-proof, interlocking and self-collecting. Best for pew or altar communion. Used with short, shallow glass (best quality), no tipping of head. Over 12,000 Churches now use Thomas System. Our "Special Introductory Offer" will interest you.
THOMAS COMMUNION SERVICE CO., Box 120 Lima, Ohio.

WE READ and clip for you daily everything printed in the current country and city press of America pertaining to the subject of particular interest to you.

NEWSPAPERS contain many items daily which would inform you exclusively of where you can secure new business, an order or a contract; where a new store has been started, a new firm incorporated or a contract is to be let. A daily press clipping service means more business

FOR YOU. Send Stamp for Booklet

THE CONSOLIDATED PRESS CLIPPING CO.
1109 167 W. Washington St., Chicago, U. S. A.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER
AMES

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago

Great Premium Offer

in connection with

The Gospel of the Kingdom

BY JOSIAH STRONG

The Lessons in Social Christianity, published monthly by The New Christian Century Co., are now used by hundreds of classes throughout the country. The subscription price, 50 cents per year, brings them within the reach of all members of a class.

We believe the message they contain should be heard by every Bible, Adult Sunday School, or Y. M. C. A. Class, and Church Brotherhood in the country. To this end, and to repay somewhat the work of organizing classes, we offer

FREE

To Any Minister or Layman

who organizes a new class, or induces a class already organized, to take up these studies, and who secures
50 ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS OR OVER

One cloth-bound copy of The New

Encyclopedia of Social Reform

Edited by W. D. P. BLISS Price, $7.50

"A perfect mine of information."—Dr. ALBERT SHAW, Editor "Review of Reviews."

This is a great chance for you to get the most authoritative treasury of social facts and forces extant—and without costing you a cent. Remember The Gospel of the Kingdom is only 50 cents a year—it really does not cost so much as is usually paid for Sunday School quarterlies. And it comes fresh every month.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY COMPANY 700 East 40th Street, Chicago

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX April 18, 1912 Number 16

The Essential Plea of the Disciples

By Charles Clayton Morrison

The High Calling

By Charles M. Sheldon

CHICAGO

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER
AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago

Great Premium Offer

in connection with

The Gospel of the Kingdom

BY JOSIAH STRONG

The Lessons in Social Christianity, published monthly by The New Christian Century Co., are now used by hundreds of classes throughout the country. The subscription price, 50 cents per year, brings them within the reach of all members of a class.

We believe the message they contain should be heard by every Bible, Adult Sunday School, or Y. M. C. A. Class, and Church Brotherhood in the country. To this end, and to repay somewhat the work of organizing classes, we offer

FREE

To Any Minister or Layman

who organizes a new class, or induces a class already organized, to take up these studies, and who secures
50 ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS OR OVER

One cloth-bound copy of The New

Encyclopedia of Social Reform

Edited by W. D. P. BLISS Price, $7.50

"A perfect mine of information."—Dr. ALBERT SHAW, Editor "Review of Reviews."

This is a great chance for you to get the most authoritative treasury of social facts and forces extant—and without costing you a cent. Remember The Gospel of the Kingdom is only 50 cents a year—it really does not cost so much as is usually paid for Sunday School quarterlies. And it comes fresh every month.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY COMPANY 700 East 40th Street, Chicago

The Christian Century

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

After Easter, What?

IN CONVERSATION WITH A FRIEND, Rufus Choate was once asked if he did not wish he could return to earth after a hundred years, or could continue to live for that length of time, to witness the changes that should be wrought in mechanical and industrial affairs. His reply was, "I expect to be here a hundred years from now, and five hundred years. Why not?"

The message of the Easter time belongs to all of the year. While the Day of Resurrection is observed by the Church with a special sense of satisfaction as the memorial of an event as profound in its meaning as any among the facts of the Christian confession, yet every Sunday is also a memorial of the rising of the Christ, and every day in the calendar may well be lighted by the hope which the Easter time suggests.

* * *

For Christ is alive. This is the secret of the unspent energy of Christianity. It is the dynamic by which the church achieves its progress. Other religions revere dead founders. The Chinese honor the memory of Confucius. The Buddhists recount the life story of Prince Siddartha. The Muslims keep the day of Mohammed's death as a time of fasting. But Christianity, as it realizes its full possession in a living Christ, thinks only of the past with reverence and satisfaction, while it rejoices in a living Master whose promise all the centuries have verified, "Lo, I am with you alway."

This is the essential difference between evangelical Christianity and the more negative forms of Unitarianism. The latter believes in the life-story of Jesus, as the most distinguished teacher of religion and morals the world has known, but one whose life passed away into history many centuries ago. As Mr. Robert Blatchford tauntingly said, "Christianity worships a dead man," and Matthew Arnold, with a religious emotion compound of stoicism and skepticism, laments the death of Jesus and thinks of the Syrian stars as looking down upon his unopened grave.

* * *

But the vital Christian faith knows none of these hesitancies and denials. It comes with a shock of discovery and delighted surprise to realize the fact that Jesus is actually alive, implicit in the struggle of humanity today as truly as in the days of his flesh, and leading on in all gracious and vital ministries of progress. It was this fact which came over the spirit of Dr. Dale of Birmingham in the midst of his preparation of an Easter sermon. It was to him a new discovery. He arose from his desk in excitement aand walked back and forth in his room exclaiming, "He is alive! He is not dead but actually alive, and working with us evermore!" And Phillips Brooks in his Boston pulpit once exclaimed, "He is alive! Do you believe it? If so, why should you ever be discouraged or in despair?"

* * *

These considerations and others were brought to mind by the recent reading of Dr. James M. Campbell's suggestive and helpful volume on "The Presence." Dr. Campbell has written a number of volumes, among them "Paul the Mystic," "The Heart of the Gospel" and "The Indwelling Christ," but never more helpfully than in this book. His is a vital Christian faith, which is based not only upon the events of the life of our Lord and the facts of Christian history, but as well upon a living experience of the Christ. He believes in the living presence of God manifested in an ever-present Saviour and Companion. The divine presence, the practice of which is so much neglected in this age, is the secret at which the doctrine of angels in the Bible hints. It is the fundamental experience of which the doctrine of the Holy Spirit speaks. It is the realization of a living Friend in the daily work of the world.

* * *

Mr. Kipling once wrote a story about "The Man Who Was." There seem to be many people who believe in a God who was. The Bible is the record of his doings. But since that volume was closed they think it is only by a figure of speech that God is to be represented as active in his universe. Such a conception is utterly at variance with the facts of the Bible and of the Christian life. The God whom the patriarchs adored and whom Jesus called Father is as active in creation and redemption today as at any period in the past. He has always worked at these great enterprises, and his ministries of grace are not to be inclosed in any framework of nationality, time or method.

* * *

The Roman church has at heart failed to accept the doctrine of the ever-living Christ. Therefore it has believed in the necessity of an institution to which his program for the world was committed many centuries ago. The Pope is counted the head of this majestic organization, and to him rather than to the living Christ that great denomination looks for leadership. It was that fundamental distrust of a Christ who is alive forevermore that wrought in the heart of John Henry Newman a brooding doubt as to the efficacy of Protestantism, and sent him at last into the fellowship of the Roman church. On the other hand the Modernists in the Catholic church are increasingly sensitive to the fatal failure of that body to recognize the living Christ as its head. Their doctrine of the "Vital Immanence" is only an effort to supply a needed and omitted element in Roman Catholic theology.

* * *

"After Easter—What?" The answer must ever be the living Christ as the ever-present interpreter of God and leader of the Church. What the millenarian seeks to realize through a visible and spectacular second coming of the Lord is already in the possession of the church in the divine and eternal presence of the Saviour. Christianity needs not a second coming but the recognition of the Christ who is already here. Readers of Dr. Campbell's book will find an apologetic of great value in his fresh and vigorous statement of the doctrine of the divine presence in the church of God.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Prison Reform

The new interest in prison reform pervades a surprisingly large amount of our contemporaneous literature. The shocking barbarites that are still practiced, the fearfully unsanitary conditions under which the men live, the contract system under which the labor, the restriction of the use of the agencies of reform all brand our treatment of criminals as worthy of a mediæval period but not fit for modern times. The penitentiary signifies that it is a place to bring men to repentance. Instead it brings men into complete and utter break with society. The prison chaplain is often a political henchman whose chief function is that of spy. When a prisoner objected the other day to listening to the weekly sermon on the ground he was an infidel, the guard told him that was part of his punishment. The prison library is usualy an ill-selected lot of rubbish. The reading of the men is severely censorized. We are continually finding some scandal with reference to the inhuman punishment of recalcitrant men of high spirit. It is charged that drugs are imported into the prisons by guards. Moral contamination spreads like the plague.

The ideal prison would set to work to build manhood. It would allow men to read all the books that would be found in any ordinary public library. It would give the men opportunity for amusement and relaxation. It would undertake to build men on the physical, mental, social and religious sides of life. The purpose would be to teach them again the lessons of trust and affection.

The prisoner is after all a man. Most of them do not belong to a criminal class any more than most of us. A gust of passion one day, an over-powering temptation of some sort and a man who was respected falls into the clutches of the law. One failure does not dehumanize him or make him merit the treatment that the typical "jail-bird" gets. Common humanity demands that we find and develop the good latent in every man who is locked up for evil-doing.

The Use of the Primary

The old time caucus is giving way in this country to the primary conducted under the Australian ballot system. This primary is always opposed in every state by the professional politicians as it makes it far more difficult for them to control elections.

We have an example in the primary which has so recently been held in Illinois. Results that were astounding even to party leaders were gotten through this free expression of popular will. The tremendous victory of Champ Clark over his entirely worthy opponent, Woodrow Wilson, would never have been prophesied in advance. The lead of Roosevelt over Taft was claimed in advance, but this would always have been in doubt if it had not been for the actual test by a vote of the people. The defeat of all the Lorimer candidates but one would have been impossible under the old system of higgling and bargaining among the politicians.

This free primary coupled with the introduction of the short ballot will give the citizens the tools they need for the cleaning up of our political corruption. It would then depend upon the patriotism and interest of the masses to make our political institutions as clean as they are anywhere upon earth.

The Minimum Wage

That the whole community suffers when any group of workers receive less than a living wage is becoming increasingly apparent to thinking people. Some years ago there was enacted in Australia a law fixing a minimum wage in that country. In America, it has remained for a Catholic priest, Father Ryan, to be the prophet of the movement here.

The British coal strike brought up the issue again. What would the Liberal ministry do? Would they seize the mines and operate them by the government? Would they compel arbitration and require the principals in the dispute to agree to the settlement arranged? They have chosen rather to create local boards for the fixing of the minimum wage. If either party does not wish to accept the finding of this local board, the work of the mine can be discontinued. The ministry evidently has faith that the decisions of these boards would be so manifestly just that both parties would accept the findings.

The Lawrence strike has brought forth the need of such legislation in this country. Here was a body of working people who were receiving a wage that was the limit of economical living. When the reduction of working hours was made by state law, they were driven into revolt. There is now pending before the legislature of Massachusetts a bill that would set a minimum wage in that state and thus prevent grinding competition from working hardship upon weak and unprotected people.

The saleswomen in the stores of great cities are conspicuous examples of the need of the minimum wage. A survey undertaken by the Russell Sage Foundation reveals the startling fact that in Baltimore among the women and girls employed in 34 stores, over fifty were working at $2.00 per week; 350 got $2 to $3 per week; 750 got $3 to $4 per week. Eighty-one per cent of all the women received less than six dollars a week. The same survey showed the minimum cost of living to be $6.70. The moral of such a situation is certainly apparent to all. We cannot hope that such an evil can be reformed by one employer. It must come through state interference.

The Industrial Workers of the World

Reports from different sections of this country indicate that a new organization of social unrest imported from Europe is making headway here. It is known as the Industrial Workers of the World. This organization pretends to sympathy with socialism, but is that extreme brand of socialism that is known in France as Syndicalism. The movement opposes labor unions on the ground that they organize skilled trades but neglect the tramp and the man of the gutter. The movement teaches men that the gutter snipe is worth as much to society as the eight dollar a day man and should get as much. The weapon of the movement is the general strike, though in some communities they have gone farther than this and have armed their adherents with knives and revolvers.

The movement in its birthplace in France has two philosophers who justify the point of view and these urge that there shall be no violence of any kind but more subtle forms of opposition. In the recent railway strike in France, the men were instructed to keep the trains running on schedule but to change the destination cards on the cars. In a few days, the freight of all France was mixed up and scattered in towns far distant from proper destination. The movement in this country held its first national convention in Chicago in 1905. It probably found its origin in the United States in the miners' struggle in Colorado seven years ago. The West is at this time under the terror of the movement. One mayor has ordered all public works to raise the wages to three dollars and that only American labor shall be employed, in order that the I. W. W. should not be able to live in that town.

In another town, two of their speakers were arrested for speaking on the streets, and they avenged themselves by importing several hundred followers who got themselves arrested to be kept at the town's expense. The movement grows where corporations have crushed the more conservative labor unions. We find it entrenched at Lawrence and it is making its appearance in the steel territory. Those who have been at pains to fight and discredit the more conservative labor movement may have a bitter harvest for their pains.

—More males than females, more single people than married, more infants than adults died during the year 1910, according to the death statistics gathered by the census bureau in its registration area, containing a little more than half the continental population of the United States. Infant mortality occasioned by a variety of children's ailments, as usual was most conspicuous in the figures. Of the 805,412 victims registered for 1910, 365,674 were single, 276,694 married, 149,846 widowed, 4,380 divorced, and 8,818 "of unknown or unstated conjugal condition." Among the single are included children below the age of marriage. The total number of males was 439,757, and that of females 365,655. Classified by color 753,308 were deaths of white persons, 49,499 negroes, 1,055 Chinese, 886 Indians and 664 Japanese. The maximum death rate was reached in March and the minimum in June. Tuberculosis in different forms claimed 86,309 persons, or 4,747 more than in 1909. This increase was said to be due to the increased area covered by the census bureau, since the death rate per 100,000 population for 1910 was slightly less than that of the previous year.

—Religion in common acceptation is the most tremendous human asset, and the multitude keep it safely away from contamination by touch with life.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Immorality Not Excused by Literature

"An Englishman" writing to The London Daily Mail sums up in an unusually bald and unblushing fashion that sneaking heresy which saps manhood and womanhood out of a great many people who aspire to be counted in the literary guild. This writer with the rash courage of the scoffer says bluntly: "Life must be judged by one set of rules, literature by another." It is indeed significant that with all the curt boldness of this, the writer hides himself behind a very comprehensive and unidentifiable pseudonym. He thus tacitly admits, what he would doubtless be vehement to deny if directly challenged, that after all his sentiment is one to be ashamed of in the face of the every day common sense of the world—an opinion that no man wishes to certify with his own name as long as he cares at all for the esteem of unromantic neighbors.

Nevertheless, however shamefacedly held, this idea that literature is under a different law from the law of life cannot fail to work havoc in the morale of lives that entertain it, and it is especially damnable for anybody to teach such an idea to young persons in the process of education. The truth which ought to be impressed upon the student and held in thoughtful honesty by every serious-minded person from youth to old age is that life is one and single and that there are no departments in it—that it must all be given to honor and purity and fidelity, or none of it is worthy at all. A person who can write a book that accepts sin and dishonor without condemnation is necessarily a person willing to dwell in complacent peace with sin and dishonor in the world, if not in his own heart. Literature which looks upon immorality and crime with allowance —even that literature which pretends to study immorality and crime with scientific impartiality—is a literature that is in itself criminal and immoral. Not to smite sin is to compromise with sin, and art can never save such compromise from being shameful.

The foregoing from the Continent (Presbyterian) is interesting because of the determination to excuse immorality under the forms of art. What would be considered pornographic in ten cent editions is considered artistic when issued as literature under the cover of a famous name. In the bewildering flood of books that is rolling in upon us year after year, it is surprising how few there are that cater to the corrupt. But there is another class of writers who, while fearing to speak openly in favor of the degrading, carry on a crusade of contamination by indirection. Indifference to the established standards of morality may be as effective a method of promoting vice as direct opposition thereto. There are no limits to the genius of the evil-doer.

President Taft and the Church of Rome

The President has seemed to show marked leanings toward the Roman Catholic church, sometimes in official ways which make him a subject of criticism. During the past few months when the "princes" of the church burst upon us with the pomp and pageantry of the middle ages, it was natural enough that official circles everywhere should note the meaning of all this. The power of Rome is too great to be ignored in our official life. America's only care for Rome is that she shall take her place with other peoples in a Protestant country and do her work as other churches do theirs. There must be no aping foreign potentates, or seeking the seats of the mighty. Every man should take the lowest seat first; if worthy, the higher places will contend for him. That is sound reason as well as well known Scripture. The indications are that the "princes" will aspire to the highest seats unless forced to vacate.

A dispatch announces the fact that the President through his aide-de-camp Major Archibald Butt, presented the pope a letter "thanking him for the creation of the three new American cardinals", and assuring his Holiness that "this action was acceptable to Americans irrespective of their faith, as Catholicism contributes to the welfare of the country". This was an official utterance, and is certainly a debatable one. On which the Presbyterian Banner remarks:

"It is such an act as this, together with many others, such as his suspending the order forbidding the wearing of ecclesiastical garb in government schools, that gives color to the charge that President Taft is currying favor with the Catholics. He had better quit it, for he is thus tying another stone about his political neck, and it is believed to be pretty heavily loaded already."

That popular, gossipy writer for the daily press whose nom de plume is the Marquise de Fontenoy, enlightens the public as to the status of these cardinals whose recent creation is said to reflect so much honor upon America:

They are something besides ministers of the Gospel and ecclesiastics. Indeed, a cardinal is not necessarily a priest, but he is from a purely secular point of view a very great personage, who is regarded and treated everywhere abroad not as a dignitary of any church, but as a prince of the blood. . . . Under the circumstances it must be borne in mind that even though Cardinals Farley, O'Connell and Gibbons are at heart patriotic Americans and members of an American hierarchy, yet they are as cardinals foreign princes of the blood, to whom the United States, as one of the great powers of the world, is under an obligation to concede the same honors that they receive abroad. Thus, were Cardinal Farley to visit an American man-of-war he would be entitled to the salutes and to the naval honors reserved for a foreign royal personage, and at any official entertainments at Washington the Cardinal will outrank not merely every Cabinet officer, the Speaker of the House and the Vice-President, but also the foreign ambassadors, coming immediately next to the Chief Magistrate himself. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that when a royal personage not of sovereign rank visits New York it is his duty to make the first call on Cardinal Farley.

Every American citizen who aspires to political office should now take a course of instruction in ecclesiastical etiquette!

Easter and the Religious Journals

The world is growing into a greater appreciation of the Easter festival. Especially, are the season's lessons emphasized by the space devoted thereto by the religious journals of our land. Time forbids any but a brief mention of the three great journals among the religious weeklies of America, The Congregationalist and Christian World, The Continent (Presbyterian), and the Churchman (Episcopalian). Typographically and mechanically they approach perfection. No expense, seemingly, is spared to make them de luxe editions of newspapers. Their field is comprehensive; their news gathering facilities unrivalled; their spirit worthy of emulation; their discussions sane and scholarly. We have not set these papers down in the order of their merit, for of the three in Easter dress it would be difficult to say to which should be awarded the palm. They are a delight to the eye. It can be put down as beyond the reach of challenge that artistically and doctrinally the standing of any people can be determined by its journalism. These three are out of the militant stage of their history, and as might be expected are building the temples, encouraging benevolence, recording a worthy history, cultivating a desire for the beautiful in journalism and elsewhere, and doing, in fine, what all peoples are certain to do if they preserve their ideals and keep straight forward in the trend of the goal. A newspaper is the mirror as well as the moulder of the life of a people. These mirror the best in the life of their communicants which, unfortunately, all papers do not.

Men Still Go To Church!

In the Congregational Advance, appeared a recent editorial on the above subject which is heartening to those who may have concluded that the men of America were passing by the churches on the other side. The editor tells us that "the Christian church is the most popular institution among men in all America. There are more men in the orthodox churches today than in all the lodges, fraternities, and secret orders put together; and more than four times as many men now in the churches as there were in the federal army which fought to a successful finish the great civil war."

From the census of the federal bureau the writer shows that of our 35,241,824 church members, 43.1 per cent are males; which means that over 15,000,000 men are enrolled as against something over 20,000,000 women. The total number of Protestant communicants exceeds 23,000,000; and the federal bureau shows that 39.3 per cent of these are males, which means over 9,000,000 men and lads. As a result of the editor's visit to some of the Chicago churches he found the following conditions:

Recently we dropped into three city churches at the hour of the young people's meetings. In the first, which chanced to be Presbyterian, the young men constituted 40 per cent of the 100 present. In the second, which was Methodist, the males were 55 per cent. And in the third, where a union rally was held, 60 per cent of those present were males. Judging from the reports of our friends who are members of various secret orders, the proportion of men who joined the church years ago, but attend it infrequently, is not larger than that of lapsed Masons, Odd Fellows, and Knights. And even in the labor unions, where grave financial interests are at stake, according to press reports, the most important measures are often, if not usually, decided by a majority of their members. The most important political primary ever held in Illinois cast only 937 votes out of a possible 25,000.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.
United Religious Press Building

"In the Christian's Home in Glory"

The philosopher Epicurus offered for the consolation of his followers the following thoughts on death: "The correct knowledge of the fact that death is no concern of ours, makes the mortality of life pleasant to us, inasmuch as it sets forth no illimitable time, but relieves us from the longing for immortality. For there is nothing terrible in living to a man who rightly comprehends that there is nothing terrible in ceasing to live; so that he was a silly man who said that he feared death, not because it would grieve him when it was present, but because it did grieve him while it was future. For it is very absurd that that which does not distress a man when it is present, should afflict him when only expected. Therefore, the most formidable of all evils, death, is nothing to us, since when we exist, death is not present to us; and when death is present, then we have no existence. It is no concern then either of the living or of the dead; since to the one it has no existence, and the other class has no existence itself."

The logic of Epicurus is not convincing. Human hopes exist and demand a more sympathetic consideration than the materialist can give them. That a hearing can be obtained for wild and disordered theories of the future is no reason why we should dismiss disdainfully the longings of the human heart for permanent good. The Christian poet speaks a truer word than the philosopher when he says,

> "I long for household voices gone,
> For vanished smiles I long,
> But God hath led my dear ones on,
> And he can do no wrong.
>
> I know not what the future hath
> Of marvel or surprise,
> Assured alone that life and death
> His mercy underlies."

The Christian hope embraces an understanding of the ways of God and reconciliation to his will. At the present many dark problems lessen our happiness. "We have but faith, we cannot know." We are not always able to see how our interests fit into the general scheme of things. We derive comfort from the belief that they are receiving due attention, but we crave further light. Of the city of God it is written, "There shall be no night there." The weight of ignorance will be removed. Superstition and prejudice will no longer hide God from us and separate us from his children.

The perfection of friendship will be one of the glories of the heavenly city. We now have some knowledge of friendship. Cicero could write: "To whom can life be worth living, as Ennius says, who does not repose in the mutual kind feeling of some friend? What can be more delightful than to have one to whom you can speak on all subjects just as to yourself? Where would be the great enjoyment in prosperity if you had not one to rejoice in it equally with yourself? And adversity would indeed be difficult to endure without some one who would bear it even with greater regret than yourself. . . . . Friendship comprises the greatest number of objects possible; wherever you turn yourself, it is at hand; shut out of no place, never out of season, never irksome; and therefore we do not use fire and water, as they say, on more occasions than we do friendship." If such be friendship on earth, shall we not think of it as constituting in a great measure the blessedness of heaven? It is not the city of golden streets that we seek: it is the society of those whom we love and trust.

If the essentials of the heavenly life are knowledge of God and joy in doing his will and delight in the friendship of the wise and the good, heaven has its beginning on earth. In whatever other respects our knowledge of the future is defective, we feel that we know what is most important, that its joys are like those we are now experiencing. If we have no experience of heaven here and now, we probably have neither the hope nor the desire for a place in a future city of God. The connection between the future and the present puts the hope of heaven among the assets of practical life. This hope, if it is really Christian, is an aid to efficiency in every department of service. It honors man above things and supports every endeavor of man to perfect himself. [Midweek Service, April 24. John 14: 1-6; Rev. 21: 1-4.] S. J.

The Recall

Within the past few months a new issue of great significance has arisen in American politics. It is the doctrine of the recall. It insists upon the right of the people to summon back to private life any official who has manifested a disregard for the public welfare or an incapacity to perform the functions of his office.

To what extent the recall may yet be applied to public officials must be determined by the different communities where it is tried. And whether it shall be extended to judges or to judicial decisions is one of the still undecided questions. But that in principle the recall is sound and serviceable few can question, and that it is being applied both in the special form for which recent legislation has provided and in the good old fashioned manner of relegating undesirable officials to private life through refusal to re-elect them, has been significantly proved by recent events.

In the state of Illinois Lorimerism has been a prominent but most distasteful issue for the past three years. The presence in the highest elective body in the nation of a man whose name has been notoriously connected with political scandal and corruption since his entrance into politics many years ago has been an increasingly irritating fact. When once a man of Mr. Lorimer's type, insensible to public disapproval, gets a start in the field of politics it is very difficult to bring to bear upon him and his pliant tools the popular check which the franchise is supposed to supply to an intelligent and high-minded commonwealth.

For the people have not yet learned how to use politics with the same efficiency with which the spoilsman, the grafter and the tool of special interests contrives to operate. And so Mr. Lorimer has flourished, gradually building up a machine by which he hopes to be able to control the Republican party in this state. When he found it was possible to seize the United States Senatorship no question of responsibility to the party or of obedience to the primary elections stood for a moment in his way and that of his retainers. He was sent to the United States Senate as the result of a scheme as destitute of virtue as it was insulting to the intelligence and probity of the public.

Popular indignation compelled action on the part of the administrators of law, both local and national. The chief agent of Mr. Lorimer's theft of the senatorship was tried and all but convicted. He escaped upon technecalities which still left him forever under the ban of disapproval by men of character in Illinois. The Senate twice investigated Mr. Lorimer's election and twice the investigating committee has reported that it is unable to advise his exclusion from the body. Yet the facts on which a minority of the committee based their strong opinion that Mr. Lorimer had no right to his seat in the Senate are public property, and on them an overwhelming number of the people both of Illinois and the nation have decided beyond question that the presence of such a man in the Senate is an affront to the citizenship of the United States.

The second investigating committee went out of its way to endorse Mr. Edward Hines, whose complicity in the fraudulent election of Mr. Lorimer has never been successfully denied. This gratuitous whitewashing of a man who was not technically on trial makes curious reading in the finding of the committee. But neither that endorsement nor Mr. Hines' literary campaign of vindication, in which he has flooded the state with pamphlets insisting upon his innocence, has served to change the public judgment in the matter nor relieve him from the odium attached to his conduct, either by the Union League Club which expelled him, or the citizenship of Chicago which has had opportuinty to know all the facts.

Meanwhile the primary election held last week affords a still more significant comment upon the deliberate purpose of the public to take a hand whenever possible in the rectification of public wrongs. Senator Cullom has served the state of Illinois with honor and distinction for six consecutive senatorial terms. He had the confidence and affection of the people to an unusual extent. Yet for reasons which seem inexplicable he chose to vote for the retention of Mr. Lorimr in the Senate. That act was in direct defiance of the popular sentiment throughout the state. It was an act which the people of Illinois could no forget and seemed unwilling to forgive. There was not another cause of complaint against Mr. Cullum. His age would rather have increased than diminished popular interest in his retention of his seat in the Senate. Yet at the primaries last week he was overwhelmingly defeated, and is compelled to close his public career with the reflection that the people of a state like Illinois cannot be trifled with when the fortunes of a man of Lorimer's type are brought within striking distance of the ballot-box.

Still more notable is the almost total overthrow of the Lorimer machine. Only in the words where it was most strongly organized did it survive. The people had grown weary of senatorial timidity and hesitance. They had an opportunity for themselves, and they spoke with a determination and a finality which could be understood even by a man of Mr. Lorimer's impenetrable self. The candidates whom he supported were for the most part recalled to private life. The senator who good-naturedly voted for him has been summoned home. Will Mr. Lorimer himself recognize the will of the people, or will he continue to hold himself above all considerations save those which have governed his political career thus far? It remains to be seen to what extent popular recall can influence such a man.

Interpretations

To J. R. Perkins

My Dear Brother: I have long had in my mind to write you a heartening word because of the sore trials you are passing through. Although I have not the privilege of a personal acquaintance I do think I understand the distress of mind and heart that you must be suffering during these days of much publicity. I do not know the facts with regard to your local situation; but I have read enough from you and heard enough about you to lead me to believe in you, and hence I wish to send you a word of greeting and encouragement.

George A. Campbell.

Your soul must be exceedingly heavy with sorrow. The clouds hang thick and low over you. You have been astonished that a division of your church has occurred; and you have been more than astonished at the behavior of some of your "friends." Many unpleasant things have occurred that you did not at all think possible a few months ago. You were pursuing a quiet pastorate, doing your work humbly and away from the gaze of the public. But now you have figured in the daily papers and in our own weeklies and you have awakened to find yourself a heretic. Much that you have done and said has been distorted. Even some near you, I presume, have entirely misrepresented you. Your heart is heavy indeed, I doubt not.

It is surprising how we strive with each other for the love of God!

It was the defenders of the faith that burned the heretics. And it was the heretics, some of them, that gave us the Bible and Christ again. God must surely love a true heretic; for the heretic risks so much. He takes up his cross. He may be mistaken, but he follows truth as he sees it.

I am not now endorsing your views, for I do not know what they are; but I believe in you, and I believe God loves you and has still a great work for you to do.

It is represented that you have denied the authority of Christ and the binding obligation of his commandments. I do not at all understand that you have done this. You may deny what I think is Christ's command; but that is vastly different from denying Christ. As I have gleaned from the papers, Christ to you—your Christ, may I say—is the divine personality and compulsion of your soul. I do not wish to differentiate here between your Christ and the New Testament Christ; for I take it that the New Testament Christ as God gives you to understand Him is indeed Saviour, Lord, Redeemer. Many people who do not see as I do sacrifice for Christ more than do I. And while they do I will not accuse them of having denied the authority of Christ. The kind of authority through which Christ impels to the highest living is not to be set at nought.

During these days your soul must be passing through a crisis. I hope it may come out of it all strong and whole. Doubtless you are wondering if you should continue to preach. Certainly you will find many churches closed to you. It may be that the support of your family is already worrying you. Your situation is not a pleasant one. Many will quote 'the way of the transgressor is hard,' but I prefer to say that the way to a profound discernment of God's grace is hard. If you will hold yourself to the ministry you will be a much stronger, richer proclaimer of God's truth than you were before. He, the Christ, was made perfect through suffering. So were many of his best ministers. I hope our great brotherhood that is not unhopefully striving to know the real essentials of Christ's gospel may have for many years to come the benefit of your mind, your heart, your suffering.

At present all may seem dark to you. No light or open door may be visible. Never doubt—yes, you must doubt and fear—but certainly light and the open door will appear. And in years to come you will read through the tears of it all the meaning of His providence.

Now just a word of practical suggestion. A church division is bad; no one feels this more than you, yourself. But in the heat of differences those in a local church cannot see clearly. Therefore I think the two sides to the controversy should call on a few wise brethren and hold a church council. These men would make due allowance for the strain that is upon the whole church in general and for the heat and misunderstanding in the local situation. Their findings would probably make it possible to have the minister leave with a united church. If such a council is at all possible in the Alamada situation I would advise it. How much wiser would this plan be, than the airing of the affair in the papers which cannot be sure of the conditions out of which the trouble grew.

Whatever course you may follow I believe you will be God's good man and that is what is worth while. Yours truly,

Hannibal. George A. Campbell.

P. S.—You will not understand that in the above I am taking sides against your opponents. But as you are the one above all others that must suffer for the situation I write this word to you in the hope that it may in a small way, at least, hearten you, and strengthen you in your ministerial calling. G. A. C.

Virility of the Bible

By W. H. P. Faunce.

Our Bible was not intended primarily to be intoned in cathedral service, or languidly perused in a ladies' boudoir. It was meant to grapple with the conscience of the world, to have dominion over the earth, and subdue it. It has tamed the ferocity of Goth and Vandal, has softened the hard hatreds of Viking and Norman, has rebuked the secret vices of the Latins, has seared and shamed the languorous indulgence of the Orient. It has roused the Germans to defy the chief powers of the hierarchy, and the English to believe that resistance to tyrants is the service of God. And to do this it has needed more than a spray of rose-water. It has needed a rugged vocabulary, a rhetoric that can stab and burn, an imagery that can "harrow up the soul" with terror, and a prophetic power that can descend as a veritable "hammer of God" upon the head of hypocrite and usurper and simoniac. The hypersensitive and dapper critics who now find the Bible too earnest to be palatable, and too frank to be in "good form," forget that their fathers never would have left the worship of Odin and Thor and the delights of piracy and bloodshed had it not been for the sledge-hammer blows dealt by the Bible to those sins which have specially beset our Anglo-Saxon blood. We would better expurgate some newspaper reports of proceedings in the court-room before we attempt to improve the scriptures.

The Essential Plea of the Disciples of Christ

In the Light of their Origin and Aim

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

In preparing his paper for the annual Congress of the Disciples convening this week in Kansas City, Mr. Morrison found that what seemed to him an adequate statement of his position could not be put into the limits of a forty minute address. He therefore has somewhat amplified his Congress paper on the above subject for publication in three installments in The Christian Century.

A generation ago there was a characteristic sermon in common use among all Disciple ministers. Unhappily it is not heard so frequently today, and therein is some significance. The sermon followed a classic model by Benjamin Franklin, but every preacher however closely he followed the model came to think of it as his own sermon. In it the preacher illustrated the plea of the Disciples by conceiving a great congress of representatives of all denominations called to consider a possible basis of Christian union. Three points of difference received more elaborate treatment than the rest, though many differences were discussed. These three were the creed, the name and the rite of initiation. Each denomination offered its creed as the creed of the united Church and it was rejected by all the rest. But all believed in Christ and his divine authority. This faith was the common denominator of the creeds. Each denomination offered its name to the united Church, and it was rejected by all the rest. But all accepted the name Christian or Disciples of Christ. Either of these was the common denominator of the names. As to the mode of initiation into the proposed united Church there were many who offered an optional procedure with any one of three forms—sprinkling, pouring or immersion—to be accepted. But the Baptist and other representatives contended that they could not in good conscience lend their sanction to any practice save immersion. In the discussion it became clear that immersion was universally acceptable and was already practiced by all more or less. Immersion therefore was found to be the common denominator of the initiating forms.

The significant thing in this illustration was that the preacher who drew the picture always left the Disciples on the outside of the congress and they were pledged to abide by the results of the congress. The implications of this conception of our position are deep-going and far-reaching. It reveals the absolutely catholic ground the Disciples were determined to occupy. It assumes that they had no sectarian interests to plead in such a congress, that they had no special interpretation of the Scripture which they wished to have made a test of fellowship in the united Church. It assumes that the living Church of Christ could solve its own problem of unity if once it could be aroused to undertake the task, and it assumes that the basis of unity underlies the denominational order as the oak lies under the moss that grows upon it.

I. Thomas Campbell's Catholicity

This sermon was an attempt to interpret in specific terms the basic ideal of Thomas Campbell's Declaration and Address. The feeling of oneness with all the people of God was the root out of which the Disciples' reformation grew. It was not a sense of distinctiveness but a sense of catholicity that actuated Thomas Campbell in originating this reformation and writing that great charter, the Declaration and Address. He proposed no new doctrine, nor ritual nor polity. He dealt in no details. He had no dogma to exploit, no special interpretation of Scripture upon the acceptance of which by the Christian world the union of God's people must wait. There were in his soul no distinctive ideas for whose prevalence he was jealous. His fundamental attitude toward the controversies of Christendom was determined by the perception that the things peculiar which others believed and practiced did not count and the things peculiar which he believed and practiced did not count, as against the great structural, substantial, vital realities in which both he and they stood together. He held differences lightly as of little moment. He clung to the great agreements among Christians as of priceless value. These agreements, he saw, were the mighty timbers out of which the sheltering walls of the living united Church were built, and the disagreements were but as ornaments for the interior of the house, concerning which, as in all matters of taste, there ought to be no serious dispute.

The denominational order was a weakness and a reproach to the Church, said Mr. Campbell. In the opening pages of the Declaration and Address he sets forth in vivid detail the evils of division. He says:

"What awful and distressing effects have those sad divisions produced! What aversions, what reproaches, what backbitings, what evil surmisings, what angry contentions, what enmities, what excommunications, and even persecution ! ! ! And, indeed, this must, in some measure, continue to be the case so long as those schisms exist; for, saith the apostle, where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. What dreary effects of those accursed divisions are to be seen, even in this highly favored country, where the sword of the civil magistrate has not as yet learned to serve at the altar. Have we not seen congregations broken to pieces, neighborhoods of professing Christians first thrown into confusion by party contentions, and, in the end, entirely deprived of Gospel ordinances; while, in the meantime, large settlements and tracts of country remain to this day entirely destitute of a Gospel ministry, many of them in little better than a state of heathenism, the churches being either so weakened with divisions that they cannot send them ministers, or the people so divided among themselves that they will not receive them. Several, at the same time, who live at the door of a preached Gospel, dare not in conscience go to hear it, and, of course, enjoy little more advantage, in that respect, than if living in the midst of heathens. How seldom do many in those circumstances enjoy the dispensation of the Lord's Supper, that great ordinance of unity and love. How sadly, also, does this broken and confused state of things interfere with that spiritual intercourse among Christians, one with another, which is so essential to their edification and comfort, in the midst of a present evil world; so divided in sentiment, and, of course, living at such distances, that but few of the same opinion, or party, can conveniently and frequently assemble for religious purposes, or enjoy a due frequency of ministerial attentions. And even where things are in a better state with respect to settled churches, how is the tone of discipline relaxed under the influence of a party spirit; many being afraid to exercise it with due strictness, lest their people should leave them, and, under the cloak of some specious pretense, find refuge in the bosom of another party; while, lamentable to be told, so corrupted is the church with those accursed divisions, that there are but few so base as not to find admission into some professing party or other."

It is not necessary to go beyond these opening pages of the Declaration and Address to find how large a place the scandal and weakness of sectarian division occupied in the feelings of Thomas Campbell. He reiterates this sentiment throughout the entire Address, like the minor motif of a symphony. One need not have read the biography of the author in order to know that the shame of the Church's divisions had been revealed to him by way of painful personal experience as well as by objective perception. This is disclosed later, in his letter to the Synod of Pittsburgh, when he says:

"Say, brethren, what is my offense that I should be thrust out from the heritage of the Lord, or from serving him in that good work to which he has graciously called me? For what error or immorality ought I to be rejected except it be that I refuse to acknowledge as obligatory upon myself, or to impose upon others anything as of divine obligation for which I am not able to produce a 'Thus saith the Lord' ".

Thomas Campbell had himself suffered from the narrow and arbitrary terms of communion in the Seceder church which had limited his fellowship to those of his own sect. He saw this state of things among all Christians. One body refused to receive the members of another body. Each had set up terms of fellowship peculiar to itself which were designed to separate other Christians from it. The results were strife, jealousy, waste and weakness.

To correct this evil Mr. Campbell pleaded with Christ's people to restore the lost unity of the Church, and he bade them look in two directions to find this unity, first to the pages of the New Testament, and secondly, to the actual Church of Christ existing underneath the denominational order. Let us look with Mr. Campbell in both these directions.

II. The New Testament Basis of Unity

The Church of the apostolic age was a united church and its principles of unity, Mr. Campbell reasoned, are clearly exhibited upon the pages of the New Testament. This united Church of the primitive time is a norm or model for the guidance of the Church in all time. The sectarian confusion in which the Church of today finds herself is due, he said, to a partial neglect of the revealed will of God in assuming to make the approbation of human opinions and inventions a term of communion or fellowship. The primitive Church gave the true form to the universal Church. It was divinely built by the great Architect himself. The plan upon which it was built may be easily discerned by anyone on the pages of the New Testament. The Scriptures are, Mr. Campbell repeatedly declared, "intentionally intelligible" so far as matters of faith and practice are concerned. They do not allow of a doubtful or double interpretation in any point that concerns the salvation of the soul or the unity of the Church. On this point he says:

"Should it be still further objected that all these sects and many more profess to believe the Bible, believe it to be the word of God, revealed and enjoined therein, and yet each will understand it his own way, and of course practice accordingly; nevertheless according to the plan proposed, you receive them all—we would ask, then, do all these profess and practice neither more nor less than what we read in the Bible, than what is expressly revealed and enjoined therein? If so, they all profess and practice the same thing, for the Bible exhibits but one and the self-same thing to all."

The duty of Christians, therefore, is to ignore creeds, historic systems and interpretations, to return to the original ground of unity and "take up matters where the apostles left them."

In his conception of the finished and perfect character of the Church as described in the New Testament, Mr. Campbell plainly follows the prevailing assumptions of his day. We could not expect him to do otherwise. His view imputed a legislative character to the New Testament. It assumed that the first interpreters of Jesus were his final interpreters, that the letter of the Scripture needed no further elucidation. He therefore urged that the Bible be taken without any interpretation whatever—"without note or comment." We cannot, of course, in this later day accept Thomas Campbell's assumptions with respect to the New Testament literature, but we can accept his interpretation of the New Testament Church. What he saw on the pages of the Scriptures was the true Church of Christ—affording an adequate basis of union outside of all parties but including all Christians, acceptable to all and free from all uncertainty.

III. The Basis of Unity in the Living Church

The other direction in which Thomas Campbell pointed to find the form of the Church's unity was toward the great catholic agreements which run throughout Christendom underneath her differences and divisions. He believed that below the denominational order there exists now this undivided Church of Christ. When Mr. Campbell pointed to the New Testament Church as the model of the Church for all time and pleaded with his brethren to restore that Church in the modern world, he never for a moment imagined or implied that the New Testament Church of Christ had ceased to exist with the passing of the apostolic age. Not less patent that the presence of a united Church on the pages of the New Testament was the fact of a united Church in the midst of the sorry divisions of the denominational order. The church is divided—yes. But it is still the Church of Christ; it is still, to Mr. Campbell's mind, one body. The members of these separated groups despite their jealousies and envyings and backbitings, their janglings and jarrings, their mutual exclusiveness of membership and communion, are nevertheless members of the one holy catholic Church of Christ, the same Church which Mr. Campbell found described on the pages of the New Testament. The sad division into sects had not destroyed the Church of Christ—the very sadness of the division was due to the fact that it was the Church of Christ that was divided.

Differences Are Negligible.

Again and again Mr. Campbell directed attention to the fact that the differences on account of which Christians were divided were negligible. They did not go down to the foundation, they existed only on the surface, in the sphere of opinion where differences should be tolerated, and affected not at all the sphere of faith where unity was essential. "What a pity," he exclaims, "that the Kingdom of God should be divided about such things!" It never occurred to him to question that those churches to whom the great charter of his movement was addressed were anything less than churches of Christ. "It is to us," he says, "a pleasing consideration that all the churches of Christ which mutually acknowledge each other as such, are not only agreed in the great doctrines of faith and holiness, but are also materially agreed as to the positive ordinances of the gospel institution; so that our differences, at most, are about the things in which the Kingdom of God does not consist, that is, about matters of private opinion or human invention." The essential plea he made was not that these churches should add anything to their faith or practice in order to become churches of Christ but that they should abandon their divisive tests of fellowship which had been superadded to the essential test of fellowship which the New Testament Church enforced and which they all still faithfully practiced.

Denominational Order a Fungus Growth.

Mr. Campbell seemed to conceive of the denominational order as a sort of fungus growth upon the stalk of the true historic Church of Christ. This false growth did not, to his mind, invalidate the character of the churches as churches of Christ. They were not less than churches of Christ, they were churches of Christ plus something else. All their sectarian troubles were the product of this over-growth, this unnatural accretion, this departure from the simple scriptural procedure. He was able thus to affirm the paradox that the divided Church is essentially undivided. He was able to penetrate below her disputes and jealousies and divisions and to discern the unity of faith and life underneath. In the first of his series of thirteen propositions he says, "That the Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one; consisting of all those in every place that profess their faith in Christ and obedience to him in all things according to the Scriptures, and that manifest the same by their tempers and conduct, and of none else: as none else can be truly and properly called Christians." The Church of Christ as Thomas Campbell conceived it, was not eaten up by denominationalism. "By the Christian Church throughout the world," he says, "we mean the aggregate of such professors as we have described in propositions 1 and 8, even all that mutually acknowledge each other as Christians upon the manifest evidence of their faith, holiness and charity. It is such only we intend when we urge the necessity of Christian unity." The essential and explicit plea of Mr. Campbell was that the Church should realize and manifest the unity it actually possessed. The lines of the true Church of Christ were blurred, if not wholly hidden from the world's eye by the sharper outlines of the denominational order. "That they may be one" he prayed, with his Master, "that the world may believe!"

Must Not Unchurch the Church.

That no other conception than this was entertained at this time by him is borne out with dramatic vividness in Dr. Richardson's account of Mr. Campbell's response when his son, Alexander, proposed a position on infant baptism which would necessitate the re-baptism of the entire Brush Run church. "I see no propriety," the father said, "in their unchurching or paganizing themselves, or in putting off Christ merely for the sake of making a new profession; thus going out of the Church merely for the sake of coming in again." To his mind the members of the sectarian order were members of the Church of Christ. It was not necessary for them to become members of the Church of Christ in order to establish Christian unity; it was only necessary for them to cease to be members of the sectarian order.

A quaint but very clever argument is worked out in the latter portion of the Declaration and Address where Mr. Campbell takes to task a church that justifies its exclusion of a heretic from its membership by the statement, "There are other churches that will receive him." Mr. Campbell says he would be "almost tempted to ask such a church if those other churches be churches of Christ, and if so, pray what does it call itself? Is it anything more or better than a church of Christ?" He then proceeds with emphasis to say that these other churches that may receive the excluded heretic cannot legitimately receive him if this church acts legitimately in excluding him. If it is right for other churches of Christ to receive him it is wrong for this church of Christ to exclude him.

IV. Two Ways of Approach

Enough has now been said to make evident the conception of Thomas Campbell that the basis of union for Christendom was to be determined by taking into account both the New Testament Church of primitive times and the living Church of modern times. The New Testament will aid in determining the outlines and boundaries of the primitive Church but the living Church will check and correct a capricious or sectarian interpretation of the New Testament Church. In Thomas Campbell's mind these two normative magnitudes—the New Testament Church and the living Church—dwelt together. In the early period of the movement he could not tolerate an interpretation of the Scripture which involved the "paganizing" of the Church. There must be something wrong with our understanding of the Scripture, he as much as said to his son, if we read it so as to unchurch the members of Christ's Church or to rule out from our fellowship any whom God receives. He believed that the true living Church of Christ that exists below the level of the denominational order is identical, absolutely, with the New Testament Church of Christ. There was no logical basis for this conviction. Its basis was in his faith. But he determined to act upon this faith. He did not first dogmatically fix the form of the New Testament Church and call men into it. He called upon the members of the living Church of Christ to abandon their denominational order and stand with him henceforth upon the broad ground of the living Church alone. He assumed that if they abandoned their denominational order they would then ipso facto be standing upon the New Testament basis of unity. They were already members of the Church of Christ. They were his brethren in the fellowship of God. He did not offer them a cut and dried plan of the New Testament Church which all must accept before they could be one. He declared that they were already one and he bade them come out from their divisions and show their unity to the world.

Two Complementary Methods.

We have, then, in the Declaration and Address two methods of determining the outlines of the true Church of Christ within which unity may be realized. These methods are logically complementary. The appeal to the New Testament is apriori, abstract, theoretical. The appeal to the living Church is empirical, vital, practical. The former asks: What are the outlines of the Church of Christ as the New Testament describes it? The latter asks: What are the outlines of the Church of Christ as a matter of fact? The former asks: What was the Church of Christ in the primitive time? The latter asks: What is the Church of Christ today? The former appeals to an ideal standard. The latter appeals directly to actual reality. The appeal to the New Testament Church provides a norm; the appeal to the living Church checks a mere individualistic interpretation of the norm.

These two approaches to unity, one through the New Testament Church, the other through the living Church, are not contradictory, but mutually interpretative. The New Testament Church is not one thing and the living Church another—they are identical. The historic appeal of the Disciples to "the Book" is a true appeal. The church in the Book is the true Church of Christ. The living Church in no sense supersedes the Church in the Book. It cannot supersede it; it is it. The living Church helps us to clear up and to correct our conceptions of the New Testament Church by compelling us continually to re-examine the scriptural warrant for our conceptions. In following either way of approach alone there are dangers. In the appeal to the living Church alone there is danger of intellectual and moral deterioration such as the Roman church exhibited in Luther's day. In an abstract appeal to the Scriptures there is the peril of dogmatism, of literalism, of sectarianism and isolation from actual human life.

V. Disregard of the Living Church

Of these two principles which were woven into the fabric of the Declaration and Address, the appeal to the Scriptures has, throughout our history, absorbed the mind of the Disciples to the practical exclusion of the appeal to the living Church. The Disciple mind forgot the living Church. It became engrossed in the academic, apriori method of finding out what the primitive Church was, and failed to reckon with the living Church of today. The Disciple mind has dwelt apart—albeit with its Bible—but nevertheless apart. As a consequence erroneous conceptions of the New Testament Church established themselves in our thought. Overmuch emphasis was laid upon external matters of organization and procedure. Passionate disputes arose over abstract subjects having little significance for actual human life. The unbiblical habit of thinking of the New Testament Church as an "ancient order of things" fixed itself upon us, and there developed within us supersensitive feelings for secondary matters of detail which too often occupied the place in our souls that rightly belonged to the weightier matters of justice and faith.

Division Among Disciples.

The fruitage of this one-sided method of seeking unity is apparent in our own body today.

We are compelled to confess that the Disciples have not been able in their own communion to illustrate the unity which they aver Christ is to read the New Testament with a bare mind. Whereas will everywhere follow the adoption of their principles. We can no longer huddle out of sight the scandal of a schism in our own communion. There now exists a body of perhaps 150,000 Disciples who have no fellowship with the main body because it tolerates the use of instrumental music and missionary societies, of which devices the Book does not speak. In a time when divided denominational families—Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists and others—are drawing toward reunion, this split in the Disciples' family grows daily more pronounced and impassable. It is evident to the world that our way of using the Bible has not brought to the Disciples a preeminent position in the actual practice of Christian unity.

But more serious than our failure to exhibit to Christendom an attractive illustration in our own communion of the efficacy and beauty of our principles is the discovery that through this abstract method of studying the Bible there has been developed a harsh legalistic interpretation which has crushed out from many minds the very temper of unity, the feeling of oneness with God's people. A dogmatic temper has made its home with us. Under cover of this legalistic system a view has been nourished which implies that our churches and churches like ours are churches of Christ and that other churches are not churches of Christ.

Equivocal Attitude Toward Other Christians.

Our attitude toward other churches is in striking contrast to the spirit of the Declaration and Address. We call them the "sects." The Declaration called them churches of Christ. There is nothing more anomalous in Christian history than that after a century of pleading for Christian unity we should arise to ask whether these to whom our plea is addressed are really Christians and their churches churches of Christ!

In the modern atmosphere of fraternity and fellowship, when all Christ's people are drawing nearer together, there are actually among the Disciples of Christ many who have so schooled their hearts in assent to the straw theology of legalism that they can assert without flinching that one who has not been baptized by immersion cannot enter the Kingdom of God. An analogy much more common in our ministry than many who attend this Congress are aware, classifies so-called sectarian churches with lodges and other social orders as well-meaning and useful institutions, but not churches of Christ. Those who hold this view follow their logic to its inexorable and cruel conclusion. But the main body of the Disciples cannot tolerate this harsh view. They believe that our neighboring evangelical churches are churches of Christ and their members Christians. But a certain conception of the New Testament Church and the New Testament way of salvation inhibits our saying so in frank and unqualified speech. We have therefore fallen into the habit of evading consistent thought on the subject by the use of a euphemistic nomenclature by which we refer to Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists in non-committal terms as "believers," "our religious neighbors", "members of the denominations", or "the pious unimmersed". If we speak of them as "Christians" it is usually in some context where no critical attention will be called to it, or else we add "in a sense", or "as it were", or qualify the title by calling attention to their "imperfect obedience."

How Explain Spirit of Disunity?

Why this strange inhibition on our hearts? Why this vagueness, this awkwardness of speech, this most ungracious patronage of God's saints and children? How can we account for the existence of a sentiment such as this in a body of Christians committed fundamentally and historically to the reunion of Christ's divided people?

What, too, is the explanation of the apparent failure of our appeal to the Scriptures to produce in us, the Disciples, a typical people illustrative of the unity for which we plead and for which Christ prayed?

The explanation lies here: the Disciples have allowed their principle of appeal to the Scriptures practically to swallow up its twin principle, the appeal to the living Church. We have shut ourselves apart with our Bible to find the outlines of the primitive Church and have failed to check up our interpretation by contact with the living Church of today. The fault was not in the Scriptures—God forbid! The fault was that we put ourselves in a position apart from the living Church where it was possible to see things in the Scriptures that are not in the Scriptures at all. We searched the New Testament for the Church of Christ and allowed ourselves to forget that this Church of Christ described in the New Testament is a living Church now, that all its members are members one of another. The besetting danger of an abstract and apriori use of the Bible as a basis of unity has befallen us. We assumed that all that is necessary in tracing the outlines of the primitive Church of the true conception of the New Testament Church can be obtained only by him who keeps heart and mind in closest fellowship with the living Church. As a result of our fallacious procedure the head side of our plea, the dogmatic side, the side of legal correctness and conformity and clannishness, has been cultivated at the expense of the heart side, the human side, the side of fraternity and fellowship and practice. Left thus with the single principle of appeal to the Scriptures, it is hardly to be wondered at that the world has taken our plea for unity with suspicion, regarding us as just one more sect propagating our peculiar conception of the Scriptures and, like all sects, hoping to gain as many proselytes as we can. And, more lamentable still, it is hardly to be wondered at that we ourselves have almost ceased to take our plea for unity seriously, settling down with complacency to a respectable position in the family of the denominations.

What has just been said about the Disciples' view of the New Testament Church is not to be taken as directed toward their view as a whole but toward a single feature only, a feature which the remainder of this paper will treat of. The main outlines and features of the New Testament Church are, I believe, accurately reflected in the Disciples' characteristic thinking.

Is it possible now to determine historically when and how this principle of appeal to the living Church was crowded out of the Disciples' mind? When and how the catholic sense of unity with all Christ's people was displaced by the more vivid sense of unity with a particular class of Christians who conformed to a particular understanding of what the New Testament requires?

It can be determined with historical precision.

(To be Continued.)

Editorial Table Talk

The Muscatine Labor Troubles

The Social Service Commission of the Federal Council, having on it Rev. Charles Stelzle, one of the Men and Religion experts, Dr. John M. Glenn of the Sage Foundation, Rev. Dr. William I. Haven of the American Bible Society, Ernest H. Abbott of the "Outlook" and other like men, will issue at once a report upon the Muscatine industrial difficulties, which have now lasted for nearly a whole year. Muscatine is an Iowa city of 20,000, given over in great part to the manufacture of pearl buttons. The recommendations of the Commission relate to all growing cities in growing industrial states as well as to Muscatine and Iowa.

The Commission scores the Muscatine ministers for inaction in that they have not led in forming a social centre for young people and an educational forum, and that they did not stop piece work by women's societies of their churches, thereby making themselves parties of one element, and losing the position of arbitrators. It scores the button employees for telling false tales about their treatment, the Union for narrowness toward non-Union workers, and individuals for rioting. It asks the people of Muscatine why they have not provided social and educational centers, even if the ministers failed to do so, and points them to the success of such centres in other cities. And finally, it asks the State of Iowa why it has no industrial commission that shall settle counts of buttons, one of the points in dispute in Muscatine, responsibility for poisoning in industrial occupations like the handling of shells from which buttons are made, and especially what sort of men it is whom the state imports to act as special police and deputy sheriffs.

Muscatine difficulties remain unsettled. Churches have lost members, merchants have lost business, and people and manufacturers are moving away, so the Commission reports. The Commission regards all as wholly unnecessary, and calls upon all parties to end it.

The Demand for Spiritual Leadership

The Disciples are suffering today from the lack of conspicuous leadership. Leaders are essential in the life of a people. A great voice is inspiration and victory in itself. The British religious press is commenting widely upon the deliverance of a Wesleyan minister who found it in his heart to say that "not a new theology, not new organization, not new methods, not even tackling of social problems, is the immediate need of the Church; the supreme need of the Church is a great spiritual leadership." Among the comments none is more to the point than that of the Methodist Recorder which, endorsing the statement fully, proceeds to say:

It is rather difficult to say what is meant by spiritual leadership. It is one of those phrases that cover a great deal, and that allow each mind to import much of its own feeling and thought into the content. It has power because it is vague and roomy. But there is something in it, and we are at one with all that was meant. To put it with a trifle of an indefinite change—what is needed is a great spiritual personality, one who has been commissioned and endowed, not out of time or by man. All around in all the churches there is abiding and awaiting a great mass of possibilities and wide-felt longings for some better thing. But they are lacking a center, a focus, and some gathering agency. It is so in our own church, it is so in all the churches we know. If there were but to arise one who could command these developments, these scattered and delicate inspirations, kindling here and there, we are convinced we should see great things.

But in the meantime we are not able to see the signs of such a leader. The churches cannot command the advent of a prophet, when one is needed; there is a visitation from on High necessary, before the man can step forth and all shall hear and tremble and obey. It may be that we do harm by looking here and there, and yearning for someone to lead; that we are weakening the church by gazing at the wide field of its operations and its necessities. Is it not possible that we should agree to do without leaders, and, each man in his own place and work, do the duty he knows, and do it with a solemn sense of the will and the presence of God? Whatever dearth there may be of leaders, there is no dearth of duties, and we may be looking to the clouds for an abundance of rain, and forgetting the duties of the plow. We know not what shall be on the morrow; but on the morrow of a duty well done there is always a better world. In such a strife, it is a species of cowardice to wait for a leader.

Methodists and a King

Americans in Italy for any length of time come to know the king, Victor Emmanuel III. Naturally the papers speak of him, and the people talk about him, his words and his doings. The impression is soon gained that he is a sovereign of unusual character and ability. The recent attempt on his life greatly shocked not only Italians, but Americans dwelling in Italy, especially the American Methodists, for whom the king entertains the highest regard and for whose work he has repeatedly shown his sympathy. Immediately following the attempted assassination, Rev. Dr. B. M. Tipple, of Rome, despatched the following telegram to the royal palace, "The American Methodist Episcopal Church of Rome sends to Your Majesty the expression of its devout thanksgiving to God that the life of Your Majesty has been preserved and voices the earnest prayer that Your Majesty may long be spared to the joy of your family, to the prosperity of Italy, and to the enlightenment and progress of the whole world." In reply the following message came: "His Majesty, the king, has received with pleasure your expressions of good will and thanks you most sincerely." The Methodists of Italy say, "Long life to Victor Emmanuel III!"

Mr. Sunday and the Ministers

Dr. Washington Gladden of Columbus, O., refuses to cooperate with the "Billy" Sunday campaign soon to be held in that city. Indeed, Dr. Gladden is actively opposed to the meetings. He has had put into pamphlet form the article by Dr. Hugh T. Morrison, which gave an analysis of the results of Mr. Sunday's meeting in Springfield, Ill., two years after the campaign there. The pamphlet is being distributed among church people of Columbus. This article appeared some months ago in The Christian Century. Dr. R. A. Beard of Fargo, N. D., is another Congregational minister who refuses to give his support to the Sunday revivals. Dr. Morrison's estimate of the influences of the Sunday methods of campaigning have been widely circulated by the religious press, all agreeing that it was a painstaking, impartial and very thorough piece of work. While "Billy" Sunday is on the platform only one estimate of his work seems humanly possible; the true estimate must come after his departure. If a revival cannot survive the stress of two years conflict with the world, the flesh, and the devil, there is a vital weakness in it somewhere.

Doctor Emmons, the able New England divine, met a Pantheistical physician at the house of a sick parishoner. It was no place for a dispute, but the abrupt question of the Pantheist was:

"Mr. Emmons, how old are you?"

"Sixty, sir; and how old are you?"

"As old as creation," was the triumphant response.

"Then you are the same age as Adam and Eve?"

"Certainly; I was in the garden when they were there."

"I have always heard," rejoined the doctor, "that there was a third party in the garden with them, but I never knew before that it was you."

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

Readers of The Christian Century will surely enjoy this new serial story by Dr. Sheldon, which will be continued from week to week during the coming months. In his foreword the well known author of "In His Steps" says: "The main purpose of the story is to illustrate the value of the average American family training and the final victory of the spiritual ideals over material or physical attractions. The final outcome of the struggle which Helen Douglas makes between her natural inclination to follow a life of ease and luxury, and the real training which she has received at home, is the picture of what is going on in the best American homes today. It has been my hope that the story would help many young people to realize the great difference between the finest type of manhood and womanhood, and that which in some cases has grown up on American soil, where the standards have been low and the ideals have been obscured by fashion, by false home training, and by superficial ideas of happiness." A real story about real young people of today, not yesterday. The boys and young men will like Walter, for he goes East to a most up-to-date college of football and crew races, and the girls will fancy Helen, for she has a love affair with a nice young man before we get through with her.

CHAPTER I.

Paul Douglas and his wife, Esther, were holding a serious council together over their older boy, Walter.

"I can't help feeling a little disappointment over the way things are going. I did so want the boy to come into the office with me."

"I know," said Esther, with a grave smile, "but he seems to have his mind made up. I don't think we ought to thwart him if he is made to do that for his lifework."

"No," said Paul, looking at Esther with great thoughtfulness, "I have always believed that a boy should have freedom to choose his lifework. But what puzzles me is where did Walter get his leaning toward electrical engineering? None of my ancestors, so far as I know, ever had the slightest tendency that way, and the Darcys for generations have been business men.

"I was in the boy's room the other day," continued Paul, meditatively, "and he had the floor and his bed and the chairs covered with models of electrical machines. I was afraid to sit down or lean up against anything for fear it would go off and give me a shock or something. While I was asking questions, what did the boy do but start a contrivance that hung from the ceiling and it reached down a metallic arm that grabbed my hat off and began to comb my hair. I yelled, naturally, or unnaturally, and tried to get loose. but another contrivance shot out from the wall somewhere and clutched me by the leg and began to make frantic gestures at my shoes like a wild boot-blacking emporium. I decided to stand still rather than run the risk of getting hit somewhere else. Meanwhile Walter was laughing so hard he couldn't answer my emphatic request to know what the thing was going to do. He finally explained that it was a new device he was experimenting with to give the patient head treatment for nervous prostration, and black his shoes while he waited. I made him turn off the power and then I cautiously backed out of the room and gave him my testimonial on the efficacy of his invention adapted to give anyone nervous prostration and general paralysis who never had them."

Esther laughed, the same good, generous, contagious laugh she had always known, and Paul had always loved to hear.

"Walter is a genius. I always said he would make his mark."

"I was afraid he would make several on me before I could get away," said Paul, smiling. "Well, of course, we have really decided to let the boy go to Burrton. If he is going to have a thorough course in electricity, I want him to have the best there is."

"I shall miss him dreadfully. O dear, my darling!" Esther suddenly yielded to a good cry that somewhat upset Paul. Only once in a while in their married life had Esther given way to such a display of feeling. But before Paul went down to the office that morning she had dried her tears and with a hopeful smile prepared to make out a list of Walter's school necessities for the eight months he would be away from home.

Walter was twenty years old, tall and slim, with his father's features and his mother's voice, and a very strong liking for all scientific and mechanical work. He had within the year graduated from the Milton high school with honors in the physics department, and had at once set his ambition on going to Burrton Electrical and Engineering School, the best school of its kind in the East. His father had made him a tempting offer to come into the News office, but the boy had frankly told his father that if there was anything in the world he disliked, it was a newspaper. So Paul, with a sigh of disappointment, had yielded to the inevitable and agreed to the Burrton plan, simply stipulating that Walter, who was disposed to be luxurious in his tastes, should make up his mind to a school course stripped of unnecessary expenses and devoted to the main thing.

"I am willing, of course, to help you with your education," he said, in a very plain, frank talk with Walter when the decision was finally made. "But I expect you to do something for yourself. The Burrton catalogue mentions stewardships which students are allowed to choose in part payment of tuition. Isn't that so?"

Walter looked annoyed and answered his father sullenly.

"Yes, but the stewards at Burrton have to wash dishes and mess around the clubhouses doing odd jobs for the other fellows. It cuts them out of pretty much all the best social life of the school."

Paul looked at his oldest boy indignantly. If there was anything he ever feared, it was that his children would grow up to despise manual labor and shrink from it.

"Do you mean to say you are not willing to do your honest part at honest work to get through school? Or do you mean to say, Walter, that the social part of the school is so important that you are going to make it count in your program for an education?"

"No," Walter looked anxious and his tone was changed. "I—well—I naturally don't want to be rated in a class below the rest—I—"

"Do you mean that the stewards at Burrton are looked down on for doing physical work? I understood you to say that Jack Alwin said every fellow at Burrton stood on his merits, and that real scholarship really counted. If I thought there was a spirit of toadyism or aristocracy at Burrton, I wouldn't let you go there."

"They are measured by scholarship," said Walter, in alarm now, lest his father would decide to withdraw his consent to the Burrton plan. "But, of course, if I go in with the stewards, I can't expect to go out much, or—but I'm willing to apply for a place, father, I want to go. Don't change the plan, will you?"

"I want you to go, Walter. But I don't want you ever to think that the work of your hand is any less honorable than the work of your head. What little you do won't hurt you at all. And it makes no difference what others think. If you go to Burrton, you go to get an education. And perhaps one of the best parts of it will be in the training you receive outside of the classroom."

So Walter's ambition, so far as his school was concerned, was finally met, though secretly he chafed at the conditions imposed by his father, and when the day came for him to say good-bye and start on his journey of fifteen hundred miles, he was not as happy as he should have been, anticipating his position in the school and feeling restless over the task it imposed. At the same time he was so eager to get on with his engineering that he would endure many hard and disagreeable experiences. Paul and Esther took leave of him at the station with a feeling, which they kept from being too sad on the boy's account, that he was going to face a new world and meet some overturning events in the course of the school year.

Helen Douglas, their second child, was eighteen, just entering Hope College, and beginning to face some questions that gave Paul and Esther much thought. She was a girl blessed with her mother's vigorous health, so overflowing with vitality that her mother said to her one day, "Helen, if you feel so strong and outbreaking, I don't know but I will let Jane go and put you in the kitchen."

"That's all right, mother," replied Helen, calmly. "You know, I am going to be a professor of domestic science and I would just as soon practice on you and father and the boys as anybody. But I feel so well all the time I believe I would like to join a circus."

"Helen Douglas!" Esther said, shocked at her daughter's remark. And then she thanked God for the girl's abounding life. "There are so many sickly girls and women, Helen, you cannot be thankful enough for one of the most beautiful of all things, health."

*Copyright 1911, George H. Doran Co.

"I am thankful, mother. You know I never even had a headache. Isn't it fine to be so well that you don't know what to do?"

Mrs. Douglas, however, had some serious thoughts of Helen, and at times she was anticipating possible sorrow for this creature with the strength and grace of some forest animal. Helen was careless and thoughtless in many ways, selfish and arbitrary in the home circle, although in many cases she was quickly penitent and ready to acknowledge her faults. She was inclined to be very critical and openly judged everyone, from the minister to her own father and mother. She was constantly calling Louis to account for his failings, and one of Mrs. Douglas' daily crosses was due to the habit Helen had of provoking Louis, partly in a spirit of banter, partly because Louis offended the girl's nice feelings about certain customs and courtesies in polite society. There were great possibilities in Helen for a rich and rare womanhood, but many a hard fight ahead for her in the overcoming and many humiliations perhaps for her sensitive soul before she reached the place of victory.

Louis was fifteen, just entered high school, a little backward with his studies on account of trouble with his eyes and a nervous attack which left him somewhat irritable and timid. He was an average boy, a great lover of his mother, and a hero-worshiper toward his father. He was a handsome-looking boy who bade fair to develop into a business career of some sort, but with doubtful habits which would be settled one way or another as his nervous physical condition improved or grew worse. Paul watched him closely and counseled much with Esther over Louis, realizing more as the boy grew that his case was one which called for much wisdom and care.

Two months after Walter's departure, his father received a letter from him which he read aloud to Esther in the family circle. It was Paul's custom to take the whole family into his confidence in all matters that belonged to all, and the habit was one that strengthened the ties of comradeship among them.

"Dear father and mother and all," Walter wrote, using a phrase common to the Douglas children whenever they had been away from home. "I'm having the time of my life at Burrton and thought you might like to hear about it.

"There are about five hundred in the school and some pretty fine fellows. They come from fifteen different states and of course I haven't met many of them yet and don't expect to for some time.

"I can't say that I like the steward business. I have to wait on the swells at one of the fraternity houses, and I don't like it. Father, I wish you would let me do something else for my expenses. I can't complain of any treatment of the fellows. They are all civil enough, but I can't help feeling the difference between us. You see some of the fellows come from swell families in New York and Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. Six of the tables waited on have suites at the clubhouse that beat anything I ever saw. Their furniture is hand-carved and one of the fellows has paintings in his room that cost ten thousand dollars. Half the upper classmen keep automobiles and dog kennels and spend a lot of money on wine suppers and spreads. You can see for yourself that I'm not in the same class with these fellows, but it must be fine to have money and not have to scheme how to get on.

"As for the work, I enjoy the plant all right. There isn't anything like this equipment anywhere else. Lots of the fellows are here to fit themselves for work on the Isthmus. A good many of them are going to fail out on the finals. For all it's a rich man's son's school, it's only fair to say the standard is kept up and I am told that over fifty failed to get through last half. I have been fortunate enough to get a position under the assistant foreman in the coil shop and he has been kind enough to say that if I keep on as I have begun I may have a place in the new experiment division just planned under Wallace, the government expert recently sent here. If I can get this position it will carry a scholarship and in that case I suppose you will not object to my dropping the stewardship. It takes an awful lot of time and I don't like it a little bit.

"There is fine boating here on the Wild River and we have a great crew this season. We row against Brainerd Technology School three months from now. Nothing else is talked about just now. There isn't much doubt about our winning. Everyone knows that Carlisle, our stroke, is the strongest man that ever sat in a Burrton boat and we have never had such a crew for team work since the big race in 1891. There is lots of betting on the game, and the odds are four to one on Burrton.

"Now father, you won't object, will you, to my dropping the steward work if I get the Wallace appointment? I have almost no time for anything now but digging. I don't care to be known just as a 'dig,' but that is all I am so far. The scholarship will pay me twice as much as the work I'm doing now and give me leisure for something besides digging. I haven't had time to be homesick but I would give a lot to see you all.

"With much love from the constant 'digger.'

"Walter Douglas."

Paul's reply to this was brief and characteristic of his insight where Walter was concerned. After assuring him that he had no objections to his leaving the stewardship in case the scholarship was open to him, he wrote:

"I notice you speak several times with more or less disparagement of the fact that you are getting to be a 'dig.'

"I understand by this word is meant that the student is actually applying himself with unusual enthusiasm or persistence in his studies. I also understand that it is in some schools a term of reproach and that a 'dig' is regarded as a slow fellow who has made the mistake of supposing a college is a place where scholarships may be acquired.

"Now, I don't want you to miss the social side of college life and all the jolly things that rightly belong to it. But if it comes to a choice between being a 'dig' and being a 'jolly fellow' in college, you need never hesitate concerning which one of these two we want you to be. The main object of a college course is an all-around manhood and a fitting of yourself for the best possible service in the world. The world does not need jolly good fellows so much as it needs persons who know how to do things, and do them right, and do them when they are most needed. Wine suppers don't add anything to the happiness or well-being of the world. And I hope you will live to see the time if I don't, when the American college will cease to be a soft retreat for rich men's sons and be a real training school for service. Service is the great word, my boy. No man is truly educated who does not have that word at the center of both his heart and his head.

"I enclose a check for a hundred dollars and leave it to your judgment as to its use. I want you to have all that rightfully goes with the college course, and I hope you can get the scholarship if that will mean for you more leisure for all-around development. But I don't think the work you have done so far has hurt you any.

"All send love; your father,

"Paul Douglas."

Esther felt relieved to know Paul had sent Walter some money. She had feared the boy was working too hard.

"Not a bit," said Paul, stoutly. "The boys that work their way through are not hurt by it. Walter is perfectly well and strong. He is able to stand it."

"His tastes are very refined," murmured Esther. "I can understand how he feels about waiting on the table."

"Waiting on the table is a great business," said Paul. "What would happen to the old world if everybody now waiting on tables should refuse to do it any more? It would disarrange our civilization more than a universal war. There is nothing finer or more needed than waiting on tables."

But there was one phrase in Walter's letter that Paul dwelt over after he had gone back to the office. Walter had written of the luxury in the rooms of the rich fellows, evidently with some spirit of envy, and closed his brief comment by saying:

"You can see for yourself I am not in the same class with these fellows, but it must be fine to have money and not have to scheme how to get on."

Paul had a perfect horror of money-loving, of soft and toadying habits, of the worship of style and society, and nonsense of high life generally. Nothing cut him deeper at heart than the feeling, as Walter grew up, that the boy had a streak in his character somewhere of the very thing that his father detested. It was this knowledge of a weakness in Walter that led to Paul's great desire to give the boy another standard, to impress on him the nobility of labor and the disgrace of getting something for nothing. The one thing so far that was saving Walter from becoming a victim to his luxurious tastes was his real love of scientific knowledge and his desire to make of himself a first-class engineer. Paul counted on this factor to keep Walter steady to the main thing, but he realized as he read the boy's letter that there were influences in the Burrton school powerfully pulling him in other directions, away from the simple and plain habits he had always known at home.

Walter's next letter acknowledged with much evident gratitude the receiving of the money his father had sent and spoke again of the scholarship opening. That matter, however, would not be settled until a trying out of several applicants for the honor.

Two months later Paul received a short letter from Walter, written evidently in some bitterness, saying the scholarship had been finally given to an upper class man, "one with a pull," Walter declared, adding, "I shall have to keep at the steward business, I suppose. I can't make much more than my board at it, father, and the mid-term tuition is due in two weeks. I haven't money enough to settle. My laboratory fees have been doubled since Wallace came in with his expert division work and expenses generally are heavy."

Paul replied by sending Walter another check and writing as encouragingly to him as possible. Walter answered briefly and seemed to be feeling somewhat more reconciled to the disappointment connected with the scholarship matter.

Two weeks later Paul had a letter from the publisher of one of his books, asking him to come East on business relating to the book. He decided hastily to go on and found he could visit Burrton school on the way. He wrote Walter of his intention, giving him the date of the day he should prob-

(Continued on page 22.)

IN HIS SHIRT SLEEVES

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON

Some months ago a minister was preaching in a pulpit a thousand miles and more from home. At the close of his sermon a member of the congregation greeted him:

"Good morning, Dr. Somebody. I am very glad to have heard you. I heard you preach fifteen years ago in your own pulpit in New England. It was a very hot day, and I remember you removed your coat as you began to preach. It impressed me much at the time, and I have never forgotten it."

The minister answered, "You are totally mistaken, sir."

"Why, I was there, and I saw it," replied the gentleman.

"You may have been there, but you saw nothing of the kind," replied the minister.

Now I know the minister, and I have no doubt he told the truth. I do not know the other man, but I have every reason to suppose that he thought he told the truth.

Always Wears Black.

The particular minister to whom this happened habitually wears black, and his coat reaches to his knees. I do not think it is an essential part of his religion, but it has become a settled habit of his life. I happened to know him at the beginning of his ministry, which, like my own, was in the Tennessee mountains; and even there he wore a long black coat. The customs of that region did not require it; mountain preachers often removed their coats, but he wore his coat, and it was a long, black coat, and never any other kind.

I traveled with this same minister in Palestine. Most of the ministers wore gray, or some dust-proof color. He wore black, and carried with him in a sort of saddle-bag trunk his inevitable frock coat. He put it on each night at dinner, and he was always chosen on committees to meet great men because he had his long coat with him.

At the time the gentleman spoke of, fifteen years ago, this minister was in a certain stage of his development in which it seemed to him that clerical dress ought to be made a little more distinctive. So, without ever running to any very great extremes, he was emphasizing, at that time, his usual habit, and making it a little more clerical even than was his wont.

Mixed Memories?

He has been preaching for a quarter of a century, and has worn black from the day of his ordination. When he is on his summer vacation, and for a little time puts off his usual garb, his friends hardly know him and he himself feels a little strange. The city in which he was preaching fifteen years ago is one of the most conservative in New England. Had he removed his coat in his pulpit there, the Associated Press would have told of it on Monday morning in every prominent paper in the United States.

Now, notwithstanding all this, an intelligent and truthful man met him face to face last summer, and said to him, "I heard you preach in your own pulpit fifteen years ago. I have never forgotten that you removed your coat in the pulpit."

Nothing of the sort happened. Nothing approaching it ever happened. The man was mistaken.

But how did he make that mistake?

No one knows; no one ever will know. He may have mixed two memories in his own mind. He may have sat in the extreme rear, and have had defective vision. No matter how he was mistaken, he was mistaken. The minister to whom he spoke never preached a sermon in his life in his shirt sleeves.

Bishop Brooks at Bombay.

Now, this particular minister is no fanatic in the matter of his personal appearance. He is not an over-careful man in that regard. Had he not a good wife he would be even more careless than he is. He would not hesitate to preach without a coat if he had no coat, and it was his duty to preach. I remember hearing him say one time that he thought somewhat less of Phillips Brooks for declining to preach in Bombay because they could not find him a surplice long enough. He said of it that he was surprised that Bishop Brooks did not preach in his usual ministerial attire, and let the surplice go. He thought that when a man had gone so far and there were people waiting for his message, no question of clothing should have prevented his preaching. This minister is no fanatic about clothing. He simply has worn clerical black so long that it is the natural thing for him to do, and he has perspired under it a great many times, quite frequently lining it with fresh linen a second time on Sunday when the morning was hot, and he needed to preach again. But he would have made ten changes of linen rather than remove his coat in the pulpit.

Saw Him Do It.

Yet an honest, truthful man faced him, and mentioned as something which had so impressed him at the time that he had never forgotten it, that he had been present and seen him preach in his shirt sleeves.

To how many other people had he told that story in the interval? How many people may there be in the United States today who believe, because they have been told it by a truthful man, that Rev. Dr. Somebody was accustomed to remove his coat in his New England pulpit and preach in his shirt sleeves?

Evidence Undeniable.

Suppose Dr. Somebody had died, and different people were telling their reminiscences of him; suppose the gentleman who thought he had this memory had told it to a reporter, and the reporter had printed it, and the biographer had read it, and there had found a place in his official biography some such sentence as this:

"Dr. Somebody carried into his New England pulpit the habits he had acquired in his ministry in the Tennessee mountains. Frequently in warm weather he removed his coat, and preached in his shirt sleeves."

I do not doubt that many a biography has statements in it that rest on quite as slender a foundation. It is quite possible for a biography to contain such a paragraph, and to follow it by such as this—

"In time, however, he abandoned this custom, and even looked back upon it with some humiliation, and was known to deny it; and in his later years he was always remembered as appearing in clerical black. The evidence that he did sometimes preach in his shirt sleeves, however, is undeniable."

He Was an Idolater!

Now preaching in one's shirt sleeves is not forbidden in the ten commandments, and a man might easily do it and still be a Christian. But it is quite as easy for such an impression to rise concerning the ten commandments as about a coat. It would be far more nearly truthful, for instance, for any one of a hundred guests to say concerning this same minister—

"I have been a guest in the home of this good man, and at family worship he and his household always bowed down to a graven image."

Such a statement as that would be quite as true as the other, if not more so; for this minister has in his home a fine old bronze Buddha, the gift of a missionary, and it is in the room where the family worship is conducted.

"That Reminds Me."

Now the moral of this little story is that it is very easy sometimes for reports to start, and very difficult to correct them. Even a truthful man has been known to lie outrageously about something he is sure he remembers. Of all this the story of the imaginary shirt sleeves is a parable.

Some one hears a sermon and it reminds him of a sermon he has read, and he tells that the minister plagiarized from Beecher. Some one thinks he remembers that a minister obtained money on false pretenses. Be very careful not to remember something you did not see. For if a good and truthful man could have been mistaken in the way that here is truthfully related, is it not possible that some good men have suffered from evil reports that had no better foundation?

Winter Quarters

Where's the crawling caterpillar?
Sound asleep in his cocoon.
Where's the bee, so bright and busy?
Dreaming in the hive of June.
Where's the snail and where's the turtle?
Safely buried in the ground.
Where's the woodchuck, where's the rabbit?
In their burrows they are found.
Where's the thrush and where's the robin?
Singing 'neath the Southern sky.
Where's the bear and where's the squirrel?
In their hollow tree they lie.
Where's the ant, that careful worker?
In her underground abode.
Where's the eighty-eyed spinning spider?
In a crevice snugly stowed.
Where's the bat that ranged at midnight?
He is in his winter's sleep—
In his cave he hangs head downward.
And he never takes a peep.
These and many other creatures
Hide or drowse the winter through;
But when spring has once awakened,
They are up and stirring, too.

—Susie M. Best.

There is a story of some sailors who had been drinking, and late on a dark night wished to return to their ship. They came down to their boat, and drew out the oars. But they seemed to make no progress. They rowed and rowed; and still the ship did not appear. At last the soberest among them discovered that they had never unloosened the boat's painter from the wharf. What Christ asks of his disciples is that they shall not only row, but cut loose. They are not to be afraid of new endeavors. They need to venture, both for their own profit and for the good of the work He calls them to do. There are many troubled souls in the churches who complain of Christ, that He has brought them little joy and advanced them but a little distance. May it not be that they are still bound fast to the city of their old experience? —Selected.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

RECENT LEGISLATION FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN

CHILDREN'S BUREAU BILL.

About six weeks ago, a report was made in this department of the Annual Child Labor Conference in Louisville, and the efforts made there in behalf of the Children's Bureau Bill, then pending before congress. It was urged that the need had long been felt for a bureau, devoted exclusively to gathering facts about children; the census department gave a few statistics about infant mortality, orphanages, juvenile courts and so forth, but questions relating to child welfare had to be decided on a lack of information that was deplorable. The Children's Bureau Bill passed the senate the last week in January, and was reported favorably to the house shortly after; some anxiety was felt as to its fate there, as nearly two months elapsed without any action being taken; but on the second of April, it passed by a vote of 175 to 17, and now goes to the president for his sanction. There is little doubt but that he will sign it—and a great step forward in the uplift of childhood will be taken.

SCHOOL SUFFRAGE FOR WOMEN IN KENTUCKY.

Tennyson says, "The woman's cause is man's," and in even a more intimate sense, the woman's cause is the child's. The General Assembly of Kentucky, just before its adjournment in March, passed a bill granting school suffrage to women, and we feel that it has done as much for the children of the commonwealth as for the women by this act. The new law requires the same qualifications for women as for men in any common school election, with the additional requirement that they shall be able to read and write; they can vote in all matters pertaining to the management of the schools, and are eligible to serve as trustees on boards of education. The bill was promptly signed by our good governor, and Kentucky now joins the goodly fellowship of the thirty other states who give their women the right of school suffrage. May she soon join that elect company of six states who give their women the right of full suffrage!

End of Legislative Fight.

Thus happily ends a fight that has been waging before our legislatures for about a decade. The Kentucky Federation of Women's Clubs has promoted the bill, and has had its faithful representatives at Frankfort, who have shown infinite skill and patience in pleading for the cause they love. It has been an educational and chastening experience. They have weekly received instruction in what Artemus Ward calls "woman's spear". They have been told by some that they are not entitled to vote, because they cannot fight—that the ballot must have the bullet behind it. About the time they have learned to make an effective answer to that in Lady Somerset's fine phrase, "She who bears soldiers, does not need to bear arms,"—behold, others whirl around, and declare that women are not fit to vote, because they do fight—and hold Carrie Nation and Mrs. Pankhurst up to public scorn and reprobation! They have listened (with pleased surprise) to the novel truths, that the home is woman's kingdom, and the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world; while they have failed to see how this sovereignty over the home and the world unfits them for sharing in the control of the schools, where the inmate of the cradle goes at six years of age, they have carefuly concealed their perception of these flaws in masculine logic. All's well that ends well; we have forgotten who our adversaries were, and what they said, and are prepared to go to the polls with them next November as friends and fellow citizens. One cannot but wonder if these same arguments are used in all the states where the suffrage war is waging.

SUFFRAGE CAMPAIGNS IN OTHER STATES.

In the states of Oregon, Kansas, Wisconsin and Michigan amendments to their constitutions have passed the legislatures, granting the right of full suffrage to women, and will be submitted to the voters at the next general election.

According to press reports, the campaign in Kansas is being prosecuted with great vigor and wisdom. Mrs. Lucy B. Johnston, wife of the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Kansas is leading the forces. She said recently: "The extension of political freedom to the women of Kansas seems to move in quarter-century cycles. The first step was school suffrage, granted fifty years ago; the second, municipal suffrage, given twenty-five years ago, and the third step will be taken, we trust, at the general election next November." The slogan of the Kansas suffragist is, "We have faith, but we shall never forget that faith without works is dead." Mrs. Stubbs, wife of the governor, and many other leading women are assisting in the work, and all signs point to success. In Wisconsin, Michigan and Oregon, the fight is being pressed with equal energy; all three states are utilizing their own forces, and calling in distinguished speakers from without their borders to help in the good work.

OHIO'S VICTORY.

In Ohio, a most significant, and to many a most unexpected victory has been won. On March seventh, the Constitutional Convention in session at Columbus, by a vote of 76 to 34 (more than two to one) decided to submit an amendment to the voters of the state, giving the women the right of full suffrage. The Ohio suffragists have worked hard and well, and have shown much tact and good temper. They have been under the leadership of Mrs. Harriet Taylor Upton, a friend of Susan B. Anthony, and for a long time an officer in the National Suffrage Association. The amendment will go to the electors in July or August—so the question will be decided there first of all the states where amendments are pending.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN CHINA.

But it is in China that the most astonishing step toward the enfranchisement of women has been taken. Press despatches report that the Chinese National Parliament at Nanking, has granted to the women of China full suffrage, the law to take effect immediately; Yik Yuan Ying, a college graduate, has been elected a member of parliament from the province of Canton. According to this despatch, women voters will be subject to the same restrictions as men—that is, they must be twenty years of age, must pay taxes, and be able to read and write. This is certainly the most amazing of the many amazing things that have happened in China in the past few years. Time was when we accepted without question Kipling's prophecy of the fate of the man who tried to disturb the immemorial calm and repose of the East:

> "A tombstone white
> With the epitaph clear:—
> A man lies here
> Who tried to hustle the East."

But it looks now as though the East might take a hand in hustling the West. Those of us who were at the Edinburgh Conference will never forget when the Chinese delegates lifted their voices in behalf of a united Christian Church of China, and pleaded that the denominational differences of the West should not be repeated in the East. One brilliant young Chinaman declared with conviction, "The Oriental Christians take no interest in the doctrinal divisions of the Western churches—all they want is Christ." Some felt at that great hour that it might be the high calling of the church on the mission field to lead the older churches of the West into a fuller realization of their Lord's prayer for unity than they would ever attain by themselves.

And so, what China is doing today is not only for her own uplift and salvation, but she is helping to set a new pace for the social and religious progress of the world.

I. W. H.

Woman's Doings

—Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, suffragette lecturer, daughter of Mrs. Emmaline Pankhurst, sailed for home last week on the Mauretania, after a lecture tour in the Eastern states and Canada since January 11. She held a midnight reception in her stateroom, surrounded by a number of suffragettes, all wearing yellow sashes and all carrying satchels full of suffragette literature which they distributed to the passengers. Miss Pankhurst is taking several thousand dollars back to England, which she made during her lecture tour. The money will be devoted to suffragette work in London.

—Miss Emma M. Perkins has been appointed a member of the Board of Education in Cleveland, O. She is Professor of Latin in the College for Women of Western Reserve University.

—Miss Anna B. Hooper, daughter of Governor Hooper, of Tennessee, is said to be the youngest suffrage speaker in the world. She also has the distinction of having made the first equal suffrage speech ever delivered in the Tennessee State House.

—Mrs. Robert C. Wickliffe, wife of the representative from Louisiana, is said to be the originator of the idea of celebrating the birthday of Dolly Madison with a breakfast for the wives of democrats in Washington City. The celebration, as planned, is to take place May 20, and Mrs. Champ Clark, wife of the speaker of the house, has accepted the post of toastmistress. Other important women who have signified their intention to be present and help make the celebration a success, are: Mrs. Martin Littleton, of New York; Mrs. Gore, wife of the senator from Oklahoma; Mrs. William J. Bryan; Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, Mrs. Alton B. Parker, Mrs. Adlai Stevenson, Mrs. Underwood, Mrs. Harmon, Mrs. Thomas Marshall, of Indiana; Mrs. Foss, of Massachusetts; Mrs. Dix, of New York; Mrs. Norman E. Mack, and Mrs. Henry Watterson.

—Chicago has the distinction of furnishing the first woman recruit to the ranks of the civil and consulting engineers. This is Mrs. Mary E. Ewing, widow of the late William Bion Ewing, one of the most prominent engineers of the Middle West, who died last spring. Mrs. Ewing has taken up and is carrying to successful completion, work on various sewerage and water systems, costing approximately half a million dollars, which her husband had under way or in course of planning at the time of his death.

—Under the will of the late Susan Munroe of Fall River, Mass., her entire estate, valued at $100,000, will be placed in trust and the income used to provide for the care and support of her horse, Daisy. The animal is thirty-one years old and probably will not live long. After the mare's death, the money is to be divided by the testatrix' nephews and nieces.

Their Experience in Prison

The English Suffragettes Find It Hard.

One of the suffragettes who was sent to prison for smashing a $250 window, told a London correspondent of the New York Sun that the way of the suffrage transgressor was hard. "The journey to Holloway in the 'Black Maria' is enough to take the courage out of any one," she said. "You are placed in a narrow compartment, just large enough to squeeze into. Then you are locked in, and whatever air or light might creep in between the bars is shut out by the burly warder who stands in the passageway. The 'Black Maria' rumbles and shakes, and with darkness and a suffocating atmosphere, the journey is a nightmare.

"Arrived at Holloway, I was first taken to my cell. My bag, containing nightdress, comb, brush, and a few other needful articles, was kept by the warder. It happened to be a rush day on which I arrived, and it was nearly midnight before my case was attended to. When I was taken to the main hall, my money, jewelry, and knickknacks were taken from me, and the amounts and details entered in a book. Then my description was taken, as well as my name, age and my weight. After this, I was taken to my cell.

"The ordinary routine is to be awakened at from 6 to 6:30. Breakfast is served at from 7 to 7:30. It consists of what is with license called tea, and a small loaf of coarse bread and what is called butter. Then it was chapel from 8 to about 9, but we so overcrowded the chapel that instead of going every day, we went only two or three times a week.

"After chapel, we had an hour's exercise in one of the yards, then back to our cells. At noon dinner was served. This consisted of milk in a china mug, small potatoes steamed in their jackets—(they were usually bad)—cabbage and carrots, all served in greasy, dirty tins, and a hard boiled egg.

"Sometimes in the afternoon we had more exercise. At 5 o'clock we had supper, consisting of cocoa—horrible stuff with lumps of fat swimming around, and the familiar little loaf of bread and some more alleged butter. You observe that this is a vegetarian diet. Most of us are, I believe, vegetarians, but those who are not are advised by the prison doctor to become vegetarians during their imprisonment, as the meat diet is something too awful, I believe."

Another suffragette gives the following description of "solitary confinement":

"When you are put in the punishment cell, you feel as if you were absolutely cut off from the rest of the world; the echoes of footsteps along the stone corridors, the banging and locking of doors, become so magnified as to have a grewsome and horrible effect on your nerves.

"Hour after hour, day after day, I spent sitting on the wooden bed doing nothing, hardly thinking, staring into vacancy. I could well imagine the loneliness, silence, darkness, and cold sending women mad. The horror of it is still with me, and night after night, unable to sleep, I go through it all again.

"I tried walking about to obtain exercise, but the cell echoed so weirdly and horribly I was obliged to desist. Nothing is permitted that will take a prisoner out of herself. The solitary cell is longer and higher, though not so wide as the ordinary cell. The cell was so damp that any water spilled took days to dry. The cell is also bitterly cold, draughty and dark. Light shines in only on bright days and in the middle of the day."

A Chinese Bride

BY MISS MABEL DRURY.

Among the little boats anchored just outside the wall of our compound is that of Ah Fuh and his wife, Ah Sam. Every day they are at our service to go across the river, Ah Fuh, with his blue clothes, rowing and Ah Sam, with her brown outfit and green glass earrings at the other end of the sampan making the long oar go like a tail of a fish. When they are going against the tide, they do not go as fast as formerly, for they miss the help of Kam Shui, who used to help her mother make the big oar go; for Kam Shui, like every proper Chinese girl, has looked forward to her wedding day. Perhaps it would be far more proper to say that her parents have been the most eager for this time to come, as they are the ones to receive the wedding money.

Now the money has been paid, and she has gone to live in her husband's boat. Perhaps you would like to hear about some of the festivities.

It was with a great deal of pleasure that we received the invitation to come to the wedding boat on the night of the great event. Many times we had seen the boats on the outside and have enjoyed from a distance the music (?) issuing therefrom. So we were soon ready to take the little boat sent after us by the bride's people.

Out in the river we found the big wedding boat. It was a barn-like affair on the outside, but when we had entered the interior filled with the female relatives of the bride, we found many lamps hung from the ceiling and other signs of festivity. So closely did the curious people gather round us that for a time we could scarcely see the contents of the room. These resolved themselves into rows of straight-backed chairs down the two sides, a raised platform at one end on which the bride sat and a long table in the center.

The one bright color in the room was furnished by the bright red cover on the table, on which were placed the rice, candlesticks, and other things offered to the idols, which were to be seen on one end of the table—little images in glass cases. This was the third day that the idol worship had continued, preceding the coming of the bridegroom at midnight that night. For these three days the relatives had been together, feasting and pretending to weep with the bride. The male relatives were gathered together on a boat next to this one.

At the first glance the relatives seemed to be in their ordinary dress—dark brown and blue shaams and trousers, and their feet as usual were bare. Careful observation, however, revealed the presence of all the jewelry they possessed, rings and bracelets of all kinds, some of green jade and gold and silver. Some of the children, squirming around with their tiny braids tied with red string, wore silver anklets. The hair, fixed in an unusually elaborate style, had threads of gold and pearls.

It was an interesting group gathered around the bride in her blue shaam. One by one the girls were brought up to weep with her, which they did with much zest behind the handkerchiefs tied over their faces. One especially seemed to be a professional mourner.

We did not stay till the bridegroom came, partly because he might come any time before morning and, too, because we were afraid that when the idol worship was resumed at that time we might be a source of embarrassment. One of the women asked me if we worshiped Jesus that way.

We were told that just before the coming of the bridegroom, the bride would put on her wedding shaam of bright red. She seemed to be taking quite calmly the fact that she was to be the bride of a man whom she had never seen. One thing in her favor was that he had a boat of his own in which to live, so her mother-in-law would only be her next-door neighbor.

A day or two after the wedding, in recognition of the Chinese cakes and apparel which Mrs. Spore had sent as a wedding gift, the mother brought in to us on a tray a live chicken and other eatables. Far from being a real gift, this was immediately returned by a gift of money wrapped in bright red paper. When you receive a present in China, do not think for a minute that they are really giving you anything. You want to think twice also before you accept what seems to be offered so freely. Perhaps they have in mind to offer this same gift to a dozen people, all of whom understand they are of course not expected to accept it.

Perhaps these queer customs will go some day. Ah Fuh's queue has gone, and at least the back of his head looks more like a Westerner. The old China seems to be rapidly passing away these days.—Watchword.

Is it not extremely significant that the Woman's Club of Cincinnati, recently housed in a beautiful building costing $65,000, with a membership of nearly 700—made up of women of many and various faiths, and of some of no proclaimed belief—is making its winter program a consideration of the Bible as literature? The course opened with a lecture on this topic by Prof. Richard G. Moulton of the University of Chicago. The club conducts its work under four departments; education, literary, musical, and entertainment. It also has four Study Circles, in charge of gifted leaders, viz., Browning, Greek, Egyptian, Bible. These Circles provide in turn the program of successive years. One of our Eastern exchanges has been attracted by the movement, and remarks, "That a club so composed of women in high social life should give itself to a winter's study of the Bible indicates the new place the Book is coming to hold in the best thought of the age."

This is one of the most inspiring letters that has ever come to the office of the Foreign Society. It reached us February 15.

—Miss Elizabeth M. Hayward is the manager of one of the largest apples orchards in this country. The orchard is situated near Hancock, N. H., and is owned by Miss Hayward's father, who managed it himself until a few years ago, when because of his illness the work fell to his daughter. The farm comprises 1,000 acres and there are upward of 10,000 bearing trees in the orchard.

—Julia Ward Howe received $5 from the Atlantic Monthly for the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," and that was the only money she ever received for it.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Carterville church has numbered fifty-eight additions in a meeting being held by its pastor, R. O. Rogers.

Third Church, Danville, whose pastor is S. S. Jones, is in a revival meeting conducted by Roy L. Brown.

Berryville church will be ministered to once a month by A. R. Tucker, whose residence is at Noble.

Mt. Vernon congregation has extended a call to J. T. Pritchett of Metropolis, to succeed J. H. Stambaugh, now pastor at DeLand.

A decision has been rendered to decorate and re-furnish the church building at Clay City, where O. M. Eaton preaches.

O. W. Jennings will conclude his pastorate at Granite City on April 21. Mr. Jennings preached to the Knights Templars Commandery on Easter Sunday.

A three weeks' revival meeting was ended at Deer Creek by Evangelists Sword and Kay, in which there were seventeen additions, all by baptism.

A brief pastorate was closed at Hamilton by J. Ross Miller, who resigned to become pastor at Lagrange, Mo. During his pastorate there were fifteen additions to the church.

In the C. L. Organ meeting at Christopher, there had been nine additions at last report, with large congregations listening to the message and appeal of the evangelist.

W. E. Kern is pastor at Grayville, where there were seventeen additions by baptism from a union revival meeting.

First Church, Lincoln, of which George W. Wise is minister, is to co-operate with the other churches of the city in a union revival meeting in the opera house.

Edwin T. Cornelius has become pastor of the mission church, recently started at Freeport. He resigned his pastorate at Augusta for the purpose of taking the work in a larger city.

A two weeks' meeting was held at New Boston, under the leadership of L. F. DePoister. In addition to four confessions, there was an awakening produced throughout the entire church.

On the opening day of a meeting being held at Sandoval by J. E. Stout and son, there were two additions. This town is unique in having six churches, none of which has a regular pastor except the Catholic.

Gibson City church is beginning a series of Sunday evening services with vocational addresses for young people. The pastor, L. O. Lehman, is seeking to broaden the horizon and vision of young people making plans for their life's work.

Among other Illinois pastors who held services during Passion Week, was F. B. Thomas of Mattoon. Mr. Thomas preached a series of sermons during every evening of the week, related to the closing days of our Lord's life, and made his entire service devotionally appropriate to this period.

It is reported that the church at Taylorville is considering extending a call to Charles E. Varney, whose residence is in Michigan. Mr. Varney and his wife have been in the evangelistic field, but were formerly in pastoral work in Illinois. It is not learned whether the call has been considered favorably.

The revival meeting at Kankakee, conducted by E. A. Gilliland and J. K. O'Neal, was concluded with a total of sixty additions in three weeks. This meeting will easily rank among the best meetings ever held for Kankakee Church. The pastor here is W. O. Livingstone, whose ministry lasting over a period of about two years, is having fruitage both for the church and the kingdom of God.

Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, is to deliver two series of lectures in Illinois during the month of April. The first will be at Eureka under the auspices of the Ministerial Association of the college. The second series will be at Champaign, under the auspices of the Bondurant Lectureship Foundation. The latter series will be the second delivered this year at the state university, the first lectures being given by W. J. Lhamon of Springfield, Mo.

A heated Anti-saloon League campaign was waged at Pontiac. On a recent Sunday evening, B. W. Tate, pastor of the church of the Disciples, spoke to an audience which filled the church to overflowing. The occasion was the announcement of Mr. Tate's intention to answer an address delivered by a "Reverend" T. B. Wadleigh, who had spoken on "The Farce and Failure of Local Option." No doubt can be entertained as to the quality of reply delivered by the Christian minister.

At Carmi, where the pastorate is held by L. A. Chapman, a union men's prayer meeting is held on Monday evening of each week, with remarkable success. The meetings have been conducted for a period of three months and sometimes call together almost 200 men, with no meeting so far having less than 125. A similar meeting for women is being held in the afternoons, with an attendance and fervor quite the equal of that observed in the men's meetings. The church here is to be assisted in a revival meeting by F. O. Fannon, who resides at Dix, and high expectations are entertained for a large ingathering.

In the interest of co-operation among our various missionary organizations, the Illinois Christian Missionary Society has become associated with the American Christian Missionary Society for the period of one year. All offerings for state missions from Illinois churches will be sent to the office in Cincinnati, where a division will be made and fifty per cent. of the funds will be returned to the Illinois secretary for its disbursement to the various state missionary interests. This plan has been adopted by Missouri and several other states, with reports indicating its desirability.

The Survey, a journal of constructive philanthropy, of which Edward T. Devine is editor, and Graham Taylor and Jane Addams are associate editors, is being read by many Disciple ministers and intelligent laymen. This note is written to call attention to the issue of April 6th of this magazine, which contains a series of articles by Raymond Robins, which should be read by every minister in the brotherhood. Mr. Robins, it will be remembered, delivered a great, inspiring address at the brotherhood session of our National Convention at Topeka. A large company of men were captivated and thrilled with his social interpretation of the ministry of Jesus. He is a preacher, but not for more than a decade occupying regularly a conventional pulpit. He toils in the slums of Chicago, and makes his home there. Probably no man is more often invited to the pulpit than he, and no man presents a sounder message. During the campaign of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, Mr. Robins has been one of the foremost speakers. It is reported that no man has touched the Christian conscience and awakened living fires of religion more than he. The Survey prints a series of five of Mr. Robins' addresses delivered in this campaign. One on "Social Service and the Gospel" delivered to men in a theater; another, "Democracy in Industry, the Problem of Our Day," an address for all who work; another, "The Social Service in the Church's Gospel," to ministers; "The War on Poverty and Disease," to men at an evening meeting; and, "To Save the City, We Must Save the Child," an address for business men. The profound impression made by Mr. Robins in these addresses is illustrated with a picture of one of his evening audiences. It is not a flash-light, which could be taken instantaneously, but the product of a time-exposure, with the camera on the edge of the platform and the shutter open for sixty seconds. The clearness of the picture discloses how vise-like his auditors were held, and anyone who has ever heard Raymond Robins speak, knows how such an audience was not an exceptional one. The issue of The Survey in which these articles are printed can be obtained from the Western office, at 31 West Lake Street, Chicago, for twenty-five cents. Were the price four times as great, we would not hesitate to recommend the purchase of this journal even by the poorest minister in our ranks.

Secretary's Letter.

John H. Booth of Kansas City recently held a good meeting at McLean and did the church much good. And we are glad to note that the church has employed Bro. F. Lewis Starbuck of Eureka for half time. This is a splendid arrangement and we are confident our cause will prosper in McLean. Bro. Starbuck continues at Shirley half time.

T. A. Lindenmeyer has been called to the work at Bridgeport and is now on the ground.

Miss Mildred Seyster is Student Worker among the young ladies at the University of Illinois at Champaign, and Mr. Carl Colvin is our Student worker among the young men, both of them doing a fine work. They earnestly request the preachers to send them the names of all young ladies and gentlemen who are expecting to attend the University next year from your church or community, and state whether they are members of the Christian church. Do this at once, please. It is very important that they have these names and addresses soon as possible.

Hill and Knowles are in a good meeting at Mill Shoals with five added at last report. Bro. Knowles has an open date about June 1st.

F. B. Thomas of Mattoon held a good meeting at Toledo recently and he gave the church such a boost that they will employ a preacher soon, and go right up the hill to success.

A. O. Hargis of West Point is highly elated over the bright prospects of the church there. He has accepted a call to remain another year.

Guy B. Williamson of Waverly reports the church almost a Front Ranker. They will reach it soon. The union question is a live one there and things are working toward something definite in the near future. Watch Waverly and Williamson.

The church at Arcola has extended a call to Walter D. Rounds of Bloomington, Indiana, and he is now at work. Welcome, Bro. Rounds.

A. F. Norman writes that the New Boston church has attained eight points in the Front Rank Standard. L. F. DePoister of Keithsburg recently held them a short meeting with four added. A full board of officers was elected and the church is prospering.

O. M. Eaton is ready to hold a missionary meeting for some needy church. Address him at Clay City. Call him. It ought not to be hard to use our men when they offer to almost donate a meeting.

F. M. Branic reports seventeen added at Colchester, 15 baptisms, and 6 at Fandon. Both churches are striving for Front Rand.

E. T. Cornelius of Augusta has taken a work at Freeport and is now on the field, with a promising outlook.

Glad to welcome D. M. Durham back to Illinois after a short absence in Minnesota. He is located at Belmont and serves Belmont and Maud half time each.

J. E. Stout closed his meetings at Bridgeport with 103 additions, and is now at Sandoval.

Bro. Livingstone will hold a meeting at Mulberry Grove beginning April 14th.

Brethren of Illinois, kindly do your level best for the May offering for Home Missions, remembering that Illinois missions will share equally with the Home Missionary Society in this offering.

And if you have neglected the State offering take it at your earliest opportunity and send it to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, O. One-half will be returned to us the first of each month. Let us do all we can to make the joint offering plan a success.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.
W. D. Deweese, Office Sec'y.-Treasurer.
Bloomington, Ill.

Fourth District Forward Movement

A plan for a forward movement among the churches and Sunday-schools in the Fourth Illinois District is getting under headway that promises much for the Christian work in that District. There are about eighty churches and schools in the district, and the movement proposes to enlist each of them in some one or more of the many plans now known to improve the work. The twelve counties are divided as nearly as possible into two divisions of six each, with almost the same number of churches and schools in each. Half are called the Red and half the Blues. The schools are to report every Monday to the papers and to the contest secretary on the following points: On timers, attendance, Bibles, collection, church attendance. These reports will be added and the totals reported every week. Besides this general contest, every kind of work will be promoted. All of our Bible school evangelists will be aided in getting work in the churches of the district. Counties will contest each other as, LaSalle against Marshall and Putnam. Also cities against the villages as, Bloomington and Normal, with another nearby place or two, against the rest of the county. Towns against each other, as Long Point against Flanagan, and Iroquois against Donovan. Also local contests between classes, or between the men and boys against the women and girls; or choose up for a Red and Blue, or W. M. B. contest. Besides all these there may be rallies of all kinds for the good of the school. It is suggested that Sunday, April 28, being Men's Day, might be a kind of a preliminary rally day for many schools to get the habit, and every school is urged to have a Perfect Attendance Rally, Sunday, May 5th, at which time the contest begins to run for six months. No effort will be made to coerce any school into any kind of work except such as they wish to engage in, and no sort of uniformity will be tried except in the reports mentioned, and described above, and the fact of some kind of a forward movement for the good of the work. But it is proposed to be ready to help in starting any kind of work that any school desires to try. Evangelists wishing to have some part in the movement, should write to C. L. Depew, Jacksonville, Ill.; J. Fred Jones, Bloomington, Ill.; Osceola McNemar, ElPaso, Ill., or to me. The details of the plan will appear from time to time in all the papers. E. E. Hartley, Contest Secy.,
Flanagan, Ill.

Chicago

On the Monday after Easter the ministers' reported a total of 126 additions to Chicago Disciple churches for the preceding two weeks. Austin Hunter received 40 into Jackson Boulevard Church, C. C. Buckner 42 into Irving Park Church, E. S. Ames 22 into Hyde Park Church, O. F. Jordan 8 into Evanston Church, and other pastors other numbers. A number of churches observed Passion Week, among them Evanston, Hyde Park and Irving Park.

Jackson Boulevard Church is making effort to secure a pledged attendance of its membership for the month of May. The members are being canvassed systematically with this in view.

The Quarterly Assembly of Chicago Disciples will be held at First Methodist Church, Sunday, April 21, at 3 p. m. A program of extraordinary interest is announced on the general subject, "Building the Church." Ten minute addresses will be given as follows:

Building the Industrial Church, Rev. E. D. Salkeld.

Building the University church, Dr. E. S. Ames.

Building the Suburban church, Rev. O. F. Jordan.

Building the Negro church, Rev. G. C. Campbell.

Building the Down-town church, Rev. Austin Hunter.

These assemblies are popular and helpful always, and this promises to be exceptionally so.

Rev. J. Stuart Holden, rector of St. Paul's Church, London, who is making a tour of this country will speak in Chicago April 25, 26 and 27. He will speak under the auspices of the Moody Institute.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Makes the finest, lightest, best flavored biscuit, hot-breads, cake and pastry. Renders the food more digestible and wholesome.
ABSOLUTELY PURE
ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Minnesota News

The state convention will be held in St. Paul, June 3-5, 1912, and the program arranged by the Convention Committee challenges the attention of every Disciple in Minnesota. Several of our national secretaries will be in attendance and every effort will be made to solve Minnesota's vital problems. There are but forty-one active congregations in this state, and we need these conventions to give us inspiration. The appointment of the above convention at the capital insures a good attendance. It is hoped many will take advantage of this and combine business and pleasure in the Twin Cities with this means of spiritual refreshment and inspiration.

A number of victories are being reported to this office. Duluth, under the leadership of Ray Hunt, is hard at work erecting a magnificent new structure commensurate with the needs of that rapidly growing city. C. E. Burgess and A. J. Marshall are also doing a great work among the unchurched towns of upper Minnesota. The former just completed a meeting at Nevis with about twenty-five additions. The latter recently held a meeting and organized a congregation at Philbrook. This is not the first organization Brother Marshall has to his credit in upper Minnesota.

The four churches in Minneapolis regret the loss of John G. Slayter of Portland Ave., who goes to East Dallas, Tex.

Minnesota is fortunate in having a C. W. B. M. worker of rare ability. Miss Ada Forster, formerly minister at Fairmont, is a competent organizer under the direction of the State Board of C. W. B. M. She has been instrumental in raising their work in the state to a high degree of efficiency.

The writer is now touring the state in the interests of home missions, in each congregation taking pledges to be paid May 5. A spirit of liberal giving is permeating all the churches. Portland Ave., Minneapolis, becomes a living link, supporting its own missionary at the Minnehaha Church. Grand Ave. will reach $50. Fairmont pledged $23. Horicon $4.40. Howard Lake $15. Montrose $5. Litchfield $11.50. In each place more will follow as many pledges are yet to be received.

Minnesota Disciples, keep the convention constantly in mind. Come and let us carefully and prayerfully plan our campaign for Him.

Minneapolis. H. D. Kitson, Cor. Sec.

Church Life

W. F. Turner will begin work with the church at North Yakima, Wash., on May 1.

J. A. Beaton, of Beckley, W. Va., will take up his duties as pastor of First Church, Saginaw, Mich., about May 1.

J. A. Spencer, pastor, and P. A. Cox, county evangelist, recently held a meeting at Bloomfield, Ind., with sixty-five additions.

J. N. McConnell, who has been at Roseburg, Ore., for some years, has resigned his work and will move to Dodge City, Kan.

W. S. Lemmon is in a meeting at Kelso, Wash., with thirty-three additions at the last report. The pastor of the church is Claud Stevens.

The debt on the church at Butler, Ind., has been lowered $400 in the last year. Six additions at the service Sunday morning. John L. Imhof is the minister.

J. E. Parker, pastor of Bozeman, Mont., Church, recently organized a congregation at Belgrade, Mont.. with fifty members. A building will be secured and a pastor engaged.

J. L. Thompson reports that there were 947 in Sunday-school at First Church, Greeley, Colo., on April 7. They are in a contest with Colorado Springs and are endeavoring to secure an attendance of 1,001.

O. E. Tomes, pastor at Mishawaka, has recently received 130 new members into the church as a result of the revival meetings that have been in progress under the leadership of H. E. Wilhite.

E. N. Phillips wires us from Phoenix, Ariz.; Just began a great meeting here with W. L. Harris from Kansas. He is a prince among men and a power in the pulpit. Church packed tonight, Sunday, with many responding to the invitation.

B. E. Utz, state superintendent of missions for East Washington, preached the sermon at the installation service of J. E. Davis, the new minister at the Central Christian Church, Spokane. The service was held March 24.

J. H. McColley of Paxton, Mo., has accepted a call to Shelbyville, Mo., to begin about May 1. Mrs. McColley is a singer and Christian worker and is said to be quite competent to occupy the pulpit should occasion require.

President T. E. Cramblett, president of Bethany College, preached the dedicatory sermon at Elm Grove, W. Va., last Sunday. An evangelistic meeting was begun immediately after, conducted by Pres. Cramblett, with Mrs.Cramblett assisting in the singing. The pastor of the church is A. T. Cox.

R. L. Handley is holding a series of meetings at his home church at Kalamazoo, Mich., with Mr. and Mrs. Percy Kendall in charge of the music. The attendance is gratifying as the meeting starts off and the church will receive strength as the result of the effort.

George W. Watson, pastor of Central Church, Lima, O., recently read a paper on "The Challenge of the Church" before the Ministers' Union at Lima and was subsequently invited to read it before the Quarterly Conference of Central Ohio at the Methodist Church. The paper was enthusiastically received.

Louis S. Cupp has just completed his second year as chancellor of Christian University, Canton, Mo. He reports pledges for the two years amounting to $101,941. Including one pledge for $10,000, to be paid any time on demand, he has collected on the above pledges $91,019, in cash, leaving only $10,922 on outstanding pledges.

E. P. Wise, pastor at East Liverpool, O., has arranged for Z. T. Sweeney and Geo. L. Snively to assist in the dedication of the new $56,000 building that is to be dedicated on May 12. The building is Greek in architecture with two fine colonnades and a dome. Every provision has been made for the effective carrying on of modern Sunday-school work.

W. S. Bullard, pastor at Bluefield, W. Va., was the pastor at Texarkana, Tex., when the present splendid building was erected. He delivered the dedication sermon last Sunday, which event was made possible by the cancelling of the debt on the property. The mortgage of $4,000 was cancelled a short time ago by the efforts of C. S. Weaver, the present pastor.

Geo. L. Snively of Lewistown, Ill., has arranged to assist the following ministers with the ceremonies attending the dedication of their new church homes: Chas. M. Fillmore, Indianapolis, April 14; B. G. Reavis, Elsberry, Mo., April 21; Edmund Miller, Winnamac, Ind., May 5; Barton D. Wharton, Marshall, Mo., May 12; E. P. Wise, East Liverpool, O., May 19.

H. J. Kirchstein, pastor of the North Side Church in Omaha, Neb., is rejoicing in the new building that has just been dedicated. Secretary I. N. McCash, of Cincinnati, preached the dedicatory sermon. The church is in the form of a Greek cross and is provided with all modern means of doing the work of a church which recognizes its debt to the community. There is even a gymnasium for boys with shower baths. Mr. Kirchstein has been pastor since 1905.

Dr. H. B. Robison, dean of the Bible Department of Christian University, Canton, Mo., writes us: "You may be interested to know that in the last 100 days Christian University has received $83,000, $75,000 of which is for two dormitories, one for men and one for women, a gymnasium and a central heating and lighting plant. The buildings are under construction. Now we need a quarter of a million additional endowment."

W. Remfry Hunt writes that the China Mission anticipates the coming of the Travel Study Club with Dr. Willett's party with much inspiration. China is the new world problem and its molding is in the crucible of its first melted ones. The man who can come to China with a full orbed gospel of redemption that touches the social, intellectual, industrial, economic and political problems will push the kingdom of righteousness in China. The party will be royally welcome and will see China in the most interesting and vital stages of its new and wonderful renaissance.

On Friday, March 29, Grandma Todd celebrated her 102nd birthday at Eugene, Ore. A sumptuous dinner was served at noon, in the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. Mulkey, with whom Grandma Todd stays. T. G. Hendricks, president of the First National Bank, and his family; President E. C. Sanderson and wife; and many others were present to show their appreciation of the long life, deep devotion and splendid character of the guest of honor. May there be many more happy returns to her and to us.

The summary of the work of First Christian Church of Louisville, Ky., shows splendid attainments the past year. While preparing for the entrance into their new magnificent building, through the various societies and organizations within the church they raised and contributed to missions $9,471.62, and to current expenses, $14,479.28, making a total of $23,950.90. This is exclusive of individual gifts to foreign missions and educational institutions. It is believed that First Church will eclipse this high record this year. The officers, led by the pastor, E. L. Powell, are laying great plans for such a consummation.

The church at Vacaville, Calif., where Frank E. Boren ministers, recently received from the Methodists the vice-principal of the high school and his wife. In accordance with the practice of this congregation, these were received into the fellowship without rebaptism. Since coming to California, and before going to Vacaville, these Christian people had lived in a community where there was only one church, and that a Christian. Though they worked earnestly with the church, they were not received into fellowship. There being no church of their own in Vacaville, they were glad to avail themselves of the fellowship of a people earned by striving to practice Christianity. Mr. Boren begins his fourth year with this congregation next Sunday.

Ernest C. Mobley, pastor at Gainesville, Tex., and president of the next state convention, writes us: "Notwithstanding the financial depression throughout our great state, by reason of crop failures, our work has progressed this year with marked success. Brother J. C. Mason, our state secretary, will go to our convention, in Houston, in May, with one of the best reports ever made. The men on the firing line have been doing pioneer work and have rolled up splendid achievements. Not only has Texas advanced in evangelistic work but our educational interests have marched on with splendid strides. The apparent misfortune in the burning of the T. C. U. plant, at Waco, has proven a victory in disguise. The new Texas Christian University, located now at Fort Worth, is a prophecy of marvelous things for the great Southwest. No institution, perhaps, has more magnificent buildings than those just completed. Other similar buildings are soon to be erected. Dr. F. D. Kershner, with his wide experience and sane enthusiasm, is taking hold of the work with a positive grip. The Christian church in Texas is entering upon the greatest period of advancement in all of its long history."

A special committee of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America recently published a report on the labor conditions in the disturbed district at Muscatine, Ia. The report had several sections, one of which dealt with the admitted fact that the ministers had lost touch with the workers and labor leaders and recommended as the first step that ministers inform themselves more thoroughly as to the real sentiments entertained by the leaders. The report is really a sort of indictment of the methods used by the ministers, though it was prepared by men in every way favorably disposed to the cause of organized Christianity. Following is one paragraph: "Some of the ministers believe their loss of members to be due to the advice of socialist leaders, yet the ministers have not been personally in touch with these men. Whoever else in a community is confused or ignorant concerning the teachings of the socialists, certainly the ministry must keep itself informed concerning the teachings and character of all those who are attempting public leadership. The more dangerous they believe such leadership, the more imperative it is to be thoroughly acquainted with it. The ministers can increase the power of the church for leadership in Muscatine by discussing in their weekly meetings 'Occupational Diseases,' 'Night Work in Factories,' 'The Effects of Home Work,' and such other economic subjects as are closely related to the industries of the community. Mass meetings should be held under the auspices of the church, dealing with these and other questions of community welfare. Fraternal delegates ought to be exchanged with the trades and labor assembly."

J. A. Dillinger reports six additions on Easter Sunday at Barnard, Mo.

M. H. Garrard preached a series of sermons in Central Church, Detroit, Mich., recently, with twelve additions as a result.

J. W. Johnson, Lake City, Ia., reports six additions Easter by letter and $25 for benevolences. The work at Lake City is prospering.

L. L. Gladney has been called to the pastorate of the church at Plainview, Tex. Mr. Gladney was recently a Congregational minister and founded Central Plains College, since acquired by the Methodists.

The Michigan State Convention will meet at Kalamazoo, June 4 to 7. A fine program has been prepared with sections devoted to Sunday-school work and preceded by a Ministers' Conference.

Ada Hawley has entered upon her fourth year as pastor of the church at Glendora, Mich. It may be that the scarcity of ministers will be met by the entrance in large numbers of capable women as pastors of churches.

The state board of northern California has organized a plan for a dollar league for the assistance of churches which wish to build. It is hoped to secure 500 to 1,000 members of the league, each of whom will contribute $1 for each new church.

The dedication on March 31 of the church at Grinnell, Ia., marks the culmination of a really heroic effort. W. B. Wilson is the pastor and he is greatly rejoiced at the outlook. Seven months ago there were 35 members and no building. Now there are 152 members and a neat house worth $3,000.

J. H. Craig, pastor at Logansport, Ind., writes of the death in Logansport of Samuel Cotner, for whom Cotner University, at Bethany, Neb., was named. Mr. Cotner was a staunch friend to education in every way. His body was buried in Omaha.

Bruce Brown, pastor at Fullerton, Cal., has photographs of scriptural charts made on post cards, and uses them for his correspondence with good results. The card saves time and formality and the message on the card has a double chance at the correspondent.

About twenty-five members of the Disciples occupy seats in the House and Senate in the national capital. Speaker Champ Clark recently carried the Democratic primaries in Illinois by a great majority and it may be that we shall have a second Disciple president in November next.

Russell F. Thrapp is pleased with the outlook at Los Angeles and writes us under date of Apr. 8: Find here in the First Church an intelligent, enthusiastic, consecrated people. The field is of large proportions. Eighty-eight added at regular services first four months of my pastorate. The future looks bright.

A W. Crabb of Brazill, Ind., recently held a meeting at English, Ind., with 109 additions in the five weeks of the meeting. Otis Watson led one of the choruses and Mrs. Crabb led the other, and the music was highly satisfactory to the congregation and the community. The church at English wishes to recommend Mr. Crabb to any church needing an evangelist.

The pastors of the different churches at Alburquerque, N. M., are engaged in a campaign for the suppression of vice and have succeeded in calling upon them the open hostility of the Morning Journal and other agencies. But they are standing by their position fearlessly and their work is sure to have fruit, whether they shall be able to do all they wish or not.

Claire L. Waite continues to report gratifying progress at Central, Cincinnati. Our latest word, dated Apr. 7, says: For March 31 and April 7 there were a total of ten additions to Central Church, Cincinnati, nine of these being baptisms. Also a new Loyal Men's Class started with sixteen members the first Sunday. There has been a total of forty-three additions at Central since Jan. 1.

M. B. Ryan, of Calgary, Alberta, Canada, is superintendent of missions in that province and reports many growing churches in that new and rapidly developing country. In some places, as at Okotoka and Vermillion, the churches are composed of Baptists and Disciples. J. E. Tyner, a Baptist, is pastor at Vermillion of the "Church of Christ," which is composed about equally of Baptists and Disciples. The foundations of an empire are being laid in the Canadian Northwest, and it is to be hoped that, as they are taking lessons from the mistakes of America in so many fields of endeavor, they may also avoid the divisions that hinder our church life.

Walter Scott Priest, pastor at Wichita, Kan., writes us: Nine hundred ninety present at Sunday-school in the Central Church, Wichita, Mar. 31—305 in Mr. Musselman's Young Men's Class, 210 in Mrs. Schollenberger's Young Women's Class, 98 in Judge Haymaker's Brotherhood Class—the two former being the largest classes of their kind in Wichita, and the whole number being the largest ever assembled in the Sunday-school of Central Church. There were 636 present at the church service in the morning, when there were six additions—one on profession of faith and five by letter. The offering was $17 on current expenses and $65 on Dr. Jaggard's salary. With the present condition and the prospects for good, hard work, we are delighted.

Dean Sumner of the Cathedral of Saints Peter and Paul, Chicago, has recently announced that he will not allow the marriage ceremony to be performed unless the contracting parties are able to present a certificate from a reputable physician certifying that they are mentally and physically normal and that they are not suffering from an incurable or communicable disease. The action has been widely discussed and, naturally enough, differing views have been brought out. While all admit that such a regulation would be a desirable one if all the conditions were favorable for its carrying out. But the theory in operation in America has been that marriage should be made very easy in the interest of morality. It is felt by many authorities that it is too easy and that regulation in favor of more deliberation and care is indicated as the next step. Beyond question, one of the solutions to the complex problem of divorce lies in the making of marriage more deliberate and careful a matter.

Dr Price's CREAM BAKING POWDER
Improves the flavor and adds to the healthfulness of the food

American Sunday-school Notes

Our hearts have been gladdened this week by the receipt of two one hundred dollar gifts for the Moninger Memorial Fund. One comes from the First Church Sunday-school of Louisville and the other from the Englewood Sunday-school of Chicago. Both of these excellent schools will have their names enrolled upon the bronze tablet to be placed in the Memorial room. There ought to be a hundred others added soon.

The Front Rank statement for April 1 shows 233 schools enrolled in the campaign this year. One hundred of these are new schools. A letter will be mailed soon to all the Gold Seal schools of 1911 asking how well they have maintained the work and urging them to be ready to receive their new 1912 gold seals early in June.

It will be a pleasure to every one expecting to attend the Louisville Convention in October to learn that Will A. Brown, the Missionary Secretary of the International Sunday-school Association has promised to deliver the evening address of the Bible School sessions. Mr. Brown has never appeared before one of our conventions, but his reputation is already well established among Sunday-school people. He has been a star in all the Men and Religion Forward Movement meetings of the year. He will have a great message for us at Louisville.

The statement for the Sunday-school offerings for American Missions for the first six months of the year (October to April) shows $24,516.89 given by 1820 schools. The total for the twelve months last year was $22,237.41 from 2112 schools. The report for March, however, was not so encouraging. The total receipts were $556.43, a loss of $424.24 as compared with March of 1911. We must make up the deficit and more in April. There are four thousand schools that have sent no offering this year for the work in the home land that should be heard from at once. Use the first Sunday in May when the churches make their offerings and let us put the work of American Missions where it should be.

ROBT. M. HOPKINS,
American Sunday-school Superintendent.

Hiram College Notes

The spring term has opened with the largest first day enrollment in several years. Reports from the various departments of study indicate a most satisfactory increase also in the standard of work done by the students last term. These, with other facts, are highly encouraging to the faculty and trustees and is further justification of their judgment in making Hiram strictly a collegiate institution this year.

Professor Sadler, who recently returned from his year's leave of absence which he spent in Germany, has resumed his duties as head of the musical department. His attention at present is especially taken up with coaching the college vocal society for its engagement commencement week. The chorus presents this year "Patience," a musical comedy, and all indications evidence an equal if not greater success over that of previous years.

A Splendid Gain

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first ten days of April amount to $14,688, a gain of $4,978 over the corresponding time last year. Better weather brings increased returns!

The churches, as churches, gave $12,177, a gain of $3,902. This is certainly a splendid gain.

We ask the friends to remember the work constantly and aid it in every possible way. The work being done by the Foreign Society is large and many sided, with varied interests to conserve. Every friend of Foreign Missions must do all he can to push it forward to the greatest possible efficiency. We ask the churches to be prompt in forwarding their offerings at this time of great need. Send to F. M. Rains, Secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Foreign Society News

Last week a friend in Ohio sent the Foreign Society $1,200 on the Annuity Plan. This is his ninth gift and the aggregate of his gifts is $5,500. This is not all he expects to give. Of course he is pleased with the plan as are all others, without one exception, who have tried it.

A few days ago the Foreign Society received $500 from the estate of Amanda M. Shaffer, Marion, Ohio. This reminds us that every Disciple should remember the cause of Foreign Missions in his or her last will and testament.

At the last meeting of the Executive Committee of the Foreign Society W. H. Hobgood, who is graduating in the College of the Bible and Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., was appointed a missionary to Africa. He will go out about the middle of May in company with W. R. Holder of Birmingham, Ala. We rejoice over this valuable addition to the force on the Congo where it is so much needed. The church at Mayfield, Ky., will support Mr. Hobgood, and the churches in Birmingham, Ala., will provide the support of Mr. Holder.

George Darsie, Akron, Ohio, speaking of their March Offering, says: "Our offering is up to $1,475 and we are trying to make it $1,500." This does not include the Children's Day Offering. The Sunday-school supports a missionary by itself.

During the past eleven months Dr. W. N. Lemmon of the Philippine Islands reports 230 baptisms and over 15,000 patients treated, over 300 surgical operations performed, two new churches begun, one among the mountain people east of Laoag, one chapel remodeled, organized one Sunday-school, organized the Ilocos Norte native convention and bought two lots—a splendid work for one man in eleven months. He has just removed from Laoag to Manila.

More orders for Children's Day supplies have been received to date than for the same period in any year since the Day began. We are expecting at least $100,000 from the Bible Schools this year. The new pocket-coin-collectors are pleasing everyone and the Exercise "Darkness and Light" will provide a fine program for the schools. Begin your preparations early for this great day. More people attend this service than on any other Sunday during the year. Probably more than one million people witness the Children's Day exercises each year.

A. W. Fortune Called to the College of the Bible

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the College of the Bible held last Monday, President Crossfield recommended the election of A. W. Fortune, pastor of Walnut Hills Christian Church, Cincinnati, to a position on the faculty. The committee unanimously offered Mr. Fortune the chair New Testament Theology, made vacant one year ago by the resignation of Dr. W. C. Morro, and his acceptance has just reached President Crossfield. The authorities of the college are being very generally congratulated on securing such an able and widely known man for the position.

Mr. Fortune received his B. A. and M. A. degrees from Hiram College, and after spending some years in Rochester Theological Seminary, won his B. D. in Chicago University. He will receive his Ph. D. from Chicago within a few months. He is considered one of the foremost scholars among the Disciples and is widely known as a preacher of eloquence and magnetism. He is in constant demand as a convention and as an occasional speaker.

Mr. Fortune has been the minister of the Walnut Hills Christian Church in Cincinnati for five years, a congregation composed of many of the most wealthy and cultured families of that city. In addition to being universally beloved by his own congregation and the Disciples generally, perhaps no minister of any religious body in Cincinnati is more favorably known, or more sought after. His resignation of his present charge and his determination to move to Lexington came in the nature of a shock to the entire city.

It will be remembered by those who witnessed the Pageant in connection with "The World in Cincinnati" that Mr. Fortune took the part of David Livingstone in the second episode, and the judgment of capable critics was that no part was better done. He was also one of the moving spirits in securing "The World" for Cincinnati.

Mr. Fortune has been president of the Interdenominational Ministerial Association and the Ministerial Association of the Christian Churches of Cincinnati, and at present is a valued member of the Acting Board of the American Christian Missionary Society, in all of which positions he has acquitted himself with distinction.

Mr. and Mrs. Fortune and their two children will move to Lexington early in the summer, and he will assume his duties in the class room at the beginning of the next session, September 9.

Death of Joseph Franklin

The death of Joseph Franklin, son of Benjamin Franklin, has removed from the brotherhood one of the oldest and one of the most useful preachers among the Disciples of Christ.

He was one of eleven children and was himself the father of thirteen, three of whom were given to the work on the foreign field. Born in Middletown, Ind., seventy-eight years ago, it was in this state he spent most of his life. The three churches which he served longest and best were Lafayette, Anderson, and Bedford, spending a quarter of a century in the last two. Besides his work as a preacher he superintended the public schools of Anderson for some years in a most efficient manner, held the position of county superintendent for two years, and represented the Anderson district in the state legislature for two years. As a writer he was strong and lucid, and the life of Benjamin Franklin, his revered father is one of the well known biographical volumes among the literature of the Disciples.

Brother Franklin preached the sermon in a little meeting in Indiana, which brought our lamented G. L. Wharton to a decision for Christ, and finally for the foreign work. And on one of his furloughs from India, Brother Wharton in turn made the address which caused Josepha Franklin now of Jubblepore, India, to decide to give her life to the foreign field. Stella is still working in Hurda, and Mildred, formerly of the same station, is now the wife of Newton Bundy, one of our ministers.

Brother Franklin spent the last three years of his life with his daughter, Mrs. Grace Homan of Cleveland, and during that time made a large place for himself in the hearts of the Franklin Circle Church of which he was elected an honorary elder. The official board sent a representative to Anderson with the family, where the funeral services were conducted by A. L. Orcutt.

Cleveland, O. W. F. Rothenburger.
Franklin Circle Church.

Church Extension News

For the first six months of the current fiscal year the receipts have been $52,630.58, a gain of $28,731.80 over the same period last year. Number of contributing churches—1911, 468; 1912, 592; a gain of 124.

The gains in every department are most encouraging. The total receipts for first six months are within $7,437.82 of the entire receipts of last year, with our September offering still to be received.

There is over $942,000 in the fund April 1, which leaves $58,000 yet to get for the next six months, if we are to complete the million by the time of the national convention.

Read what preachers, evangelists, lawyers, doctors and business men say in the March-April issue of Business in Christianity about reaching the million.

Fifty-one churches have been helped in the erection of their buildings this year, which makes a total of 1,502 churches which have been helped by the Board of Church Extension since the beginning of the work. This shows that at least half of the churches organized by American and state missions, need help from the Church Extension Society.

Since our last report, Geo. F. Rand of Buffalo, N. Y., has paid $1,000 on his name fund, which is two years ahead of time; an annuity of $2,000 has been received from Kansas: $500 from a friend in Iowa, and $200 from a sister in West Virginia.

At the board meeting on April 2, loans were promised to the following churches: Orangeburg, S. C., $1,000; Gladstone, Ore., $1,500; Milwaukee, Wis. Second Church, $6,000; Moccasin, Mont., $400; Barberton, O., $3,000; Commerce, Tex., $3,500, 6 per cent; Sidney, Nebr., $800; Amity, Ore., $1,500; Lucien, Okla., $400; Battle Ground, Wash., Central Church, $1,000, and Watertown, S. D., $2,500.

Also the following increases were voted: Bartlesville, Okla., was increased from $8,000 to $10,000 from the annuity fund at 6 per cent; Clarkston, Wash., was increased from $3,500 to $4,000 and Mountain City, Tenn., from $1,500 to $2,000.

G. W. Muckley,
John H. Booth,
Secretaries.

The High Calling

(Continued from page 13.)

ably reach Burrton. Esther, Helen, and Louis sent many special messages and Paul was glad of an opportunity to see Walter in his school surroundings.

When he reached Burrton, it happened to be the date of the great boat race with the Brainerd Technology School. For several stations before the train reached Burrton, crowds came aboard for the college town. When Paul reached Burrton an immense and yelling mob filled the station and swarmed out to the racing course at the meadows, below the school grounds.

Walter was watching for his father, and in the excitement at the time, Paul did not note what he afterward could not help marking. When the two were finally seated on the great bank of seats at the end of the river course, just before the crews were given the signal to start, Paul thought to himself he had never seen Walter so nervous or so ill at ease. He attributed it all at first to the general excitement, but the more he looked at Walter and the more he watched his actions, the less he could account for them, even making allowance for all the unusual outbursts of hilarious feeling on the part of two great schools met in rivalry.

"I never thought about the date of the boat race, Walter, when I left home. I'll be glad to see it. I haven't seen a boat race since the Harvard-Yale contest in ninety-three."

"It's going to be a great race, father. We're sure to win, don't you think? Carlisle is a power. We can't lose, can we?"

"You know more about it than I do, of course."

"But they say Brainerd has a great crew. I don't believe they can beat us, though, do you?"

"I don't know a thing about it, Walter. Naturally, I'll yell for Burrton with you."

"We'll win, I think. Yes, I'm sure we will."

Walter grew more and more nervous as the time slipped away and the signal was hoisted up the river that in five minutes the race would be on. His father looked at him curiously, conscious that the boy was unduly excited over something more than the race.

But when the signal went up, Douglas was absorbed with all the rest of the howling, jumping, gesticulating crowd of undergraduates.

A gun went off up the river. The white smoke puff rose gracefully above the trees on the bank. The course was a straight-away three miles. Two thin black streaks side by side on the water began to move toward the red and green goal posts, and the great race was on. The minute the starting gun was fired, Paul saw Walter lean forward and put his face in his hands. He then lifted his head, put both hands on the rail of the seat in front of him, and gazed up the river with a look so intense that even the faces about him by contrast were calm. Paul found himself looking oftener at Walter than at the race. From where they sat it was impossible to tell which crew was in the lead. The black streaks up the river grew more distinct and another gun fired sent the news along the course that the first mile of the race had been covered, with Burton slightly in the lead.

CHAPTER II.

When the gun marked the second mile of the race there was not a quarter of a boat's length distance between Burrton and Brainerd, but Burrton was leading. By a system of flag signals, the spectators on the grandstand at the end of the course were informed of the relative situation of the two crews at every quarter mile. Both crews were apparently in good condition and rowing in splendid form. The last mile was always the hardest fought. As the boats began to enter the last quarter of this mile, the excitement rose to the highest pitch. First Burrton made a spurt that put them a boat's length ahead of their rivals. Then Brainerd responded to its coxswain's call and closed up the gap, gradually lapping its bow past the stern of the Burrton shell. Then Burrton drew away again for half a boat's length. Brainerd doggedly clung to that position for a short distance and then began slowly to fall behind, as the boats shot into the last eighth of the mile. Only a hundred yards now, and the race was won for Burrton. Pandemonium reigned on the seats at the goal post end of the course. Shouts of "Carlisle! Carlisle!" rose up through the din of megaphones and screech of whistles from the launches. Paul looked at Walter. The boy had risen, flung his hat up anywhere and was waving his arms like a maniac, screaming out the name of Carlisle, the crack stroke of Burrton. And then, without a second's warning, the big stroke, the hero of the Burrton crew, whose name was on a thousand tongues, suddenly bent forward and collapsed over his oar. The oar itself crashed into the line and the Burrton boat lurched over on the opposite side.

"Row on, row on!" screamed the Burrton coxswain. "Only ten yards to the green and red post!"

But Brainerd shot by grimly, her bow slipped past the crippled shell and across the line, a winner by more than a length, and the race was over.

For the first few seconds the Burrton crowd did not realize what had happened. The Burrton's shell swung up sideways to the referee's boat and the crew sat sullenly stooping over their oars. Carlisle lay in a huddled heap, a sorry spectacle for a school hero, while the coxswain scooped up handfuls of water and flung them over him.

Then a hubbub of questions rent the air.

"How did it happen?"

"Are we really beaten?"

"Did Brainerd foul?"

"Was Carlisle doped?"

"What was it? Half a length?"

"Ours by a fluke."

"Who was to blame?"

Added to all the rest, Paul was smitten with the torrent of profanity that burst from scores of Burrton men as the truth that they were beaten began to come forcibly home to them. Paul had lived long enough to know that the passion of gambling always rouses the worst exhibitions of human selfishness. But it was a new revelation to him to see these smartly dressed rich men's sons cursing God and profaning the name of Christ because they had bet heavily on their boat crew and lost. In the midst of all their oaths the name of Carlisle came in for heavy scoring. From the heights of the most extravagant hero-worship he had suddenly tumbled into this cesspool of profane unpopularity. All of which goes to prove any number of useful things, among them the necessity, if you are going to be stroke oar of a boat crew, it is best if you would retain your popularity to keep in training until the season is over, and even then it is not certain that you will always escape the other extreme of being overtrained.

But Paul's attention was speedily directed to Walter. The boy looked perfectly dazed as the final result of the race broke upon him. After two or three eager questions

The Best

The Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 are in The Life of Christ. You want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

The New Christian Century Co.,
700 E. 40th St.
CHICAGO

put wildly to those nearest him, he had sunk upon the seat, and when his father spoke to him he did not at first seem to hear. Then he roused up and slowly went down off the stand and walked along by his father like one going to execution.

It was a characteristic of Paul Douglas to go straight at a difficulty or a question and make a frank and honest attempt to clear away all mystery and trouble.

He saw plainly that some unusual thing was agitating Walter. The boy was under some great stress of feeling and could not conceal it.

So when the two were back in Walter's room, Paul at once began to seek the cause of the boy's trouble.

"What is the matter with you, Walter? You have not been yourself all day?"

Walter was very white, and what he said to his father's question was so inaudible that Paul could not understand it.

"What is the matter with you, Walter? Are you sick? Tell me," said his father sharply.

"I can't, father, I can't," Walter stammered and looked so wretched that his father said more gently:

"Don't be afraid of me. Speak out if you are in any trouble. I want to help you. Don't you know that, Walter?"

"Yes, but—"

"Has it anything to do with money matters? Tell me."

"Yes, I can't! Can't do it, father. I don't mean—"

And then Walter broke down completely. He laid his head down on his arms and cried hysterically. Paul sat looking at him sternly. For the first time that day an inkling of the truth began to dawn on him. At first it did not seem possible to him that his boy could do such a thing. It was so incredible to him at first that he sat silently eyeing the bowed head with an entirely new and bitter feeling.

When he finally spoke it was with a slow and steady measure of speech revealing great self-restraint.

"Did you bet o the race? Is that what's the matter?"

Walter lifted up his head and looked with a terrified face at his father.

"O father, don't be hard on me! I felt so sure we would win! I didn't see any risk! And all the fellows in Burrton bet on the race. A fellow isn't considered loyal to the school unless he bets something."

"How much did you lose?"

"I put up that last one hundred you sent me and fifty more"

"When do you have to pay?"

"I suppose at once. That's the rule."

"What other debts have you?"

Walter hesitated; then he said feebly, "I owe five weeks' board and some items at the men's furnishing"

"How much will it all come to?"

"I don't know."

"About how much?"

"About seventy-five dollars."

"When do you have to pay that?"

"There's no hurry. It can wait."

"Do you mean to say that a bet, a gambling debt, an obligation made on a dishonorable basis, takes precedence in time over honest claims for food and clothing?"

"It's the rule here in Burrton." said Walter sullenly. "If a bet is not settled at once the fellows lose their standing. The same is true at all the eastern schools. You have got to meet debts of honor promptly."

"Debts of dishonor, you mean."

"That isn't the standard here, father. The standard at Burrton is different from the one at home."

(To be continued.)

The Little Gold Piece

A Story for Boys and Girls.

I want to tell you a truly true story, something that really happened but it reads just like a story book story.

There is a sweet, young woman who is doing just what Jesus wants his people to do.

She is going about doing good. She goes to the homes of poor little children whose mothers must go away to work and leave them all day.

She reads to them, sings to them, she teaches the older children to care for the house and to sew a little.

She tells them how to take good care of the baby and have supper ready for the tired mother. One of these cold winter days she went to the home of a poor little baby who had been having pneumonia. It was so far and so cold the young woman thought how glad she would be to get in the house and get warm but when she got in, there was no fire and nothing to make a fire with. The mother was away and the poor little children were so cold and so lonesome they were all crying and the young woman was so tired and so cold she cried too. She did just what Jesus said we should do. "Weep with those who weep." But she did more. She did not just feel sorry and do nothing more about it as so many people do. She had no money except a little gold coin given to her by her mother. The mother told her not to spend it but to have it for a keepsake. But the cold house with the little baby in the bed covered with old clothes made her feel she must spend it. So the young woman walked to the nearest coal office and spent the gold coin for coal. The coalman was so busy and had so many big orders to fill he did not want to send the coal right away. But the young woman begged him to do it for the children. So he hurried it off and the young woman hurried after it back to the cold little house and the cold little children who soon were warm again. By and by the young woman went down town to get her supper for she lives all alone in one room with no place to cook her supper for herself.

There she found another young woman and to her friend she told the story. Then with thinking about it and talking about it and living it all over again, she had to cry some more and her friend cried with her and while they were crying together, in walked a very rich lady and wanted to know "what was the matter." So the poor little story all had to be told again and when they came to an understanding the rich lady found the poor family lived in one of her cottages. Now, the rich lady did not know much about poor people. She lived in a big house and she had traveled and she knew a great deal and she knew how to find the little gold piece of money.

She went home and telephoned to every bank in the town and told them to watch for the little gold piece.

By and by in its travels it got to a bank and the rich lady went down and redeemed it. Then she put it in a little box as if it were a jewel and sent it to the young woman.

She was so glad to get it again and was so surprised and I wonder if the little gold piece was not glad too.—Ellen Latham.

Subscribers Wants

Readers of the Christian Century find its columns valuable for advertising their wants or wares. The charge is one cent for each word, with a minimum of thirty cents for each insertion. Cash must accompany the order to save bookkeeping.

DO YOU NEED HYMN BOOKS for Church or Sunday-school? Write for prices, care of M, New Christian Century Co.

CHURCH CLERK: Do you need church letters? We furnish a well designed letter in blocks of fifty at 50 cents. Write us, care of X, New Christian Century Co.

MOTHERS' DAY Songs and Program. Chas. M. Fillmore, 1914 Commerce Ave.. Indianapolis, Ind.

MOTHERS:—Keep posted on Social Purity, Send 25c for a year's subscription to The Educator, Best Purity and Social News. Dept. C. National Home Educator, Maryville, Mo.

REMEMBER

CHILDREN'S DAY

For Foreign Missions

FIRST SUNDAY IN JUNE

SUPPLIES FREE

THE UNUSED CROSS.

ONE HALF THE WORLD IS BEYOND THE REACH OF ANY MESSENGER OF JESUS CHRIST.
AND I, IF I BE LIFTED UP FROM THE EARTH, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day Supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Bible Schools observing the day in the interest of Heathen Missions.

FREE SUPPLIES

1st. Coin Pocket Missionary Collectors. These are a great improvement on the missionary boxes formerly used. Attractive, convenient, suitable for old or young.

2d. Darkness and Light. The new Children's Day exercise by P. H. Duncan. Filled with beautiful songs, exercises, and recitations. Good for older pupils as well as little folks. Adapted to any school.

ORDER AT ONCE. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance. Write to

STEPHEN J. COREY,
Box 884. Cincinnati, Ohio.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

CENTRAL CHURCH

New York, 142 West 81st St. Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL

Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27

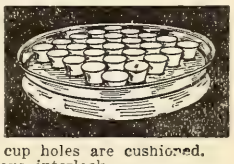
ESTABLISHED 1858

THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE INDIVIDUAL

"Noiseless"

CUSHIONED TRAYS

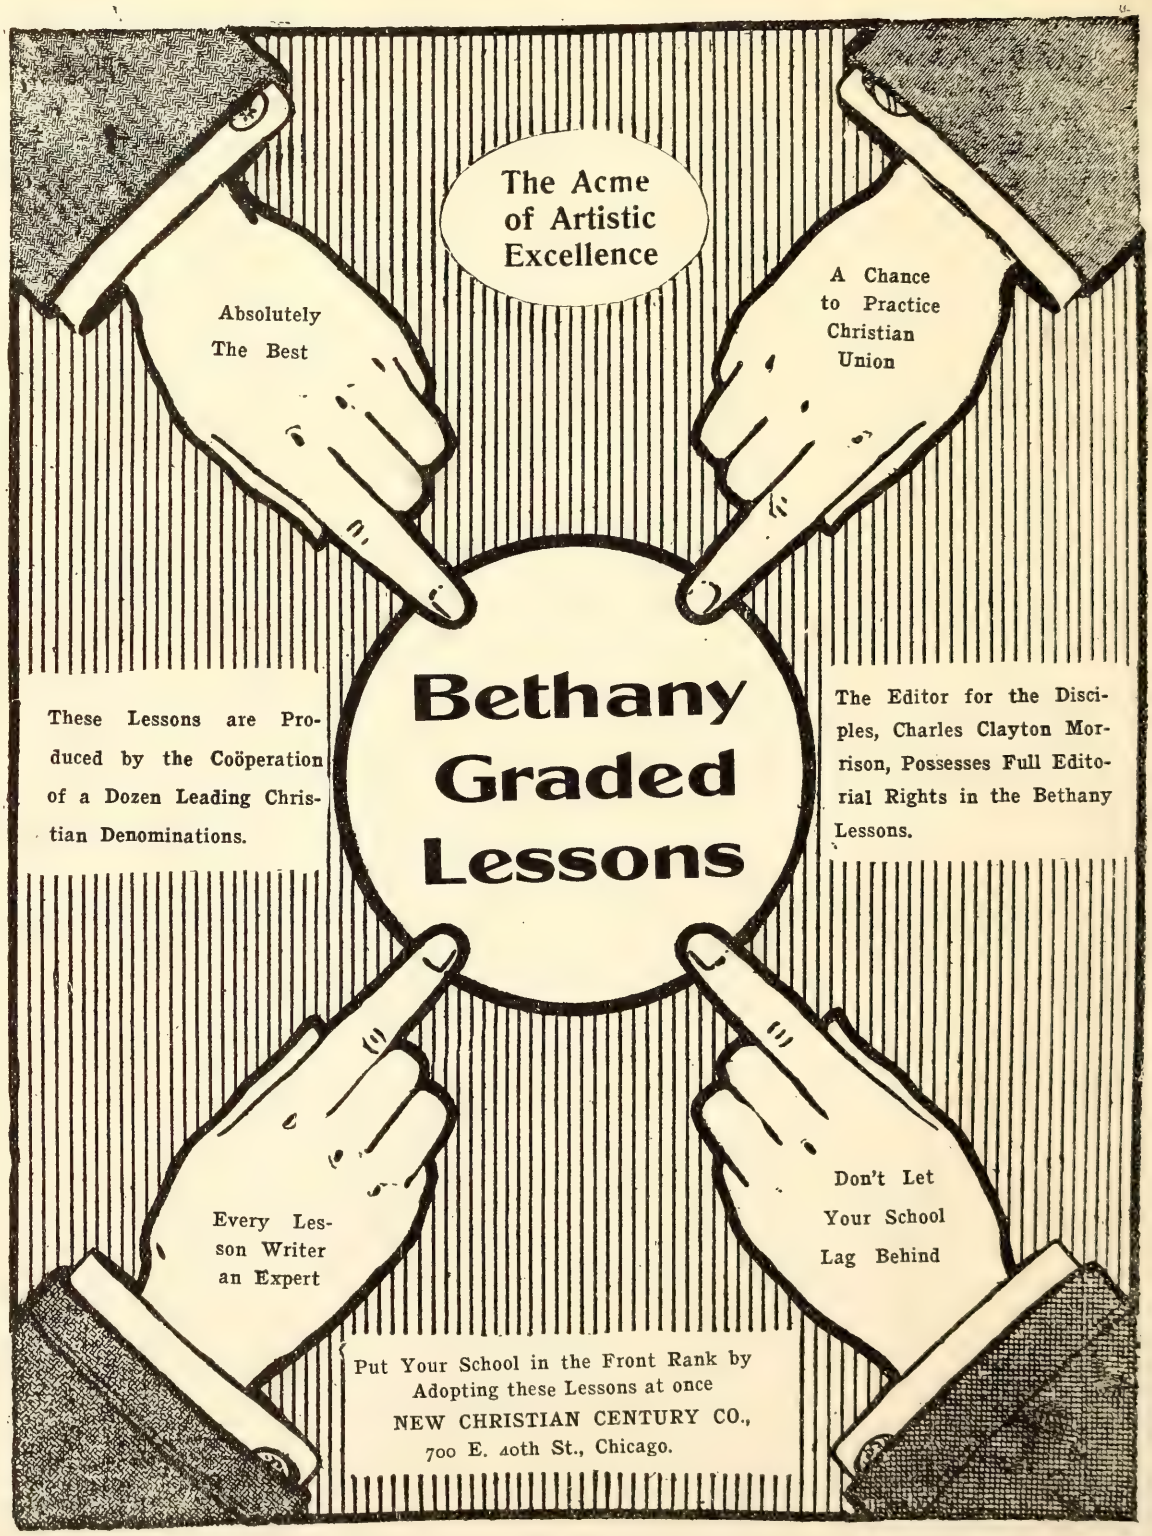


4 Different Features

WHY?

1st—"Noiseless"—As all cup holes are cushioned.
2nd—Dust-proof—The Trays interlock.
3rd—A short glass—no need of tipping back the head.
4th—Automatic Filler—Fills rapidly and evenly.
Does not mar the sacredness of the service.
Write for booklet. Outfit sent on trial.

DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
107 No. Dearborn St., Dept. T., Chicago.



The Acme of Artistic Excellence
Absolutely The Best
A Chance to Practice Christian Union
Bethany Graded Lessons
These Lessons are Produced by the Coöperation of a Dozen Leading Christian Denominations.
The Editor for the Disciples, Charles Clayton Morrison, Possesses Full Editorial Rights in the Bethany Lessons.
Every Lesson Writer an Expert
Don't Let Your School Lag Behind
Put Your School in the Front Rank by Adopting these Lessons at once
NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.,
700 E. 40th St., Chicago.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX April 25, 1912 Number 17

The Sinking of the Titanic

By George A. Campbell

The Kansas City Congress

By Orvis F. Jordan

The April Garden

By Ida Withers Harrison

CHICAGO

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER
AMES

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago

Great Premium Offer

in connection with

The Gospel of the Kingdom

BY JOSIAH STRONG

The Lessons in Social Christianity, published monthly by The New Christian Century Co., are now used by hundreds of classes throughout the country. The subscription price, 50 cents per year, brings them within the reach of all members of a class.

We believe the message they contain should be heard by every Bible, Adult Sunday School, or Y. M. C. A. Class, and Church Brotherhood in the country. To this end, and to repay somewhat the work of organizing classes, we offer

FREE

To Any Minister or Layman

who organizes a new class, or induces a class already organized, to take up these studies, and who secures
50 ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS OR OVER

One cloth-bound copy of The New

Encyclopedia of Social Reform

Edited by W. D. P. BLISS Price, $7.50

"A perfect mine of information."—Dr. ALBERT SHAW, Editor "Review of Reviews."

This is a great chance for you to get the most authoritative treasury of social facts and forces extant—and without costing you a cent. Remember The Gospel of the Kingdom is only 50 cents a year—it really does not cost so much as is usually paid for Sunday School quarterlies. And it comes fresh every month.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY COMPANY 700 East 40th Street, Chicago

The Christian Century

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The Sinking of the Titanic

THERE WAS "A BLESSING IN THE AIR" last Monday. All nature was bursting with life. It was easy to be good; and easy to believe. I walked into the country and enjoyed to the utmost the drama of Spring. How splendid was the setting, how eloquent the soul of it all! It was a time of emotion and poetry and religion. Wordsworth is the profound interpreter of Spring-time. Somewhere he says:

> "One moment now may give us more
> Than fifty years of reason;
> Our minds shall drink at every pore
> The spirit of the season."

It was a glorious walk I had. I did not follow beaten paths, but crossed meadows and passed through woods carpeted with many and varied flowers. A choir of birds chanted above and around me—an invisible choir mostly. I thought nature most good. I returned with praise in my heart.

That night I learned of the awful catastrophe of the Titanic. The waves and ice seemed heartlessly cruel upon that day which, with its sunshine, its birds and its flowers, so smiled on us of the inland town. That which kills and that which thrills with joy are phases of the same nature. The one has caused the world to stand aghast with sorrow; the other is creating a harvest to support millions of human lives, and in the process of harvest is filling the air with a blessing.

* * *

In my reading or thinking I find no clear logical word that lifts the mystery or clears the contradiction. I walk by faith and not by sight. The philosophies do not help me much. Brierly in his chapter on "Nature" has no illuminating word until he passes to human nature. Clarke leads his reader to mystery and leaves him there. Pragmatism exhorts us to act upon our most limited vision. Pragmatism walks by near-sight. That the world is in the process of completion does not lift the shadow. Without the Christ-idea we could but dimly guess that love is at the heart of things.

Man is but finite and perhaps must not too ambitiously try to measure the Infinite. "What is man that Thou are mindful of him?" cried the Psalmist. The best skill at the command of man was called forth in the building of the Titanic. The popular opinion of its passengers was that it was an unsinkable ship. But its first voyage was its last. Man's art came in contact with nature's gigantic forces and was naught.

We boast of our new inventions, and well we may, but after all, their power to overcome nature is but slight. We may emphasize the new unduly. The water, the law of gravitation, icebergs and all earth with its manifold phenomena are a few million years old. Man too is old—his fear of death and his love of life ever possessed him.

And no discovery to prolong his life to any considerable period has been made. We are told that twenty people die every second. During the three hours between the time the Titanic struck the iceberg and its sinking there died, according to the natural ongoing of things, 216,000 people. These are scattered all over the world. We did not hear their concentrated cries. But their passing caused grief enough to pierce the heart of the universe. The cutting of a finger and the sinking of the Titanic raise the same tremendous questions. The unusual character of the latter causes us to pause and reflect. We should train ourselves to see the significance of the usual as well as the unusual. God reveals himself more often by the former than by the latter.

* * *

It is when we come to the moral in man that we begin to see clearly as to the purposes and meaning of the universe. Man who sinks is greater than the sea that engulfs him. "Women first" was God, the eternal life, speaking through the captain and his officers. "The best traditions of the sea were followed," said the prime-minister of England. "The best traditions of the sea" are the expression of Christian civilization. They testify that man believes that there is something more precious than earthly life. A woman would not leave her husband. Love to her even amid great excitement was more than life. A man much berated by the public proved a hero. He had a spark of the eternal God in him still, yes more than a spark. The first law governing man we are told is that of self-preservation. The second we are told is that of race preservation. I wonder if in the spiritual world these do not blend into one which we might call the preservation of the spiritual universe. This universe would be made up of personalities who have developed their manhood in love, in a conscience void of offence, in robust harmony with God.

This is my faith. And so it matters but little as to the manner of passing out of life. Death is not death. The sea can claim its toll of bodies, but not of souls. Love, conscience, faith, fellowship and all the virtues of God's man are beyond the power of the waves.

* * *

Death is a great democrat. How he levels and humbles! The Titanic was a proud, aristocratic ship. She was speeding to make a record. Her elegant suites cost more for a single trip than most men make in five years. But death is no respector of persons.

Out of this disaster will come greater safety to the sea voyager. Suffering is the price the race has always paid for progress. Some sufferers have been victims of nature, some have been martyrs slain by their brethren. No regulations or precautions, however, can guard us from death. We shall escape death by death. Life without life everlasting is full of mockery, deception and purposeless pain. I believe: "—the third day he (Christ) arose from the dead; he ascended into heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. . . . I believe in the resurrection of the body and the life everlasting."

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Anti-Religious Tendencies in Socialism

Socialism is not necessarily opposed to Christianity. In fact many truly devout souls have found in socialism the more complete fulfilment of the ideals of Jesus. It is the more to be regretted that in some cities the socialist party has through its official machinery connected itself with the forces of the old-time materialistic infidelity. In Chicago is published by Rev. Mr. Carr, a former Methodist minister, a journal called the Christian Socialist. His journal has been the voice of the Christians of many churches who have adhered to the tenets of socialism.

Having incurred the enmity of the party bodies in Chicago, he was thrown out of the party by official action. Feeling aggrieved, his friends demanded a referendum in his behalf and representation of their point of view in the official organ, the Daily Socialist. This journal not only refused to print any statements in behalf of Dr. Carr but they also refused to sell advertising space to the friends of the persecuted preacher. Thus attacked by the party organ without chance of reply, the preacher-editor found himself rejected by a referendum where he had no chance to represent his case. Dr. Carr is still a socialist and declares his purpose to re-enter the party when its rules permit. He calls attention, however, to the fact that no material gain has been made in the party in Chicago in many years, owing to the hostile attitude of the propaganda to organized religion.

The Roman church is by its very constitution opposed to socialism, but not so protestantism. It is to be deeply regretted that we are not permitted to consider socialism as a problem in economics, and not as a movement to supersede family and church by the state. The former alone is true socialism.

The People Protest Boss Rule

The late vindication of Senator Lorimer and his aid, Mr. Hines, brought a sense of shock to the citizens the country over. The first chance to speak that has been given the people has been in the primaries. Senator Cullom, whose only offense in a long official career was his vote for Lorimer, went down to defeat in the Illinois primary. Colonel Roosevelt seemed to be hopelessly defeated but his hostility to Lorimer carried him to a greater victory in Illinois than his friends had ventured to claim. In Pennsylvania the situation involved the machine of Senator Penrose, but here too it cannot be doubted that the connection of the administration with Lorimer helped swell the majority of Roosevelt in the primary.

Appeals to the sacred name of Lincoln, distribution of patronage, the spreading of political buncombe, will not avail for one moment to stem the tide of rising popular indignation. Under our democracy our citizens through the new primary system have the remedy in their own hands. They may become sufficiently interested and sufficiently conscientious to put an end to the vocation of the professional politician. This were indeed a consummation devoutly to be wished.

Religion in Politics

William Jennings Bryan says, "To say that there is any inconsistency between being a member of the church and being active in politics would be a reflection upon either the church or politics. If church membership really impaired a citizen's usefulness, either in office or outside of office, it would be an unanswerable accusation to bring against the church. It would be a grave charge, too, to make against politics to say that political conditions are such that a church member is denied participation in politics either by conscience or by his fellows."

Religion must go into politics for the very reason that evil is there. It is of little use to pray for the kingdom and neglect the things that hinder its coming. Without the interest and support of Christians the state is no true democracy and lacks the very element which is the saving salt to free institutions.

All democracies have demonstrated the need of intelligent and conscientious citizenship. In the defeat of popular government in any country we find a reflection upon the quality of the manhood in that country. Christianity in a republic is charged with the sacred duty of furnishing the very raw material out of which republics are created, honest men.

Are we not obligated to teach in our Sunday-schools at times other civic problems than the abolishing of the saloon? Should not the church rear its young as well as instruct its adults in the big lessons of patriotic obligations? It is not enough to pass convention resolutions or to deliver Fourth of July sermons. The whole character-building machinery of the church should be employed in behalf of our patriotic ideals.

Christian Unity and Bigotry

The Lutherans of Brooklyn have refused to unite in recent union movements on the ground that they alone are the true church of Christ. It is of course exactly upon just this ground that Roman Catholics have refused any coöperation which involved the recognition of the Christian status of Protestants. High-church Episcopalians refuse to sit in general ministers' meetings lest they thereby acknowledge by any means that protestant ministers are valid ministers of Christ. There are denominations and individuals which would unchurch all Christians that were not immersed. The Holy Jumpers regard none as Christian save those who have had a certain type of emotional experience. Christian Scientists regard as aliens those who do not hold the metaphysical tenets of Mrs. Eddy.

How very clear, however, it must be that all talk of Christian union by those living in such a spirit, is indirection, not to say hypocrisy. It sounds like peace talk by those advocating large navy appropriations. It is not different from Napoleon conceiving universal peace through the victory of his troops. The first essential of union is tolerance and good will. Bigotry and union are logical opposites.

Democracy in the Church

Once the church shared the current conceptions of aristocratic organization of society. The medieval organization had deacons, priests, bishops, archbishops, cardinals and pope. Even the reformed churches carried over something of aristocracy in government. The pew rent system was one of the symbols of this ancient order. It is interesting to find the Congregationalist commending a movement in its communion for the abolition of the pew rent system. Still more interesting is the position taken by Dr. Manning, rector of the historic Trinity church of New York. He advocates making the pews of that aristocratic church open, that the last barrier between the church and the world may be removed. We have often wondered what the advocates of the pew rent system would do with the remarks of the radical apostle James upon the subject of church sittings.

There are other barriers, however, than those of organization and sittings. An exclusive and inhospitable spirit on the part of the church will find other means of expression. Until the church of today can receive Zaccheus and Magdalen without protest and with a real welcome, it still lives in the spirit of the club and not of the churches.

A Specious Plea Answered

Have you ever heard it said that if you give leisure and better wages to some men they will spend it in saloons and in loafing around? Raymond Robins, who worked when 19 years old, in the old South twelve hours a day for $1 a day in an unorganized mine, in The Survey gives a neat answer to this specious plea when he says: "And if you give more dividends to some men, their sons will buy automobiles and give them to chorus girls. But I am not going to judge either class by the vicious members of that class. In other words, honor and truth and well-meaning are not special privileges of any group."

He tells how he found in one of the drifts a place where the shoring was weak. He said to his foreman: "I think that is dangerous," and was told: "If you don't want to work, you can get out." "Then a man came into that mine," he says, "to talk about organized labor. I was interested. I started in to organize that mine. Finally the boss said to me that I had better get out of there, and I got. I went on a break beam to Colorado and got a job in a union mine. I worked eight hours a day, got $4 a day, and worked only six days in the week.

"Life changed for me. I had leisure; I had opportunity. I began to study at night. I bought books. Then the whole world changed for me, because of the change in my industrial conditions. Now, why? Just because I had a little piece of pasteboard in my pocket that said I was a member of the miners' union. Now, when I found a bit of weak shoring in a mine I went to my mine steward and told him. He went to the superintendent, and the superintendent took us away from the drift until it was fixed."

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

The Meaning of Apostolic Succession

It is well known that the Episcopal church in America stands in the fore-front of those churches that are pleading for Christian union. Among religious journals, the Churchman, from which we learn the meaning of apostolic succession as given below, has more to say on the subject of union than any other known to us. Rarely, if ever, a week passes that it does not have an illuminating contribution to this high theme. But, as among some other bodies the distinguishing doctrines are the apparently insuperable barriers to union. With Disciples it is immersion; with them apostolic succession. For those of us who have been trained in non-liturgical churches, and who know the minister rather than the priest, and the pulpit rather than the altar, the Episcopal basis of union will find but a feeble response in our hearts. The difference between Romanist and Protestant are marked by these same characteristics. As Sabatier says, altar and pulpit denote the separations between these two sections of Christianity. As the altar comes to the front the preacher recedes; as the preacher comes to the front the altar recedes. In Romanism and Episcopalianism alike the differences are those which grow out of the ministry of priest and preacher, and out of the altar and the pulpit. But that we may see in simple form what apostolic succession means, we give the following:

Because apostolic succession has meant priest, altar and sacrifice, means this today, and will ever mean this, we Churchmen will see that in any conference or congress which may be held to consider Faith and Order all that can be said for the truth of apostolic succession, as historical fact and as doctrine, shall be said, and until we are convinced that the course of the religious evolution of the race has been in a wrong direction, that Old and New Testament bear witness to non-essential facts, that our Lord's disciples mistook the Lord's teaching and set the Church on a wrong line of development, or at least until we are convinced that it is the Lord's will that we should surrender the trust we have received, we shall patiently, in all charity, with brotherly love, but with all determination, cling to what is inexpressibly dear and which we would, humanly speaking, lose if the Church ever gave up apostolic succession. The fact of our Lord's presence in the Holy Sacrament, God made man, the worshipping on earth in the Sacrament, with the unseen hosts, the Lamb slain to take away the sin of the world, the showing and pleading of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, the blessed Communion with the Lord Jesus Christ present in the Sacrament and, therefore, communion with our fellow-Christians and with all the saints, is what makes apostolic succession of any great importance and justifies the existence of this Episcopal church as a separate body of Christians.

Summer Conferences Expanding

The summer conferences next July and August expect greatly increased numbers growing out of the larger activity of men in religious affairs. To meet this new interest they are having difficulty in arranging programs. Few save workers attend these meetings, and these are women for the most part, but the semblance of rest and vacation is maintained. Classes are restricted to a few morning hours. How to get into these few hours social service, missions, Sunday-school work, Bible study, evangelism and some other lines is the problem before the conference program makers.

Northfield is to have again this year Rev. F. B. Meyer of London; Rev. Dr. C. H. Patton of the American Board; Mrs. Helen Montgomery of the Women's Jubilee Campaign; Robert E. Speer of the Presbyterian Board; and Dean Brown of Yale Divinity School. The dates of the General Conference are August 2 to 18, but much is again to be made this year of the Sunday-school workers' meetings, which are held July 20 to 27.

The Missionary Education Movement conferences will number seven this year, three of them being in Canada. The Blue Ridge, N. C., begins on June 25; the Silver Bay, Lake George, July 12; and the Lake Geneva, Wis., August 2. It is announced that into these meetings the new subjects of social service, community extension and evangelism will be put as far as time permits. At Silver Bay each year about 1,500 are trained, and much emphasis is placed upon personal work. The volunteer who is willing to give some spare time is urged to select definite tasks and prepare herself for them. Leadership is the topic oftenest suggested, it being stated that therein lies the greatest need.

Presbyterians are developing an educational system in behalf of both home and foreign mission work. They will have, under the leadership of their boards, five Summer meetings this year, beginning at Winona, Ind., on July 16, and ending at Pocono Pines, Pa., August 22 to 29. Between these dates they have conferences at Lebanon, Tenn.; Storm Lake, Iowa; and Hollister, Mo. Their aim is to raise up missionary leaders in Presbyterian churches. Their numbers are steadily increasing at each conference, while to the number of conferences one is added each year.

Chautauqua will much enlarge its spiritual work this year, beginning with the first week in July. The Hall of Christ will be utilized as the centre, and the director will be Prof. Shailer Matthews of Chicago. Chautauqua has always stood for religious propaganda, but during the last few years strictly educational subjects have developed greatly through large enrollments. This year will see the strengthening of the spiritual side, in part to meet the demands created by the Men and Religion and similar movements.

The Passing of Dr. Isaac K. Funk

The name of Dr. Funk has been a household word to preachers of every denomination in this country, and the news of his death will be received with sorrow everywhere. The following interesting facts of his life are gathered from the Presbyterian Banner.

He was born in Ohio in 1839, for sixteen years was a Lutheran pastor in Brooklyn, and then, together with his college classmate, A. W. Wagnalls, started a publishing house in New York which proved very successful. The firm published books for some well-known authors, such as Dr. Talmage, Edward Everett Hale, Joaquin Miller, "Josiah Allen's Wife," Canon Liddon and other notables. It has published a large number of homiletic and other books specially designed for ministers and probably no other publishing house has produced so many books of this class. A greater achievement was its Standard Dictionary, of which Dr. Funk himself was editor-in-chief, and it has just completed the new Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge in twelve volumes. The firm also started and still publishes "The Homiletic Review," and "The Literary Digest," which have been very successful and must be valuable literary properties. Some years ago Dr. Funk became interested in psychical phenomena and investigations and was a chief figure in this field. His book, "The Psychic Riddle," gives an account of his investigations. He believed that nine-tenths of the mediums were frauds, but that with these eliminated there remained phenomena that could not be explained on any basis but actual spirit manifestation. There can be no doubt of his honesty and sincerity and of the ability and care with which he conducted his investigations. But what convinced him can have little weight with others who have not had personal and direct knowledge of the alleged facts. Dr. Funk was an original and highly useful man, who filled out his long life with worthy service.

—A movement is on foot in England among Congregational ministers to induce those of their number who, in addition to their ministerial labors, find time to engage in the life insurance business or to sell real estate, to discard the use of the title "Reverend." It does not follow that one may not engage in these lines of business with as much conscientiousness as in the preaching of a sermon, so say the reformers. But in England, as in America, there lurks the fear that under that title many a dubious deal may be hidden. Every business and profession should stand on its own merits.

—The American Board (Congregational) is asking for seventy-three workers—pastors, evangelists and physicians—for its various fields. They add "a successful career in this country is the best recommendation for the work abroad." The United Presbyterians are certain to secure a million dollars for foreign missions this year.

—In a recent number of the Congregationalist, Governor Woodrow Wilson and William Jennings Bryan give clear and unqualified statements of the faith that is in them. Both are members and elders in the Presbyterian church. Woodrow Wilson is the son of a Presbyterian minister.

—Those who have been helped by the writings of Dr. A. J. Gordon will regret to learn that the Clarendon Street Baptist church of which he was pastor twenty-five years, was recently destroyed by fire.

—Professor Cornelius Woelfkin of the Rochester Theological Seminary has been called to the Fifth Avenue Baptist church, New York. The pulpit has been vacant since Dr. Charles F. Aked left it to go to California.

—The well known writer, Professor Francis G. Peabody, of Harvard University has tendered his resignation to take effect March 1, 1913. He has been in his present position since 1888.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN. ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

The Cry

Whenever there is silence around me,
By day or by night,
I am startled by the cry:
"Take me down from the Cross."
The first time I heard it,
I went out and searched,
Till I found a man in the throes of crucifixion,
And I said: "I will take you down."
And I tried to take the nails out of his feet.
But he said: "Let be;
For I cannot be taken down,
Till every man, every woman and every child
Come together to take me down."
And I said: "But I cannot bear your cry—What can I do?"
And he said: "Go about the world,
Telling everyone you meet:
'There is a Man on the Cross."

—Elizabeth Gibson Cheyne.

Our Country for Christ

We are asked this week to consider the American Christian Missionary Society: Its Organization and Work. It will be profitable for us to look at the reasons that were advanced by Mr. Campbell in favor of missionary organizations. When it was proposed that a convention be held, he wrote, "The general purposes of such a convention are already indicated by the general demand for a more efficient and scriptural organization—for a more general and efficient co-operation in the Bible cause, in the missionary cause, in the education cause.

"The public interests of the aggregate Christian community in every one nation, province or empire, as much require public agents, whether called evangelists, messengers, delegates, or classified under one all-comprehending designation and denomination—missionaries or 'messengers of the churches' as do private interests of every particular community require its own special and particular agents.

"These are points no longer debatable amongst us, or any Christian people known to me on the map of Christendom. We may aim at more simplicity, but we cannot dispense with the agents and agencies above enumerated, any more than we could dispense with books and school-masters in the great work of illuminating and civilizing mankind. To ask for a positive precept for everything in the details of duties growing out of the various and numerous agencies of the Christian church and the world, would be quite as irrational and unscriptural as to ask for an immutable wardrobe or a uniform standard of apparel for all persons and ages in the Christian church."

The first convention met in Cincinnati October 24, 1849. Of it Mr. Campbell wrote: "We met, not for the purpose of enacting ecclesiastical laws, nor to interfere with the true and scriptural independence of the churches, but to consult about the best ways for giving efficiency to our power, and to devise such methods of co-operation, in the great work of converting and sanctifying the world, as our combined counsels, under the guidance of Providence, might suggest and approve. There are some duties of the church, which a single congregation can not, by her unaided strength, discharge. For certain ends, two or three congregations often combine their means, and thus, by mutual co-operation, effect that which no one alone could have accomplished. Sometimes all the churches in a county, a district, or even a state, send up their messengers to consult about and co-operate in enterprises, benevolent and obligatory, which concern the common welfare and the extension and prosperity of the kingdom of Christ. But a broader and more general co-operation than all these may sometimes be demanded, and then a general convention may be called and a universal co-operation entered into. Such appeared to be the nature of the subjects which engaged the convention held in Cincinnati, and we were more than gratified to witness the large number of messengers in attendance."

The commercial enterprise has its trained men who study the field in which it operates and report on the possibilities of trade. Men who make money out of the weaknesses of human nature have their agents who give information concerning the weakened defenses of virtue and honesty. The disciples of Jesus fall far short of their privileges if they do not engage the services of men who shall take account of the Christian forces and of the places where these forces ought to be concentrated for offensive and defensive operations. We must not think of the managers and secretaries of our missionary society as men whose one business it is to get money from the churches. Their first business is to know the field and to give the rest of us exact information. Then it becomes our business to assist them, with money and prayer, to do the work of the kingdom. The president of a university, who had a reputation for raising money for his school, denied that he was entitled to that reputation. He had a great school under his care, he let men know what he was doing, and they gave the money needed.

It is the business of all who preach and teach in the church to know the field of Christian activity and to impart information to others. We like to know that our lives count for something. We are more anxious to be efficient than to be possessors of money. We all need to be shown how we can contribute toward the growth of the kingdom of Christ and how our missionary society can help us in the work of evangelizing the home field. It is essential to our highest usefulness that we be constantly engaged in gaining and giving knowledge concerning the evangelization of our own country. [Midweek Service, May 1. Num. 13: 1-20; Deut. 1: 8; Josh. 7: 2; Acts 1: 8.] S. J.

New Frontiers

In the story of early Christianity nothing is more interesting than the changes wrought in Christian teaching by the expansion of the church into new social circles. At first Christianity was almost entirely Jewish in its character and spirit. Then when through the preaching of Barnabas and Saul it expanded into Gentile territories, with its new capital at Antoich, important changes were produced in the current of its thought and activity. It was still the simple gospel of Jesus, his interpretation of the life of God and his program for humanity, but it was adjusted to new conditions because of the totally different nature of the people to whom it was now conveyed.

Similarly the later years of the first century, which beheld the expansion of the church into regions further west, witnessed also a corresponding growth in Christian doctrines and administration. The necessity of meeting heathen philosophy and Jewish perversions of the faith made necessary such new forms of teaching as had never been attempted by the earlier disciples. And when in the second century and succeeding generations the church found itself in the midst of political forces which increasingly reacted upon its life in the direction of Roman institutions, there was still further adjustment of the gospel to the needs of the time.

It is easy to say that these successive and almost imperceptible changes and adjustments were departures from the primitive faith. If by this it is meant that there arose gradual modifications of the Christian message to meet new conditions, and that these changes were heretical in their character, nothing could be further from the fact. Undoubtedly many influences tended to corrupt the simplicity that was toward Christ. But the steady current of Christian thought and feeling in the world was never heretical, though it was always changing. In fact, the further Christianity went out from its original home in Jerusalem the richer it grew in human interests and in perception of the divine purpose for humanity. And sadly enough, nothing is more significant in the story of Christianity than the suspicion with which the older churches, those at Jerusalem, Alexandria and Antioch, viewed the newer forms of Christian life. These mother churches always insisted that the only pure gospel was that which they had taught. But in this they were entirely in the wrong, for Christianity is not a static quantity but a dynamic spirit, and it constantly changes to meet the needs of its expanding circles of adherents. The older church must always keep its heart open to the truth which the younger churches have discovered. In this way alone does Christianity continually reinterpret its message and spirit to the world. The reflex influence of the youngest centers of Christian activity upon the oldest is always in the interest of a more vital faith and effort.

It is this fact which slowly makes itself felt in the story of Christian missions. There is at first the rather naive conviction on the part of those who send forth missionaries into the Orient that the churches thus established will be simply new editions of those at home. Nothing else is contemplated. And particularly is it the belief of the supporters of missionary work that the denominational doctrines and usages maintained by the home churches must prevail on the mission field, or else the missionaries and their converts shall be viewed as unfaithful to the institution that has sent them forth. For a time this condition doubtless prevails in the work of the missionary and in the organization of the mission churches. There is sincere and earnest loyalty to the denomination which has made possible the particular efforts. There is no desire to make any alteration in the teaching or practice of the missionary institutions planted on oriental soil.

But presently every missionary is confronted by the fact that the churches at home are at times concerned with questions which have very little significance in mission lands. The conscience of the Occident is sensitive to many doctrinal and ritualistic forms which have no meaning or value in the life of a community whose dominant interests are of a different order. The missionary in India or China cannot long fail to see that distinctions that separate one denomination from another in America or Europe are less than of no value in the thought and practice of the men and women he is instructing in the essentials of Christian faith. Insensibly therefore he puts his emphasis upon matters of greater moment, and these matters must be determined by his own best judgment of religious values. As far as possible he will wish to conform in all regards to the conviction of the people by whom he is supported. But he also knows that he and his companions on the mission field are far better prepared to judge regarding these religious values than those who are working in the familiar and customary activities of the occidental church.

For the mission churches are those in whose experience the new problems of the faith are confronted and the new decisions reached. The Spirit of God is moving in their life as in that of the home churches in the days of their best activity. The missionary churches are reaching new frontiers of truth and experience, and are prepared to teach the mother churches something of the expanding life of the gospel. Already the home churches know that the most authoritative voice to which they can listen is that of the missionary who returns to tell of his work and his people in the mission field. No bishop, priest or council has so convincing and compelling a voice as the man who has actually interpreted for the first time the message of Jesus to a group of impressionable and uninstructed orientals. From him the churches will receive suggestions they would take from no convention, journal or movement in the home land.

This impressive fact bears witness to the higher responsibility of the missionaries to the churches at home as leaders and pioneers, and also to the fact that the missionary churches will never be mere repetitions of the organizations in Europe and America, but will possess a vitality and vision all their own, whose influence upon the older churches should be the most informing and inspiring. Insofar as both missionaries and pastors of the supporting churches realize this fact, will the kingdom of God grow in power and clearness of insight. Insofar as the churches of the home field insist on giving direction to the mission churches and their leaders, thereby imposing upon them the bonds of denominational doctrine and of occidental practice, will the mission churches either be held in the leading strings of a less vital and clear-sighted constituency or unfortunately compelled to assert their independence and face for themselves the vital problems which emerge in their experience. Happy is the people that perceives the prophetic values of its missionary work, and is willing to view with calmness and confidence those advances in the direction of higher ideals to which the mission churches and the missionaries themselves are constantly pointing.

The Kansas City Congress

It is not saying too much to affirm with emphasis that the thirteenth annual Congress of the Disciples of Christ, which was held last week in Kansas City, was the best of the list. It is perhaps natural that this statement should be made regarding any successful gathering of any sort; but there are numbers of reasons why it is particularly applicable to the Kansas City meeting.

The sessions were held at the Linwood Boulevard Christian Church. This is one of the most attractive church structures in Kansas City or elsewhere in the brotherhood. Its architectural proportions are pleasing and adequate, its decoration is tasteful, and its equipment is characteristic of a large and aggressive congregation. Its loyalty to Dr. B. A. Jenkins its pastor, is evident and delightful. The congregations are such as to fill the building to its capacity, and Dr. Jenkins' reputation as a preacher is on the lips of all his people and the community.

The attendance at the Congress, while not large as compared with the annual conventions of the Disciples, was much larger than last year, and was fairly representative of the brotherhood of Missouri and neighborhood states. Not until the Congress has a definite and continued membership will the attendance reach a satisfactory number. Those denominations that have had experience with congress management depend in no small degree upon a consistent and urgent organization to keep up the interest and secure a representative attendance at gatherings of this character. Yet the history of the Congress of Disciples is most satisfactory in this regard. And though one missed a number of men whom he would expect to find at such a gathering, the number of those present was a demonstration of the interest felt in the themes to be considered.

* * *

The addresses were on the whole the best that have ever been presented at a meeting of the Disciples. That of Dr. Bitting of St. Louis on Wednesday morning was an unanswerable presentation of the character and desirability of a representative convention, not only for the Baptists but for any similar body of people. The papers by Professors Norton and Martin of Drake, the former on "The Problem of Christian Union in the Light of New Testament Study," and the latter on the theme "Is Christian Union Possible in the Light of History, Psychology, and Logic?", showed a scholarly accuracy combined with scientific courage that put the Congress under obligation to men who were interested to bring to a popular gathering the precise and painstaking methods of the laboratory. The papers by John Ray Ewers of Pittsburg and Thomas W. Grafton of Kansas City on "The Principles of Scientific Management Applied to Church Work" were suggestive and practical. The paper by Dr. Jenkins on "The Relation of New Testament Study to the Problem of Christian Union" was thoroughly characteristic of the author's classic, yet half humorous style of public address. The presentation of "The Social Task of the Church" by Professor Batten of the Baptist Social Service Commission, of Des Moines, gave evidence of his careful research in the field of practical Christian activity. Professor Jefferson's admirable paper on "Christian Union in the Light of History, Psychology and Logic" was clear, weighty and convincing. But easily the most finished and impressive paper of the Congress was that of Charles Clayton Morrison on "The Essential Plea of the Disciples in the Light of their Origin and Aim." This paper our readers have in their hands in the successive numbers of The Christian Century. But the charm, urgency, and inspiration of its presentation to the Congress only the audience of Thursday afternoon could appreciate. Dr. Garrison's fine and spirited review which challenged the thesis but accorded ample right of testimony to those who accepted what seemed at first a radical view of Disciple history and obligation, brought to its close a splendid series of papers and discussions.

Little criticism could be passed upon the management of the Congress in any regard. President Sharpe, L. J. Marshall and the other members of the executive committee planned the sessions with careful regard to a continuous and increasing interest. And with but one exception the papers were presented as promised. There was perhaps too little time for discussion at the conclusion of some of the readings. Notably was this true on Thursday afternoon, when there was both desire and need for a longer session to consider the highly important questions which Mr. Morrison's paper raised. But it is not always possible to foresee the needs of conferences of this character. And, by and large, the discussions were adequate and stimulating. Notable was the spirit of candor and open-mindedness which was manifested in all of the speeches. Not once was there a note of personality or temper. Differences of view were presented with great frankness and force, but without the slightest approach to acrimony. No one would expect such manifestations of an unholy spirit in a conference of brethren committed to the highest interests of the kingdom of God. Yet not always have the gatherings of the Disciples of Christ escaped the emergence of ungracious personalities. It may be hoped that days of that sort are gone forever.

* * *

As in all gatherings of the Disciples the personal give-and-take of conversation in the lobbies of the Congress was delightful. It is here that friendships are renewed and sentiment created. It is here too that men talk in a more frank and free manner than in the more formal and observed utterances of the platform or floor of the Congress. It could not fail to impress those who were present at Kansas City that the Disciples of Christ are rapidly gaining freedom of speech upon questions which have been hitherto kept in the seclusion of a few minds or spoken in whispers among friends. Among these the problem of our relation to the Christian world about us is being considered with a frankness and conviction that would have been astonishing ten years ago. More than this, critical pronouncements regarding the literature and value of the Holy Scriptures, such as would have precipitated confusion and dismay a decade since, are now accepted with calmness and confidence by such gatherings as the one held last week. This is not to affirm that all are of one mind, or that there are not earnest defenders of what may be called older and conservative views. It only means that with the broad-mindedness of which Dr. T. P. Haley was so notable an example, the best men in the brotherhood, if not quite sure of their holdings, are at least confident that the free discussion of fresh questions of interest is the best manner of arriving at the truth.

The sentiment that the Congress has reached a point where some simple form of continued organization is advisable was voiced in the appointment of a committee to prepare such an instrument. The report of this committee was adopted without dissent. It provides for a continuous membership with an annual fee of $2.00, a supporting membership with contributions of $5.00 or more annually, the publication of the Congress proceedings in an annual volume to be issued to all members, the location of the Congress, as far as possible in cities near the center of the brotherhood, and coöperation as in the past both with lectureships and institutes of our own in the accessible states, but also with similar congresses among the Baptists and other denominations with whom joint sessions may be arranged.

The entertainment of the Congress was delightful. The members were provided for in the homes of the Linwood Boulevard Church and some of the other churches of the city, on the Harvard plan. Lunches and suppers were served at the church, and the good fellowship thus made possible went far to increase the pleasure of the gathering. The next Congress is to be held at the Union Avenue Church in St. Louis. Rev. B. A. Abbott, the pastor of that church, is the president of the next Congress, and Professor A. W. Taylor of Columbia, Mo., secretary. H. L. W.

The Essential Plea of the Disciples

In the Light of Their Origin and Aim

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

This is the second installment of a paper read at the Disciples' Congress in Kansas City last week. The first installment was printed in The Christian Century of April 18. Next week's issue will contain the concluding portion.

VI. A Departure From First Principles

The feeling of oneness with all the people of God which gave the primary impulse to the Disciples' movement and which gave it its characteristic significance was displaced by other feelings at the time the Brush Run church, led by Alexander Campbell, adopted a basis of membership narrower than the basis of membership in the Church of Christ. From that point onward their catholic sense of unity with all Christians shrank into sectarian proportions.

It will be the aim of the remainder of this paper to justify this thesis by the facts of history.

The Declaration and Address was a charter of fundamental principles. It did not attempt to make an application of these principles to specific problems. But the followers of Thomas Campbell who were organizing themselves into the Christian Association had immediately to face their problems in the concrete. Their Declaration was a plea to others. They must now prove their plea by their practice. In earnest terms they had disavowed organizing another party. They desired and evidently intended to remain in fellowship with existing churches while maintaining the Christian Association as an interdenominational movement. To this end Thomas Campbell made application to the Presbyterian Synod of Pittsburgh for admittance of himself and the Christian Association. His application was denied. The reasons for the denial were set forth in a statement that made a deliberate and pointed attack upon the Christian Association. Gradually it became clear that there was no place for the Association or its members in the denominational order and they reluctantly resolved upon the formation of an independent church. The Brush Run church was the embodiment of the spirit and principles of the Declaration and Address; it was a concrete attempt to translate the ideals of that great plea into terms of practice. Forced by the inhospitality of other Christian bodies to take this pioneer step, they entered upon it nevertheless with a wondrous sense of freedom and joy. Thomas Campbell had suffered from the narrow sectarian exclusiveness of the Seceder church. All his troubles had been due to his desire to open his church with its fellowship and ministries to all believers. He now found indescribable satisfaction in a church whose comprehensive and universally valid basis of membership denied admittance to no child of God. His followers set about their task with the eloquent words of the youthful Alexander Campbell ringing in their souls. In his reply to the Pittsburgh Synod's strictures formulated against the Christian Association the rising leader had said:

"That standards have been lifted up which narrowed the gates of Zion, so that only a few of a certain height and breadth could have admission and there were none of them but would reject those whom God has not rejected, and deny admission to those whom God had admitted. All are defective. The apostle Paul, the angel Gabriel in human form, could not be admitted on the principles of these standards. We have decided, therefore, to lift it [the New Testament] up as a standard for the Church, to open the gates of admission into the Church as wide as the gates of heaven."

Non-denominational Purpose.

These Brush Run members were not organizing a new party, they declared. They were not another denomination competing with the rest. Of marks distinguishing them as a denomination they had none. Their basis of fellowship was not denominational. Any soul whom God would receive into heaven they would receive into their fellowship. No human creed, no human device, no human interpretation of the Scripture was made a test. The terms of admittance to their communion were equivalent to the terms of salvation—faith in the Savior, Jesus Christ; a profession of faith; and an obedient life under his authority. They felt that in making the basis of church membership identical with these simple terms of salvation they were on primitive ground, on New Testament ground. But not only so; they were also on common ground, non-sectarian ground, and they felt that they could not justly be taunted with having organized another sect in the interest of Christian unity. They could rightly be called a sect or party only if their basis of fellowship was narrower than Christ's fellowship, narrower, that is to say, than the living Church of Christ.

"I cannot join a religious party," said Alexander Campbell a year later, "because no party will receive into communion all whom God would receive into heaven." He accepted the axiom of the Declaration and Address that those whom God had received ought to receive one another.

Thus the Brush Run church acquitted itself of responsibility for participation in the denominational order by completely abandoning the things that were denominational. In constituting themselves thus a church of Christ they made no such monstrous assumption as that they were the only church of Christ. They simply determined to be only a church of Christ. Other churches were churches of Christ plus many human names and creeds and devices. With this "plus", this fungus growth upon the Body of Christ, they determined to have nothing to do. But with the great Stalk itself they would have everything to do because it was to that and to that alone they determined to belong. They yearned for fellowship with all members of Christ's Body and deplored denominationalism because it kept the members of Christ's Body apart. They felt that they were solving the problem of Christian unity, that they were potentially in the fellowship of all Christians of whatever creed or party. They knew that not themselves but others were responsible for whatever barriers kept them apart, for they had flung down all bars except the simple conditions of acceptance with Christ. They continued to live in this atmosphere of catholicity and unity until the subject of baptism divided their little flock.

The Emergence of the Baptism Question.

For the three years following the publication of the Declaration it was assumed more or less tacitly that any divergent views of baptism should be treated with Christian forbearance. Infant baptism was practiced, but it was regarded by Thomas Campbell and was so described by him before the Pittsburgh Synod as a rite not authorized by the word of God and therefore a matter of indifference. The principle of "mutual concession" dwelt upon at great length in the latter part of the Declaration was invoked to suppress any controversy over baptism. Thomas Campbell immersed three persons shortly after the first communion service held by the new congregation.

With the birth of Alexander Campbell's first child the question of infant baptism was brought home to him in a very personal way. He deferred the baptism of his child until he could make a thorough examination of the Scripture on the subject. He came forth from his prolonged study with the conviction not only that infant baptism was without warrant in Scripture but that he himself had never been baptized. The story of the administration of the rite in Buffalo Creek, by a Baptist minister, to Alexander Campbell and wife, Thomas Campbell and wife and daughter and two other persons, is familiar to all. The effect upon the Brush Run congregation of this act of their leaders was immediate. On a succeeding Sunday thirteen others were immersed, and afterward others, until a majority of the members were immersed believers. Those who were not immersed withdrew and the church unanimously adopted immersion as a condition of membership.

"An Entirely New Phase."

The significance of this step by the Brush Run church cannot be exaggerated. Dr. Richardson says that "it gave to the reformatory movement an entirely new phase." He pictures graphically the inhibitions which the elder Campbell had to overcome in following his son into the baptismal water. Thomas Campbell now sees the "the road which had at first seemed to him so broad that all religious parties could walk therein together gradually diminish into a narrow path." He saw that the adoption of the policy of immersionist exclusiveness "would at once erect an impassable barrier between him and the pedo-baptist community in which he had labored, and frustrate all his hopes of winning it over to his views of Christian union."

It is manifest from Dr. Richardson's account that the influence of Alexander's decision to be immersed was quite as strong upon his father as was any argument from Scripture. Not only does the son become the master-spirit in the eyes of the church and outsiders but his leadership is now recognized by Thomas Campbell himself. Apologizing for what he calls the "well-meant efforts" of the elder Campbell, Dr. Richardson says:

> "It was difficult for him to advance beyond the general principles laid down in the Declaration and Address to the unforeseen results which those principles involved. Had it not been for Alexander Campbell's contribution to the movement at this juncture it is probable that the mild and gentle overtures of Thomas Campbell would have been disregarded [by the Christian world] in the future, as they had been thus far in the past, and that the little band which had rallied round the standard of peace, would have been, after a time, dispersed or blended with the existing parties."

Pathos and Irony of This Step.

I regard Dr. Richardson's hypothetical prediction as no more unfounded than his apology for Thomas Campbell is gratuitous. His comparative estimate of the two Campbells enables him to point out without the slightest quiver of emotion that "at Brush Run, as it had been with the Haldanean church in Edinburgh, immersion, apt emblem of separation from the world, occasioned a separation among those who had previously united in religious fellowship." These words are followed in the very next sentence by the statement: "On the whole, then, it will be seen that a very great progress has been made"!

That the very first attempt to apply the principles of the Declaration and Address should result in further division and that this division should be regarded as a forward step of progress indicates that the basic feeling of unity with all believers which had prompted the writing of the Declaration and Address had been supplanted by other feelings. With the adoption of the program of immersionist exclusiveness even Thomas Acheson, whose name, jointly with Thomas Campbell's, was subscribed to the Declaration and Address at its first publication was among those alienated from the movement. The pathos of it, the irony of it, its ominous augury for the future seem to have entirely escaped the mind of Alexander Campbell's biographer.

A Lapse From First Principles.

The fact is, and it can hardly be disputed by any one who will face the full content of the Declaration and Address, that the Brush Run church in adopting the policy of immersionist exclusiveness lapsed back that far into sectarianism.

Their lapse consisted not in the practice of immersion, but in the adoption of a basis of membership narrower than the living Church of Christ, which necessarily barred the large majority of those to whom their plea was addressed, and whose working was dramatically illustrated in the actual excision of a considerable company of those who had hitherto walked with them.

In his enthusiasm for his new discovery concerning baptism, Alexander Campbell forgot his fine speech about "opening the gates of the church as wide as the gates of heaven;" for the first act of the church after a majority had been immersed was to adopt a basis of membership that not only narrowed the gates so that multitudes who were going to heaven could not gain admittance, but would have shut out Thomas Campbell himself had such a test been made at the time he wrote the Declaration and Address. The baptism discovery bulked large in Alexander Campbell's mind. The argument for immersion stood out before his eye in clear and vivid outline on the pages of the New Testament. In the Architect's drawings of the primitive church no lines were more unmistakable than those which pictured the baptismal act as immersion. Immersion-baptism, therefore, became the symbol, the crux, of their program of restoring the New Testament model. It gathered into itself virtually the whole meaning of the primitive Church.

VII. Union with the Baptists

How significant a place immersion held in the mind of the Brush Run church is indicated by their union with the Baptists. This union was based upon agreement in this single point of immersion. There were many inhibitions that had to be overcome. The Baptist creed was virtually the same as the Presbyterian. The Baptist name was no less objectionable than Presbyterian, Seceder or Methodist. The Baptist Associations exercised ecclesiatical functions which the Campbells regarded as no less unscriptural than those of presbytery and episcopate. Added to these was the hardly concealed contempt which Alexander Campbell felt for the Baptist ministers of his acquaintance, whose crudeness, illiteracy and parrot-like theology, his Scotch Presbyterian culture could endure only because he found their laity congenial and truly hungry for the deeper things of the word of God. All these inhibitions were overcome by the one fact of agreement as to the ordinance of baptism, and the Brush Run church became a Baptist church.

This union was a pronounced relapse of the Disciples from their "it may be seriously doubted whether the Brush Run church acted consistently" in uniting with the Baptists. To my mind there can be no serious doubt either from the standpoint of their own ideals or their good faith with the Baptists. The fact that in their petition for admittance they had stipulated that they were to be left free to proclaim the principles for which they had been contending, did not ethically justify them in accepting the protection and vantage-ground of the Baptist denomination. There was no real union. There was agreement on immersion. But there was disunion in ideals and purposes and spirit. The Disciples did not exhibit the temper of unity. Their attitude was one of hostility to the whole order of denominationalism including the Baptist church no less than others. They were reformers. Their twenty years of unabsorbed identity with the Baptist church was a historic misfortune. Their becoming Baptists in the first place drew a clean line of separation between themselves and pedo-baptist bodies. And their final separation from the Baptists in heat and bitterness turned their Baptist friends and natural allies into harshest enemies. They were thus put in the position of Athanasius against the world. The natural avenues of intercourse and sympathy with both the pedo-baptist and Baptist world were choked with controversy and prejudice Their plea for unity became an argument for their own right to separate existence. Their pacificatory office amid Christendom's misunderstandings was sacrificed to the exigencies of self defense. From that day until very recent years the Disciples have had to measure the success of their enterprise in sheer terms of their own denominational progress.

Catholic Conception Abandoned.

But their union with the Baptists was a misfortune for still another reason. It prevented their reaching a solution of a problem which, because it was not settled then and there, has been carried down the hundred years of Disciple history to vex and embarrass us. This is the problem of the relation of the exclusive practice of immersion to the practice of Christian union. In the mind of Thomas Campbell as revealed in the Declaration and Address, Christian union, reduced to its simplest and lowest terms, consisted in all churches of Christ receiving those whom Christ receives. This was his axiom. It was no scheme of comity, or federation which he proposed. Least of all was it a scheme of sectarian absorption. He proposed an abandonment of the whole system of denominationalism and a thorough reorganizing and fraternizing of all Christians upon the simple basis of the Church of Christ. On such a basis no church of Christ may deny admittance to any Christian without thereby declaring itself sectarian. But in the grip of their conviction that immersion only is baptism the Brush Run church let go this catholic conception. Their union with the Baptists made it natural to adopt the Baptist procedure, which was frankly a sectarian procedure. None but immersed believers may be received into fellowship. Even a Christian, one whom Christ has received, one who is already a member of the Church of Christ, is subjected to a further test before he is admitted—he must be baptized by immersion. The fact that he is already in the Church of Christ makes no difference. He cannot enter this Baptist Church of Christ without immersion.

The Heresy of Close Membership.

It was natural, therefore, to adopt the close membership of the Baptists when once they had adopted immersion. Immersion was to the popular mind the distinguishing Baptist symbol. Becoming an immersionist was equivalent to becoming a Baptist. With the push of this assumption behind them it was easy to fall into the conventional Baptist procedure. But in the principles of the Declaration and Address another solution was implicit. And had these principles been held to, and trusted, this solution would have emerged. The Brush Run church under the guidance of the masterly leadership of the younger Campbell seized upon one of the substantive norms of the Declaration and ignored the other. It seized upon the duty of conformity to the New Testament Church of Christ and ignored the duty of practicing unity with those who were now in the Church of Christ. As a result it fell into a practice thoroughly repugnant to the New Testament. The primitive New Testament Church as contemplated by the Declaration and Address was not a mere primitive fact, a dead fact stranded on the shores of the apostolic age. It was a living fact, a present fact, existing underneath the abuses of sectarianism, throbbing with the indwelling of the same Holy Spirit who had given life to the body from the beginning. All whom God receives to salvation are members of this catholic Church. Because God receives them they ought to receive one another. This was the fundamental teaching upon which the Disciples' enterprise of Christian unity rested, and it was part and parcel of the practice of the Brush Run church until the baptism question appeared. With the decision of the baptism question in favor of immersion the heresy of close membership was introduced. No one seemed to see how full justice could be done both to the New Testament Church and the living Church. Therefore the living Church was ignored. As Alexander Campbell and his followers conceived it the New Testament clearly commanded them to be immersed and to practice immersion only. But it did not occur to them that the New Testament gave them not an iota of authority for adopting the Baptist practice of closed membership against members of the Church of Christ who had not been immersed. Had they not united with the Baptists this discrimination between the practice of immersion and the practice of sectarian membership would inevitably have been disclosed to them by their own immanent principles.

Non-denominational Character Forfeited.

Had the Brush Run church planted its feet squarely upon first principles, the principles of its own great charter, and said to the Baptists, We cannot wear your sectarian name, we cannot subscribe to your sectarian creed, we cannot submit to your sectarian ecclesiasticism, we cannot use your sectarian devices and inventions, we cannot tolerate your sectarian communion, we cannot practice your sectarian terms of fellowship—they would have put themselves in the most strategic position in Christendom for promoting the cause of Christian unity.

But with the adoption of the Baptist practice their plea for unity suffered a sectarian twist, and their message was radically altered. The appeal to Christ's divided people to return to the simple New Testament basis of fellowship which all alike possessed, became an argument to accept a particular New Testament basis of fellowship which they alone possessed. The plaintive note of the Declaration and Address was soon lost in the dogmatic thunders of debate. They had a special interpretation of the Scripture to exploit, a creed of their own the imposition of which upon other Christians as a prerequisite to fellowship made the gate into their church narrower than the gate of heaven. Their clear title to an undenominational character was thus forfeited. In the terms of Alexander Campbell's own definition they became a religious "party" because they "would not receive into their fellowship all whom God would receive into heaven."

(Concluded next week.)

Editorial Table Talk

A Mis-Cue to Young Men

That was not a very heartening word spoken by Senator Cullom of Illinois to the young men of America, when on the day after his defeat for renomination he gave out an interview advising young men to avoid politics for the reason that "in politics one will become either a pauper or a thief." Senator Cullom's long term of public service has not been tainted with any dishonesty. His defeat was due solely to his misjudgment in voting on the wrong side of the Lorimer case. He has not been a particularly brilliant statesman, has opened few pathways to larger public well-being, but he has rendered faithful service in the routine processes of legislation. He enjoys the respect of his fellow-citizens and his confreres in the senate. For fifty-nine years political honors have been bestowed upon him by the people.

To hear him now frankly measuring his career by the money standard is not reassuring, even though it does call attention to his own personal honesty. To advise young men to choose some other calling than the public service for the sake of material fortune betrays a lack of appreciation of the truly great rewards of his own career. A disinterested public servant is not shut up to the alternatives of pauper or thief. He may measure his life in terms of manhood, in terms of fidelity to his highest ideals and faithfulness in serving the public weal. It is this standard that, in this materialistic age, needs the support of every man who holds the public attention, and Senator Cullom lost a good chance to contribute to this idealistic conception of life when he set up personal fortune as a motive for avoiding a political career.

"Orthodoxy in the Civil Courts" Again

A. C. Smither, the new manager of the Christian Evangelist, has improved his first chance to show himself safe and orthodox by advising the minority of 65 in the Berkeley, Calif., church to sue the majority of 185 for possession of the church property. The majority voted to practice Christian union with all members of the Church of Christ. The minority disapproved of practicing union with any Christians except those who had been immersed. In an open letter printed in the Christian Evangelist and addressed to a member of the minority party, Mr. Smither says: "The courts have always decided that the body which remained loyal to the tenets of the religious communion with which that body was affiliated was entitled to the property."

The Berkeley church will, no doubt, welcome such a test. Its educational value would be immeasurable. It would instruct the world in the Disciples' principles. It would also acquaint the Disciples themselves with a certain ancient and venerable document known as the "Declaration and Address," the centennial of whose publication date was celebrated by forty thousand people at Pittsburg in 1909. Certain facts of that early history also would become familiar to the Disciples. Moreover, if the appeal were made directly to the New Testament itself instead of the New Testament

"as interpreted by that great body of Christians known as Disciples of Christ," (to use Mr. Smither's unfamiliar, not to say sectarian, expression), it would be interesting indeed to observe an attorney or witness trying to find chapter and verse in God's word for withholding fellowship from any soul whom Christ has received into his Church! That would be worth going across the continent to see.

It is rather unfortunate, however, that in support of his bumptious and divisive counsel Mr. Smither could find a precedent of no more prepossessing aspect than the cantankerous minority of Cumberland Presbyterians which refused to practice Christian union with their Presbyterian brethren. It is devoutly to be hoped that Disciples, even reactionary Disciples, have not reached the point where they feel any sort of affinity for that execrable kind of sectarianism.

An Old Society With a New Ideal

The American Society is appealing passionately these days for the churches to make worthy offerings on the first Sunday in May for mission work in the home land. Secretaries McCash and Lewis are calling attention to a set of facts that would stagger the church if they did not challenge its faith and heroism. American missions is much less an enterprise of denominational extension than in former days. It is coming to be an enterprise of interdenominational coöperation. It is not merely an attempt to build more churches, important though this task is, but an attempt to beat back the wave of un-American sentiment that is rushing into our land through immigration from Europe and Asia. It is the Church of Christ at work constructing a Christian social order. The social movement so consciously emerging in modern times is embodied in the plans of American Missions. There can be no doubt that the Home Societies of all the denominations are adopting the social standard for judging their work rather than the denominational standard. The Disciples are waking up to their responsibilities in the great cities like Chicago and New York, and while their appropriations for work in the cities is as yet modest and painfully inadequate, the satisfactory results are bound to stimulate increased liberality for the future. Every pastor and church worker who feels the thrill of the new day upon which our churches are entering will find the American Society, as administered and interpreted by its present leaders, a direct channel through which to work for the newer ideals. The collection on May 5 should be by far the greatest in the Society's history.

A Human Document of Rare Interest

The remarkable story of a still more remarkable life, written by C. C. Smith, is attracting enthusiastic comment from the best judges of both literature and life among the Disciples. Here comes Professor A. W. Taylor, of Missouri Bible College, to add his word of appreciation to the book recently put out by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Professor Taylor says: "C. C. Smith's 'Life of Jacob Kenoly' is a human document of rare interest. Here is a colored man that reached the heights of purpose unsurpassed and showed an originality of design in his life mission that ought to sweep away mountains of doubt about the potentialities of the black peoples. He was ebony black, a typical negro, born in the woods, self-made, original, and not at all precocious. In other words he was made of average stuff so far as advantages and genius are concerned, and but for his schooling in the Southern Christian Institute might have spent his life as a hotel porter or a carpenter or at some other task that is assigned to brawny men of his color by our civilization. At the Southern Christian Institute he conceived the idea of duplicating that institution in some dark place, for the uplift of his fellows, and thus repay the Christianity that found him for its gift. This story of his self-made way to Liberia, his work without tools out there in the tropical forest, his gathering in of the primitive children, his rare courage, both moral and physical, his devotion, unexcelled in the annals of missionary heroism, and many touches of a vibrant faith that are inspiring for their own sakes, are all told by the honored and beloved leader of our national work for negro education in this interesting little volume."

"He Is Never Troubled With Doubts"

Such was the compliment recently paid to a minister by an evangelist after a successful revival. But was it a compliment? Was it not rather a damaging revelation? The man who is not troubled with doubts never thinks, and the man who never thinks never reads. If he neither reads nor thinks he never develops a man's faith, and his spiritual equipment must be sub-normal. The doubts and questionings of mankind have spurred the race forward. The saints and the men of achievement in every age have doubted, and because they did we have a right to, and like them the right to dissolve our doubts in a larger faith. It will always be true that doubts may end in unbelief, but it is better to doubt, even in face of such a peril, than to arrest the progress of each other, and sterilize our own minds and souls by adhering to the now abandoned notion that faith can be preserved only by shutting our eyes to facts.

The reconstruction of faith in our age has been through processes of doubt. Several interesting volumes are in the world, written by Christian men, bearing the general title, "What We Owe the Enemy." It is certain that we would never have been enjoying to the full this Easter season had it not been for the Corinthian doubts which called out Paul's great resurrection anthem. Seasons of doubt may be really seasons of grace. Whether doubts are to be excluded from our minds as the world itself would be from some vocabularies, depends wholly on one's point of view. Every mind must have its doubts and perplexities as every day its shadows.

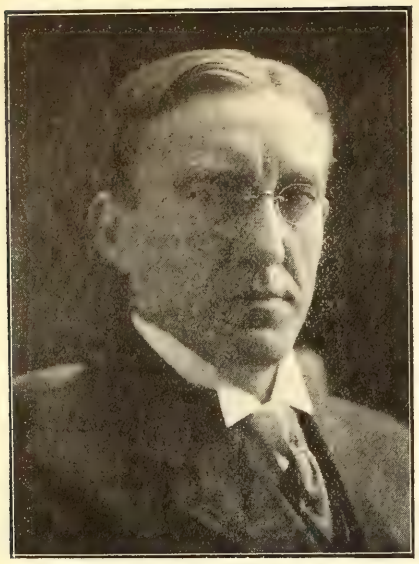
So to say that one never doubts is to say that all the problems of the universe have been settled by him, and that perfection of thought has been attained; or that he has shut his eyes to the problems of the age, and refuses to be on speaking terms with them. Between these extremes most of us have to live. But in order to keep ourselves from doubting we are not going to put out our eyes.

—The United States is the second strongest nation in the world in naval strength, according to the Navy Year Book. Considering the Charleston, Milwaukee and St. Louis to be armored cruisers, the total tonnage of the United States navy is placed at 797,341, which is nearly 19,000 tons in excess of that of the German navy. If, however, the three ships mentioned are not classified as armored cruisers, the total tonnage of Uncle Sam's navy is slightly less than that of Germany. Great Britain continues to hold its place of supremacy as the greatest naval power of the world. The strength of her navy is considerably more than twice that of either the United States or Germany. France, Japan and Russia rank next in the order named. The following figures are taken from the Navy Year Book, giving number and tonnage of battleships and armored cruisers building and provided for: Great Britain—Seventy battleships, tonnage, 1,189,000; ormored cruisers, 44; tonnage, 620,650. United States—Thirty-seven battleships; tonnage, 610,796; armored cruisers, 12; tonnage, 157,445. Germany—Thirty-six battleships; tonnage, 580,870; armored cruisers, 14; tonnage, 206,768. France—Twenty-seven battleships; tonnage, 257,194; armored cruisers, 21; tonnage, 209,356. Japan—Sixteen battleships; tonnage, 257,184; armored cruisers, 14; tonnage, 164,651. Russia—Fourteen battleships; tonnage, 23,850; armored cruisers, 6; tonnage, 13,166.

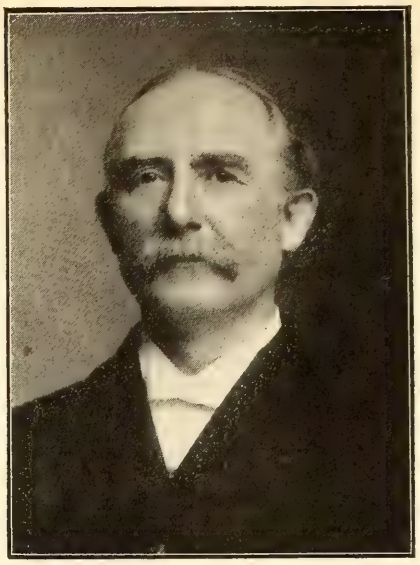
—If the Christian Standard had not long since exhausted its influence with the main body of the Disciples by its sinister policy of blocking progress and harassing the missionary interests, its current straightforward articles exposing the arrogance of the Christian Evangelist would stir the indignation of the entire brotherhood. The facts are on the Standard's side. The avowed attempt of the Evangelist to "speak representatively" for the Disciples and to "censor" the utterances of other journals, coupled with such flagrant breaches of business ethics on its commercial side as no decent "secular" house would be guilty of, has set thousands of the more conservative folk wondering whether, after all, Mr. Long's investment may not have been ill-advised. The brash and intolerant character of its orthodoxy has disappointed all our forward facing leaders. It is plain that no help for a broad-visioned movement for closer fraternity with other Christians will come from that quarter. The dollar sign shines through its most pious editorials.

The fundamental assumptions upon which a so-called "brotherhood publishing house" proceeds have not yet been examined. If they were examined, we venture to say they would prove to be repugnant to the feelings and ideals of all discriminating Disciples of Christ.

—The University of Chicago has devised a new system of retiring allowances for professors or their widows. A fund of $2,500,000 taken from the $10,000,000 Rockefeller gift of 1910 has been set aside for this purpose. This pension system will grant to men who have attained the rank of assistant professor or higher, and who have reached the age of 65 and have served 15 years or more in the institution, 40 per cent of their salary and an additional 2 per cent for each year's service over 15. The plan also provides that at the age of 70 a man shall be retired unless the Board of Trustees specially continues his services. The widow of any professor entitled to the retiring allowance shall receive one-half the amount due him, provided she has been his wife for ten years.



Professor Frederick O. Norton.



Professor S. M. Jefferson.

Dean Charles M. Sharpe.

An Epoch-Making Congress

Doings and Sayings of the Kansas City Gathering

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN

The Church Congress has come to be an established institution among the Disciples. The national conventions are clogged with business and sometimes over-ridden by the mob mind, but this smaller gathering brings together those who are interested in the fundamental problems of the church. We have had the Congress now for thirteen years and have many times met to discuss significant questions, but never has there been a meeting when our people have so thoroughly examined the foundations on which the movement rests as at this time.

Excellent Location.

Kansas City was excellently located to draw a large attendance and much the largest number of recent congresses was present. The quality of the gathering was manifest. Men who count in the brotherhood and lead its different types of thought were on the ground. Even the evangelists felt the importance of the gathering and several of their number were at the sessions. The men stayed through and the last session was the largest of them all. This is to be explained, of course, by the character of that session. A grace like that of southern hospitality characterizes the Kansas City churches and the delegates were made abundantly welcome in the homes of the beautiful section of the city where the Linwood Boulevard church is located.

The Congress opened on Tuesday evening with a paper written by John Ray Ewers of Pittsburg. Mr. Ewers was unable to be present, but sent his paper. It was read by W. F. Richardson of Kansas City. It dealt with the new efficiency movement that is now going through industry, and asked many pertinent questions with reference to the efficiency of much of our present religious machinery. Are many of our ill-prepared and inefficient preachers worth their keep or would they better be back in the ranks of productive industry? Can we defend many of our churches which consider themselves above the tasks of their community life? The searching critique which applies this pragmatic test to the churches and ministers is one to which we might all give attention.

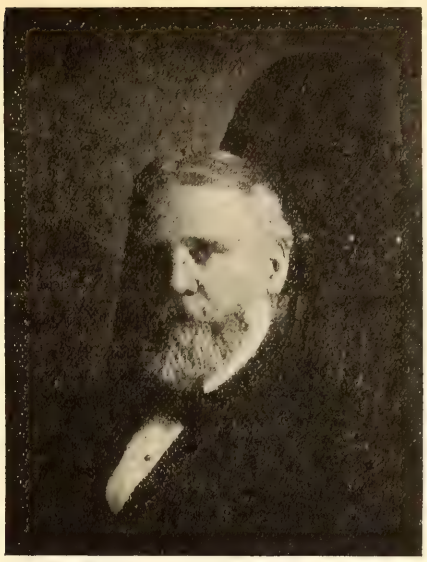
Disappointment in Absence of J. B. Briney.

Many of us had looked for a thrill on Wednesday morning when Dr. Bitting of the Baptist church was to tell the story of the recent re-organization of his denomination, and our own and only J. B. Briney was to have reviewed him. Mr. Briney was not present, however, so we heard the paper of Dr. Bitting and furnished the discussion with impromptu speakers. Dr. Bitting showed that the Baptists had long held to the extreme congregational notion of their organization but had at last evolved a plan that would give the denomination a voice. The new organization not only makes for closer articulation of the interests but it has also resulted in significant economies. All the Baptist missionary publications have been consolidated into one journal called Missions. By bringing all their missionary interests together in this journal they now have a magazine that commands respect everywhere and which merits a subscription list outside the denomination. As the story was told, many felt that it sounded much like the story of our own struggles after closer unity and many were the heart-felt wishes expressed that we might be as successful in our search for an effective coöperation of our congregations as the Baptists have been.

Baptism and the New Testament.

Interesting as was the discussion of this question of organization, the real event of the Congress was to be the series of sessions on the question of Christian Union. On Wednesday afternoon the Congress came together with a large audience present to hear a paper by Prof. F. O. Norton of Drake University on "The Problem of Christian Union in the Light of New Testament Study." Prof. Norton is known as one of the best Greek scholars in our communion. His paper dealt with the question of the texts upon which the Disciples have throughout their history built up an authoritative conception of the place of baptism in the Christian system. Prof. Norton examined the great texts of the gospels in which Jesus authorized baptism. Some of these he showed were interpolations and had been so recognized by the scholars who have given us our revised version of the Bible. With regard to other texts like that at the close of Matthew, there was a difference of reading, with the possibility, and with some scholars the probability, that this text did not contain originally any command of Jesus with reference to baptism. The address was thoroughly scholarly in its grasp of the material and its caution in reaching conclusions. It should be put in print that those who were present at that session may study it somewhat more at leisure. The paper was reviewed by Burris A. Jenkins of Kansas City, who is himself a New Testament scholar of standing. He criticised Prof. Norton's too free use of patristic literature in examining the text, but held in the main to all the contentions of the previous speaker. He reminded his hearers facetiously of a visit he had made to a Congress in Iowa when he was handled without gloves, and said he now had opportunity to return the compliment. In his address he called attention to the three divisive controversies that have kept the Christian church separated into denominations. These controversies relate to the Trinity, the Eucharist and Baptism. Mr. Jenkins insisted that none of these questions had any footing in the church when the New Testament was examined with reference to text and proper interpretation. The question of Trinity and Eucharist he passed by lightly since the Disciples had little trouble with them. The question of Baptism he considered at length. He showed that Jesus and Paul had spent their lives fighting legalistic religion, religion which depended upon rules and ceremonies instead of principles, and that it was incredible that these leaders should be so utterly inconsistent as to introduce a new legalism. He showed that the historic contention of the Disciples depends upon a certain conception of the authority of Jesus. Since, however, we cannot find a single command of Jesus with reference to baptism where modern scholarship has not written the question mark over the text or definitely thrown it out, we are compelled to modify our attitude with reference to the authority of Christ and the practice of Christian baptism. Mr. Jenkins insisted that there were other grounds on which the practice of immersion could rest but these furnished no defense of the practice of close fellowship on the basis of immersion. Mr. Jenkins did not say that he was willing to accept the logic of his position, however, and declared that it was still

Rev. Burris A. Jenkins.



Rev. J. H. Garrison.

Rev. John Ray Ewers.

his custom to immerse Presbyterians. He believed the Disciples would some day come to the more advanced ground, however.

Eager But not Fiery Discussion.

In the discussion that followed, there was insistent demand for recognition but no fiery speeches. Radical and conservative alike felt the courtesies of the situation and talked to the question without appeals to the galleries. Prof. Norton was criticised for many of the positions Mr. Jenkins had affirmed, but in his closing speech insisted that he was thoroughly orthodox and had brought not his own opinions but the foundation facts which each might interpret as he liked. Dean Norton said that as near as he could define his position it was a combination of that expressed in the speeches of H. L. Willett and W. F. Richardson. Mr. Jenkins in reply asked: "Who is this colossus who doth bestride the world with one foot on Willett and the other on Richardson?" Thus with merry jest a serious session closed. Its end is not yet.

Dr. Batten's Social Theme.

The session Wednesday evening was addressed by Prof. Samuel Z. Batten of Des Moines College, Iowa, who is a member of the Baptist denomination. He and Dr. Bitting were cordially received by their Disciple brethren and he spent considerable time at the Congress in consideration of our problems. Dr. Batten spoke on the subject, "The Social Task of the Church." In this address he did not display the interest in the scientific side of his subject that would be found among some other great authorities, but his address was warm with human sympathy and religious fervor. It is this which gives his message power and significance. The church has been inclined to look askance at the social movement sometimes because it has been felt that it was not very religious. Certainly no one could feel that way with reference to the message and work of Dr. Batten. It was a good idea on the part of the committee to present this great theme at a Congress session. Our intellectual questions pale into insignificance after all in the presence of the human problems of the age.

History, Psychology and Logic!

The session on Thursday morning had for its subject, "Is Christian Union Possible in the Light of History, Psychology and Logic?" We may blame the program committee for ever setting such a task but perhaps we ought also to blame the speakers for sticking closely to their subjects, for these two specialists in the field of philosophy carried us far afield in technical and academic discussion. Both Prof. S. M. Jefferson of Lexington, Ky., and Prof. Herbert Martin of Drake University, Des Moines, are representative men among us in their field. One represents, perhaps, an older philosophical method, while the other is a disciple of the new functional view-point. Yet Prof. Jefferson is hardly less progressive in his department than his able young reviewer. We could have wished the discussion of Christian Union and History to review the efforts toward union made in the history of the church. Even philosophers like Leibnitz have worked at this problem. The historical portion of the discussion, however, was more concerned with New Testament history. The relation of Christian Union to Psychology may have some interest but here we might have dealt with such every-day psychological problems as prejudice, indifference and inertia, rather than to have gone far afield in considering the whole psychological background. Both the speakers proved their ability to handle technique in their department but shot over the heads of men not specialists. In the discussion following, one speaker, under the very shadow of the platform where A. C. Smither was presiding, insisted that we should be willing to accept Christian union in spots when we couldn't get it everywhere, and referred in no uncertain way to the Loken case on the Pacific coast. If there was any point upon which the Congress seemed to be almost unanimous it was that of condemnation of the policy of fomenting division in our own ranks as was done recently in an editorial by the new manager of the Christian Evangelist.

Rev. Dr. W. C. Bitting, Guest Speaker, Representing the Baptist Denomination.

Two Editors Cross Swords.

Through all these sessions the crowd had steadily grown and the interest increased. Everyone was looking for the real event of the gathering when the youthful editor of The Christian Century was to face the venerable editor emeritus of the Christian Evangelist. There was uneasiness throughout the gathering, for the Chicago protagonist was late arriving. There were many anxious inquiries as to whether he would decline at the last moment to appear in defense of his thesis. His presence in the morning session Thursday, however, dispelled all doubt that the long looked-for event was at hand. For the first time in the history of the Congress, everybody had waited for the last session. Our almost boyish-looking Chicago editor sat on one side of the pulpit and the white bearded patriarch and champion of many a hard fought battle sat on the other side.

Mr. Morrison's Paper.

The first address on the subject, "The Essential Plea of the Disciples in the Light of Their Origin and Aim," was presented by C. C. Morrison. It dealt with the early history of the Disciples and held for its thesis that the essential principles of the movement were present in the "Declaration and Address" by Thomas Campbell. Mr. Morrison insisted that while the introduction of the practice of immersion in the history of the movement had not been inconsistent, the practice of a closed fellowship was a Baptist

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS."

Copyright 1911, George H. Doran Co.

(CHAPTER II continued.)

"I see it is," replied Paul dryly. "But the one at home is—" he paused, rose from his seat and went over by the window and stood there looking out over the school campus.

Paul Douglas had had in his fifty years many interesting and profoundly moving experiences, but it is doubtful if in all his life he had faced anything which stirred him so deeply as this. His high standard of conduct made him loathe the entire gambling transaction. It was agony to him to find that his own son was swept off his feet by a custom which had nothing to excuse it. Above all, Paul felt the bitterness that comes to a father when he realizes that the careful teaching of years has been deliberately disobeyed or ignored. There was a mingling of bitterness and shame and anger and sorrow and heartache in Paul that Walter could not possibly understand as he sat there looking dully at his father's broad back and wondering what his father would do.

After what seemed like an hour, Paul turned around.

"Give me an itemized account of your obligations outside of your gambling expenses."

"I don't call it gambling to bet on the races," said Walter half defiantly.

"It makes no difference what you call it," said Paul sternly. "What is all betting but trying to get something for nothing, and what is that but gambling? Every boy in Burrton who bet on the race is a gambler."

"The authorities never say anything against it," said Walter sullenly. "The president knows that thousands of dollars are put up at every race and he never has said a word about it."

"We will not argue about it," said Paul coldly. "Give me your accounts, your honest accounts, with the tradesmen here and then pack up your things."

"O father, you don't mean—"

"Pack up your things. We leave for Milton in the morning."

Walter took out of a drawer the bills which had accumulated there and without a word handed them over to his father. Paul summed up and found a total of $81.

"Is that all?"

"Yes, except my tuition for this last half."

"How much is that?"

"Forty dollars."

"Is that all?"

"Yes."

"I'll settle this all up. You can begin packing while I am out."

Paul took the bills and went out abruptly, not concealing from Walter, what was very apparent, that he was tremendously angry.

He went to the various tradesmen and settled the accounts, went to the boarding place and paid the arrears, and after some difficulty on account of the holiday, finally succeeded in settling the tuition at the school office.

He then asked the way to the president's house, and on presenting himself at the door was invited to go into the reception room and wait for a few moments.

The president was having a call from some old classmates who had come down to Burrton to see the race. When they went out, the president accompanied them to the door. Paul could not avoid hearing one of the visitors say, "I put up my last dollar on Burrton. May have to borrow to get out of town."

"Don't borrow of me," said the president, laughing. "I've never been able to get back what you owed me at Cambridge."

There was some jesting reply in the familiar language of old college chums and the visitors went out.

The president came into the reception room and greeted Douglas heartily. He had heard of him, had read some of his stories and was glad he had a son at Burrton.

"It's my son I came to see you about, President Davis," said Paul quietly, when he had returned the president's hearty greeting. "I am going to take him out of the school and I thought it was only fair to you that I tell you frankly why."

"Going to take him out! I'm sorry to hear it."

"But the atmosphere of Burrton does not seem to agree with my son." Paul frankly told the president the incident of Walter's bet and the consequences, without any care to hide the facts of his own intense convictions on the matter of betting which he mentioned several times as "gambling."

President Davis listened gravely and before Paul was through, his face had reddened deeply more than once. Paul spoke very bluntly and it was plain to be seen that he was under a great stress of feeling in which was mingled a real, deep, strong anger, a part of which was directed against the Burrton school and its management.

"And so," Paul said as he finished his statement, "I don't care to keep my son in an institution where the standards are so low that a gambling habit like betting is not even discouraged by the authorities."

"How do you know it is not discouraged?"

"My boy tells me that during his whole stay here he has not heard a word of disapproval or protest against this prevalent habit."

The president turned to a bookcase near by and took down a small volume entitled, "Chapel Talks." He opened it at a certain page and without a word pointed to a passage.

Paul read it. "There is a prevalent idea in the school that in order to be loyal to Burrton the students must all stand together, no matter what is done by the student body. That idea is false and in the end it is harmful to the best interests of the school.

"Take for example the custom of betting on the athletics and especially on the annual boat race. This is a custom which should be discouraged by every lover of the school. Betting is gambling; it is an attempt to get something for nothing. That attempt is destructive to morals and dangerous to character. The fact that many of the alumni who come to see the games bet on them is no reason why the undergraduates should bet on the games. I look to every student to discourage this practice and use his influence to help abolish a harmful and dangerous habit."

Paul looked up from the reading and eyed the president with a new feeling of respect.

"I beg pardon for judging you, sir, without knowing all the facts. But this volume was published over a year ago. My boy never heard these chapel talks. I take it that there has been nothing said about betting here for several months."

"No, perhaps not," replied the president with some hesitation. "But the students generally know my views on the matter. That knowledge, however, does not stop the betting."

"Why can't you put an end to it by forbidding it altogether?"

In reply to Paul's question, President Davis smiled.

"How much power do you think the president of an American college has, Mr. Douglas?"

"Why, I suppose he has enough to stop things that are absolutely wrong."

"Pardon me, Mr. Douglas, but he has no such power. He may try to stop them, but his power to do so may be very limited. For a year the great president of Harvard, Dr. Charles Eliot, did his best to abolish or amend football in that university. As head of the institution he spoke out against the game, which he honestly believed to be brutal and demoralizing. What was the result of his protest? It had no influence toward abolishing the game and very little, if any, toward modifying it. The fact is our colleges and universities are just now controlled in a large measure by the opinion of those who support them. In other words, the alumni in many colleges run the college, not the president or the officers. I may say to you frankly that such is the case at Burrton. Two of the visitors who were here a few minutes ago are really more influential with the board of trustees than I am. They are heavy contributors. One of them gave us a gymnasium last year. They are very fond of athletics. Both of them are betting men. It would be a very difficult task to regulate the athletics in Burrton in opposition to these alumni; so there you are, as to a president's influence. All this in confidence, Mr. Douglas."

"It must be great fun to be president of a university," said Paul in disgust. "It seems to me if I were president of this school I should want to be president, especially in matters of conduct and morals."

"You would see it differently if you were president," said Davis, with a faint smile. "Among other difficulties that we face here is the fact that Burrton, being unusually well equipped for technical high-class preparation in electrical engineering, is a favorite school for the difficult sons of rich men who do not know how to get on elsewhere. We have on our hands the greatest of all problems—how to make useful men out of a class of individuals who from boyhood have been reared in habits of the most princely luxury and disregard of all rules of restraint. The fact that we don't toady to all these rich men is seen in the records, which show during the year over two hundred men suspended for failure to meet the standard requirements. And as to the betting, Mr. Douglas, your boy has now learned his lesson and will not do that again. Hadn't you better reconsider? Will he find conditions any different or any better in any other school that you know? Do you know any college East or West where the student atmosphere is absolutely free from all evil customs and habits?"

"I must confess I don't," said Paul, slowly. "I don't mind saying that this action of my son's has made me very angry. Still, I don't deny that it might have happened in any one of a dozen colleges in any part of the country. A large part of my grievance was because it seemed to me and, pardon me, seems yet, that the institution was to blame for keeping so still about these things, and doing so little to create a different moral standard. But I'm not asking Burrton to take all the blame. My boy has got to take his punishment, and I don't know of a better one than to take him home."

"I hope you won't resort to that measure," said the president, earnestly. "Your son has unusual talent. He holds the highest place in the shops for original research. Give him another chance. It is my opinion that he will not disappoint you again."

"Perhaps not," answered Paul as he rose to go. "But I have about made up my mind."

"I hope you'll change it," said the president as Paul went away.

"Perhaps," answered Paul briefly.

He walked slowly back to Walter's room, asking many questions as he went along. His talk with the president had given him another angle from which to judge the boy's conduct. He could not hide from himself that his heart was sore over the whole matter, because he had never dreamed that his own boy would fall before a temptation which he had so often heard his father condemn at home. Paul Douglas was humiliated, as a man always is when his children begin to show the bad habits he has been fond of criticizing in other people's children. And he had not yet been able to find any reasonable excuse for Walter.

When he went into the room he found Walter packing things up and evidently with no purpose of remonstrating or trying to change his father's decision.

"There's a letter from mother," he said briefly as Paul came up to the table in the middle of the room.

"You want me to read it?"

"Yes."

Paul sat down to read and Walter went on with his packing.

"Dear Walter," Esther wrote, "I am so glad your father has this opportunity to visit you and I presume he is at Burrton now. You will have good times together and I am envying him the privilege. I have missed you, boy, more than you can imagine. But then you will never know how much your mother has depended on you here at home. You were always so thoughtful and kind, how can I help missing my eldest?

"I have been thinking a good deal lately about the different standards that prevail in different places and I have no doubt you have noticed that some of the things we have always taught you here at home are not held by others in the school where you now are. I believe you will be able to decide fairly when it is necessary as to what is right and wrong and not allow the fact of a different standard to confuse your judgment. I simply want you to know, Walter, that I have the utmost confidence in you. I am proud of my boy's ability. I expect you will make one of the finest engineers in the United States, and better yet, one of the finest men in the world.

"What do you think has been the great event of the last week? Helen had a young man caller two nights ago. It was the oldest son of Judge Randolph on Chandos street. The boy is a little younger than Helen, I think. He called in a formal way and to hear him talk to Helen convulsed me. I finally had to retire, but Helen was furious with me after young Randolph went away. The child was very much disturbed and claims to despise the youth, etc. It was like the story I was reading the other day:

"A young man had been calling now and then on a young lady, when one night as he sat in the parlor waiting for her to come down, her mother entered the room instead, and asked him in a very grave, stern way what his intentions were. He turned very red and was about to stammer some incoherent reply when suddenly the young lady called down from the head of the stairs: 'Mamma, mamma, that is not the one.'

"But, oh dear. Must I realize 'old age is creeping on apace' when my girl begins to have gentlemen callers? Helen will have many admirers. She is a girl who has very decided views and is very frank to express them. Now don't tease her when you write her, for this is in confidence. You must not betray me.

"Louis is doing very well now at school. His headaches trouble him some. I am giving him a course of careful training. He was much interested in the set of models you sent him. It was good of you to remember him. He admires you vastly. Don't forget that, boy, will you?

"You must come home for the holidays. We want the family all together then. Make your plans accordingly.

"All send love, and most of all, your

"Mother."

Paul finished the letter and laid it down. He sat there for a while in silence. Walter did not venture to break it. Finally Paul said: "Walter, I've been thinking over this affair and perhaps I have a new look at it. I want to tell you about it."

A light came into Walter's face which had been fixed and dogged and he got up from in front of his trunk where he had been kneeling and came up to the table.

"Sit down there," said Paul gravely. Walter sat down opposite his father, and the two, father and son, looked at each other earnestly across the table.

CHAPTER III.

Paul Douglas was trying to think of his own boyhood and his temptations as he faced his own son on that memorable afternoon. His anger at the boy had almost subsided. The feeling that remained was a feeling of grief and fear mingled at the anticipation of a failure on Walter's part to realize the grave nature of the crisis through which he was passing.

"I've been thinking over all this, Walter," Paul began slowly, "and I am willing you should remain here on certain conditions."

"Oh, father, I'll do anything," Walter began impulsively.

"Let me state them," his father went on gravely. "They may seem hard to you. But I'm older than you and have a right to expect obedience if the terms are just.

"In the first place I shall expect you to earn the amount you have incurred with your gambling and repay me. Is that fair?"

"Yes," Walter spoke, wincing at his father's use of the word. "I wish you would not say 'gambling,' father. It was a friendly wager. It is the regular college custom."

"I do not care what you call it or what the custom is here," said Paul, his anger beginning to flame up. "The wager, the custom, the whatever you call it, is gambling. It is gambling as much as any custom at Monte Carlo or any of the gambling hells of Europe. The principle is the same always; it is the desire and the hope of getting something for nothing, a thing totally contrary to every divine law of life. Don't you see it, Walter? Do you think I would be so much disturbed about the matter if it were of little account?"

"No, I suppose not."

Paul looked at the boy with growing earnestness. It was not reassuring to consider the possibility of his boy growing up with blunted ideals, with feeble convictions and a faint sense of the eternal difference between sharp cut right and wrong. The most sorrowful experience in Paul Douglas' life might be coming to him at this time if he should find his own son lacking in the real essentials of moral earnestness.

"Then," he went on, "another condition of your remaining here is that you promise me never to bet on anything again."

Walter interrupted eagerly, "You don't need to worry over that. I've learned my lesson. You don't think I feel especially drawn toward that sort of thing, do you?"

"I hope not," said Paul with a feeling of relief. There was a pause. Then Paul said as he picked up Esther's letter, "You will write mother. I'll leave it to you to tell her what you think you ought. But she is building great castles on your estate, my boy. Don't disappoint her, will you?"

"No, father, I won't," Walter replied in a low voice. There was another pause and then Paul said cheerfully, "I must go back on the night train. It's only fair to you to say that President Davis paid you a fine compliment speaking of your rank in the engineering department. We all expect great things of you in that line." Walter colored with pleasure at the statement.

"They've got a great equipment here, father. That was the first reason I felt awfully bad to leave. I don't believe there is another school like Burrton for electrical engineering."

Paul rose to go and Walter went with him down to the station. Paul's parting word was affectionate and hopeful.

"Do your best, boy, and don't forget to pray."

Walter remembered that brief but serious appeal a long time. His father had not often talked religious matters with him. At the same time Walter had grown up with a strong impression of his father's own religious character and without much having been said he had always had the deepest respect for his father's splendid Christian character. That same evening he wrote home to his mother. Under the influence of his father's treatment of his conduct he made a full and frank confession of his actions but at one point he could not help saying, "I told father I did not feel as if the bet was such an awful thing on account of it being a regular custom here at Burrton."

To be continued.

Fathoms deep may drift the snow,
It may hail, and it may blow,
Till my windows groan and shake,
Moan for that I ne'er will make.
For while in my breast I bear
My love's image, spring is there.

—Heinrich Heine.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE APRIL GARDEN

"When daffodils begin to peer,
With heigh! the doxy over the dale,
Why, then comes in the sweet o' the year;
For the red blood reigns in the winter's pale."

I began this article a week ago (April sixth) with these words:

Goethe says every beginning is joyous, and in this season of seed sowing one has the feeling of starting life afresh. As I stand in my garden and muse over the orderly rows of green that are bravely pushing their way through the brown earth, I have visions of perfect peas, of colossal asparagus, of such splendid strawberries as were never raised before. Last year, my asters were blighted by the drought—this year I expect to surpass all former records; the white ants ruined my mignonette last summer—I am determined to lay the white ants low this summer, or never more hold up my head as a gardener. The time of weeds is not yet, and I do not let them intrude on my happy thoughts. . . . .

Not True Today.

Alas! That was true a week ago, but it is not true today. It has been a week of warmth and sunshine and shower, a time of phenomenal flowering. In one night the weeds made their appearance and have outstripped all competitors in rampant and impudent growth. Like Minerva, they have sprung into being full grown, full armed. I say "full armed" advisedly, for a struggle with them is war to the knife—and the knife must cut deep below the soil, or they will look upon it as friendly pruning, and flourish all the better. I used to labor under the delusion that I could exterminate dandelions and burdocks and plantains and catnips by chopping off their tops with a hoe, but I am a sadder and a wiser woman now; nothing but a long, sharp knife, wielded by an implacable hand, will make any impression on their determined vitality.

"A Bug Sitting at My Feet."

I also had it in mind to write a week ago, that "the time of bugs was not yet," and I have had a rude awakening from that happy fallacy also. I became a little confused the other day as to where my rows of potatoes began and going out in the garden to try and locate them (they are not up yet) I glanced down and saw a potato bug calmly sitting at my feet. I instantly knew what that meant, and took a stick, dug up a little earth, and sure enough, there were the potatoes! He was perched on that hill waiting for the potatoes to come up, so that he might lose no time in destroying the helpless plants. The potato bug (or beetle, if you choose) is not usually considered an insect of a high order of intelligence, but he knows his business thoroughly; this one thing I do know, is his motto; he starts out in life to find potato plants to prey upon, and he always succeeds; henceforth, I yield him the palm of discovery—no poor, blundering mortal can compete with his trained and concentrated intuitions.

Admiration and Animosity.

But while I pay him this reluctant tribute, do not think I have anything but bitter animosity toward him. Would that some one gifted in invective and vituperation would write a philippic against this ruthless destroyer of a costly vegetable! It would give every housekeeper genuine joy to read it, at a time when potatoes are selling at two dollars a bushel.

Sweet and Busy Season.

This is not only "the sweet o' the year," as my quotation from Shakespeare says, it is also the busy time o' the year. Every gardener worthy the name, has had her garden plowed, or spaded, and her potatoes and peas and onions and salsify in; the lettuce and radishes are well up, her asparagus bed has been forked and raked, and she is beginning to cut the succulent stalks. Her sweet peas, of course, were planted as soon as the ground could be worked, and should show in flourishing green rows now. I have already sowed mignonette and hardy pinks along the borders where they are to stay, and scattered poppy seed in bare places. All of these do better if they are sown early—and poppies and mignonette must be put where they are to stay, as it is very difficult to transplant them.

But the tender annuals are started in a cold frame, if one has no hot bed; already my plants in the frame are up, and will be ready for transplanting when danger of frost is past. The accepted time for setting out plants in this section is supposed to be the tenth of May, but it behooves the wise gardener to study the moods of the weather, and not pin her faith to arbitrary dates. Let her cultivate an intimate acquaintance with the weather bureau, if her faith in it has not suffered shipwreck by a long series of false prophecies. She would do well to find some old-time darkey, who knows all about the moon and the wind and the clouds, and learn from him when it will be perfectly safe to trust her tender plants in the open beds.

A Month's Changes.

But it would be almost a crime to devote the whole of an April garden talk to weeds, and beetles, and details of practical work. What a change since I wrote of the Garden of Dreams a month ago! Then winter was still lingering in the lap of spring, and when I thought of its length and severity, I confess I was filled with gloomy forebodings about the fate of my flowers. When the snow-drops and crocuses pushed their brave little heads through the cold ground, I could not but look on them with a wistful tenderness, fearing that the bitter March winds and snows and frosts would lay them low. But they grew in size and beauty, and one happy morning, the dearest of early spring flowers, the daffodils, began to peer along the garden walls:—

"Daffodils, that come before the swallow dares, and take The winds of March with beauty."

Winter a Protector.

Never again will I accuse winter of harming these beloved harbingers of the floral year—his mantle of snow has but kept them snug and safe during their long sleep. I have never seen them so beautiful and abundant as they are this spring and I marvel why everyone who has a bit of ground does not have a row of daffodils; they belong to the narcissus family and are of great variety—from the small, fragrant jonquils, of our grandmother's gardens, to the silver and gold of the superb emperor and empress. And not only are the garden walks glowing with these, but the hyacinths in pink and blue and white, and the tulips, and odorous white narcissus are also showing their welcome faces.

Entrance to a Scotland Garden.

A Garden Treasure.

And one of the treasures of this garden, a dwarf iris, sweet as a rose, and the earliest of its class, is a path of purple color this morning. In the mountain corner, where I put the wild flowers gathered from the hills, the hepatica and anemone, and wild hyacinth are in perfect bloom, and the ferns are pushing their curly heads through the rich mold. And the violets!—

Sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath—

How welcome they are! Presently, when the bloom is gone, I shall resent the way they encroach on the grass, or crowd out other flowers in the beds, but now I am overflowing with tenderness for them. How sweet are Tennyson's lines:

A Garden Walk.

"The meadows your walks have left so sweet,
That whenever a March wind sighs,
It sets the jewel print of your feet
In violets blue as your eyes."

I have never been able to see why so much contumely is heaped on the spring poet. A being who has never felt like writing poetry in the spring is like the man who has no music in his soul—and we all know what Shakespeare says he is fit for! If one lacks the power of poetic expression, he should make it his duty at this season to read humbly the spring poetry of more favored mortals, and not deride and make poor jokes about them.

This little verse must have been written not only by a poet, but by a gardener as well:

"A garden is a lovesome thing, God wot!
Rose plot,
Fringed pool,
Ferned grot—
The veriest school
Of peace; and yet the fool
Contends that God is not.
Not God! in gardens! when the eve is cool?
Nay, but I have a sign;
'Tis very sure God walks in mine."

"And they heard the voice of Jehovah, walking in the garden in the cool of the day." One who has never heard the voice of God speaking to her heart at eventide in her garden, has failed in the deepest secret of gardening, and has missed one of the beatitudes of life.

I. W. H.

WOMAN'S DOINGS

—Mrs. Robert La Follette will conduct a speech making campaign in California in the interest of her husband's candidacy for the Republican nomination for president. She will accompany the senator to California after the Oregon primaries and will make addresses to the women voters in the principal cities.

—Dr. Frances Hollingshead has been appointed assistant superintendent of the House of Refuge in Cincinnati. The institution is not only a home for youthful offenders but also a refuge for neglected children.

—Dr. Sara L. Morris has been appointed medical adviser of women at the University of Wisconsin to succeed Dr. Helen Dobson Denniston, resigned. Dr. Morris is a graduate of the Women's Medical College of Philadelphia.

—Miss Marion Oliver, daughter of the assistant secretary of war, goes to one of the Episcopal missions and instructs the neighborhood women and children in the making of garments and in cooking food. She does not stop there, either, but may often be seen, followed by a colored woman with a basket of good things, which she is giving to the sick poor. Miss Helen Taft is one of her assistants in the work.

—Mlle. Bernstein, daughter of the prime minister of Denmark, has apprenticed herself to a cabinetmaker, with the intention of devoting her life to the making of artistic furniture. Like her father, Mlle. Bernstein is an earnest and devoted suffragist.

—Germany and Bulgaria are contending for the honor of sheltering the oldest woman on earth. Up to a recent date a certain Mrs. Dutkiewitz, a resident of Posen, a city in Polish Germany, held the old age record. According to documents in her possession, she was born February 21, 1785, and is now over 125 years old. But now a resident of a small Bulgarian village named Baba Vasilka, claims to be ten months Mrs. Dutkiewitz' senior. The record of her birth in the Greek church in her home town gives the date as May, 1784. She is now living on the farm where she was born and where she worked in the fields for over 100 years. Her only companion is her son, aged 99.

—New York has an organization of women who are devoting their spare time to studying the problems of food supply. It is called the Housewives' League and is an outgrowth of the home economic committee of the City Federation of Women's Clubs. The purpose of the league is not to do away with the middleman entirely but to investigate and see how many handlings can be eliminated from the time an article is prepared for the market by the producer until the same article reaches the consumer.

—Miss Dora E. Keen of Philadelphia has sailed for Cordova, Alaska, on her way to climb Mount Blackburn, 16,140 feet, a copper peak whose summit never has been reached.

—Miss Margaret Harwood, A. B., Radcliffe, 1901, has won the astronomical fellowship of the Nantucket Maria Mitchell Association. She has been employed in the Harvard observatory since she was graduated from Radcliffe. The Maria Mitchell fellowship is worth $1,000.

—Kansas City girls are to have a camp fire organization, the feminine for the Boy Scouts movement. The girls must learn how to cook, to darn stockings, to sleep with the windows open and will have to know how to give first aid to the injured. The dress is of galatea, fringed with beads.

The Perennial Hope

What will God do this year? How will he come near to man? It may be, oh, that it might be! that he will break up this awful sluggishness of Christendom, this terrible torpidity of the Christian church, and give us a great, true revival of religion. It may be that he will speak some great imperious command to the brutal and terrible spirit of war, and will open the gate upon a bright period of peace throughout the world. It might be that he will draw back the curtain and throw some of his light upon the question of how the poor and the rich may live together in more cordial brotherhood. It may be that he will lead up from the depths of their common faith a power of unity into the sects of a divided Christendom. Perhaps he will smite this selfishness of fashionable life, and make it earnest. Perhaps by some terrible catastrophe he will teach the nation that corruption is ruin, and that nothing but integrity can make the nation strong. Perhaps this! Perhaps that! We make our guesses and no man can truly say. Only we know that with a world that needs so much, and with a God who knows its needs and who loves it and pities it so tenderly, there must be in the long year some approach of his life to its life, some coming of the Lord!

"Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock;
Thou that dwellest between the cherubin, shine forth.
Before Ephriam and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up Thy strength,
And come for salvation to us."

—Phillips Brooks.

Keep the soil of life soft, its sympathy tender, its imagination free, or else you lose the elementary quality of receptiveness, and all the influences of God may be scattered over you in vain.—F. G. Peabody.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

R. E. Henry, pastor of Niantic Church, is assisting in a revival meeting at Monticello.

Ora Foss of Christian College, Canton, Mo., has received and accepted a call to Central Church, Blandinsville.

Franklin Church has called to its pastorate J. E. Teany, of Murray, Iowa, who will take up the work at an early date.

A revival meeting lasting less than one week was held at Landis, by J. W. Whitaker, resulting in two additions by confession.

The revival meeting at Mill Shoals, conducted by Evangelists Hill and Knowles, had enrolled nineteen converts within a short time from its beginning.

O. C. Bolman of Pekin Church is to assist the pastor, Leroy F. Sargent, and the congregation at Lily in a revival meeting during the latter part of April.

The church at Auburn welcomed its new pastor, S. R. Lewis, the second Sunday in April. Mr. Lewis concluded his ministry at Harvel, with two additions on the last day.

The National Benevolent Association was remembered in an Easter offering amounting to $70, by the Sunday-school of Stanford Church, where W. H. Robertson is pastor.

A new edifice, costing about $25,000, being erected at Virden, is nearing completion, and is expected to be ready for dedication about the first of May. A. M. Hale is the pastor here.

C. Lee Stauffer, whose ministry at Dallas City has been unusually successful, is being urged by the Carlinville Church to become its pastor. It is not learned whether Mr. Stuffer will accept.

The C. L. Organ meeting at Christopher, which lasted for only a brief period, resulted in twenty additions, many of whom will not only be helped by the church but can prove efficient in the service rendered by the church to the community.

Augusta Church has unanimously called L. H. Hooe to become its pastor. The call has been accepted and accordingly Mr. Hooe's resignation has been extended to the church at Deer Creek, where his pastorate will be concluded the first of May.

Evangelists James Sharratt and daughter are in a revival meeting at Joppa, with large congregations and excellent interest in the entire community. These evangelists will follow the meeting at Joppa with meetings at Brookport and Rosiclare.

Carbondale pastor, Adam K. Adcock, did some missionary work at Sesser, preaching there two evenings, during which there were four additions by confession. There were also two confessions the following Sunday in Murphysboro, where he preaches on Sunday afternoons.

Allen T. Shaw, who ministers to the church at Macomb, recently concluded a lecture tour, during which four addresses were delivered, two being high school lectures. The church at Macomb is prospering, and is now having the services of Fife Brothers in an evangelistic campaign.

F. W. Harlow, who has been preaching at Blue Mound for one year, has indicated his intention of severing the pastoral relation with the congregation in a few months, having decided to move to Hebron, Ind., where himself and wife can be near the latter's aged father, living at that place.

S. F. Fannon, who ministers to the churches at St. Elmo and Brownstown, closed a revival meeting at the former place with forty-one additions, nearly all being on profession of faith. At Brownstown, a new building is being erected, to cost nearly $20,000, which is almost ready for dedication.

Camp Point Church is beginning the erection of its new church building, having broken ground for the same April 14. The church will be modern in its equipment, providing a capacity sufficient for the Sunday-school and other departments of the church not furnished by the old building, which was destroyed. The pastor here is H. J. Reynolds.

S. M. Connor, pastor of Dean Ave. Church, Spokane, Wash., preached at Normal Church, where J. H. Gilliland is pastor, last Sunday. It was the fiftieth anniversary of Mr. Conner's first sermon in the ministry, which was preached at Normal Church. He was pastor in Illinois for a number of years, and many of his old-time friends, unable to attend the service, sent postal greetings.

B. H. Cleaver, formerly minister at Lewistown, recently having spent a number of months in doing graduate work in the University of Chicago, has become pastor of Shelbina, Mo., Church. Mr. Cleaver's work in Illinois, both as a local pastor and helper in affairs more distant, should commend him most highly to his new Missouri congregation.

Robert H. Newton and his church at Atlanta are making an heroic effort to raise funds adequate for a new building. There is no question but that the enterprise will succeed. Already subscriptions amounting to nearly $5,000 are in hand, and the Finance Committee is pressing its operations with the intention of making a final announcement the first of next month.

The congregation at Hutsonville engaged in a revival meeting led by the pastor, W. I. Griffin, assisted by Sheldon R. Gilbert, singing evangelist. The meeting resulted in six additions, all but one being by baptism. The effort was designed to prepare people for becoming Christians in the future, and to minister to the spiritual life of the congregation, as well as to gain immediate recruits.

Arcola Church, it is reported, has captured for its pastor, Walter D. Rounds, formerly of New York and more recently of Bloomington, Ind., where he has been the efficient dean of the Disciples Divinity House, in connection with the state university. It is not learned whether Mr. Rounds has been induced to leave the latter very important work, or whether his service with Arcola Church is to comprise only ministrations upon Sunday.

Secretary's Letter.

Howard O. Rocks of Martinton has accepted a call to Milford to begin May 1.

Please do not skip the state offering if you have not yet taken it. It is greatly needed. Send it in as soon as possible.

Major Griffith of Allenville had three additions at Etna recently. Officers were elected and the church set in order.

E. A. Gary is highly pleased with his new work at Table Grove. They have a front rank Bible-school and will soon have a front rank church.

J. C. Reynolds and the Winchester folks are prospering. They are already talking a new church building. Sunday-school has doubled and the audiences fill the house.

L. H. Hooe of Deer Creek takes the work at Augusta May 1. Mr. Hooe is a promising young minister and we expect much from him. Glad to see our young men taking responsible positions.

E. A. Jordan of La Harpe sends us No. 2 of "The Christian Courier," a very well edited local church paper. Printer's ink helps greatly if used with wisdom and discretion. Quite a number of our churches have local papers. They are strong helps.

A. I. Zeller, the hustling secretary of the Third District, has issued "The Third District Reporter," a very neat illustrated, twelve page folder giving many important facts and figures of the district work, and announcing the district convention at Dallas City, May 14-16.

The May offering for home missions is not far away. Make careful preparations for it and make the offering large. Remember it is a joint offering and will be divided equally between the home and state missionary societies. Send the money to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, O.

At the Council of Country and Village Churches, held at Niantic the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved that it is the sense of this meeting that the present condition of our village and rural churches is such that it deserves the immediate attention of our people in our state and district conventions, and that we hereby request J. W. Street to present this problem to the state board at its next regular meeting."

W. F. Turner closes his work with the Central Church, Peoria, April 21, and leaves for North Yakima, Wash., the next day. For two months they have had a continuous revival—about 40 added in that time, 387 added since he took the work a little more than three years ago. We are sorry to have him leave Illinois. He was recently elected a member of our state board and we have all learned to love him.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.
W. D. Deweese, Office Sec'y-Treasurer.
Bloomington, Ill.

An Epoch Making Congress

(Continued from page 13.)

practice which had in a measure denominationalized the movement and diverted it that far from its original aim. This perversion of the movement had split the little flock at Brush Run and had continued throughout a century to inhibit the plea of the Disciples of Christ. We shall not review further the address of Mr. Morrison which is being printed in The Christian Century, but will confine ourselves rather to the address made in rebuttal by Dr. J. H. Garrison of St. Louis. The latter, rather unjustly, we thought, complained about not having Mr. Morrison's paper more than two weeks in advance of the Congress, and about some changes of phraseology since, of which he had been apprised before the session, but soon settled down to discuss the paper upon its merits with great fairness and discernment.

Dr. Garrison's Reply.

We do not know where we would go to find a conservative presentation of the plea of the Disciples of Christ made with more plausibility than that which was made that day. We could wish that this address as well as the other might be made a part of our permanent literature by being printed.

Professor Herbert Martin.

Dr. Garrison insisted that the reception of unimmersed Christians into the membership of our churches would be a divisive practice which would fail in its object of promoting Christian Union. He declared that rather than sacrifice his conception of the authority of Christ in the matter of baptism, he would give up the idea of Christian Union. He defended the early history of the Disciples and insisted that it was perfectly logical that the recognition of immersion as baptism should be enforced as one of the conditions of entrance into our churches. To his younger listeners, however, Dr. Garrison was working with the thought tools of another age. His notion of the authority of Jesus in immersion had had the foundations knocked out from under it by the New Testament study of the previous day. He held a static view of history which left no room for development either in the New Testament church or in our own movement. He made an appeal to "an immersion conscience" forgetting that there was conscience on both sides of this question and that conscienee needs education, since at times it leads mothers to throw babies into the Ganges. He assumed a theory of inspiration no longer defended by scholarship that he might help out his conception of religious authority. He spoke, however, as a Christian. Were all

(Continued on page 22.)

Church Life

At Dinuba, Cal., there were 21 baptisms and four confessions on a single day recently. O. E. Palmer is the pastor.

J. M. Lowe writes that there have been already 52 additions in the meeting at Santa Anna, Calif., which constitutes it the largest meeting in the history of the church.

J. P. Sales, pastor at Dayton, O., recently addressed a group of Disciples at Middletown, O., which resulted in the organization of a new congregation at that place.

Nelson Williams will have the support of the whole town at Vollmer, Idaho, as all the Christian people of the community will unite with him.

Central Church, New York, raised $1,000 for their missionary offering. They expect to increase the amount to $1,250, of which $1,000 will be spent in New York City.

Freeman L. Pettit, pastor of Fifth Street Church, Lafayette, Ind., has accepted a call to Neodosha, Kan., and will take up his new work on June 1.

Clayton S. Brooks of Portsmouth, O., will assist the Massillon Church in a meeting following the union meeting now in progress. The union meeting is conducted by Evangelist Lyons. Tabernacle meetings are becoming very popular in Ohio.

W. J. Wright, formerly of the Home Missionary Society, has recently received a call to the pastorate of the church in Franklin, Ind. This is one of the good churches of the state.

Everett Hollingsworth has taken the work at College Park Church, Atlanta, Ga., which gives them preaching for full time. This church has not had its own pastor before this and the outlook is very encouraging.

The First Church of Findley, O., John Mullin, minister, will continue to a be a living link in our Foreign Society. This means that the church will pay into this work $600 per year, the actual salary of one missionary.

Leland W. Porter, pastor at Helena, Mont., writes that the church is planning an evangelistic campaign for July with the Minges company in charge. Their Sunday-school is the largest in years and they expect to build up a great work.

McLean College urgently needs $10,000 more to replace the loss by fire which took place Feb. 3. They have raised $20,000 and are urgently seeking the rest of the funds to save the institution to the brotherhood.

There were 58 added in the revival at Kalamazoo, where R. L. Handley, the pastor, did the preaching, assisted by the Kendalls as leaders in song. This is the largest number of additions to the church in 13 years.

Among the changes of pastors we record the removal of A. J. J. Hutchinson from Canyon, Texas, to Colorado City, Colo.; C. A. Vanwinkle from Vanceburg, Ky., to Harlan, Ky.; and Philip Welsh from Mulkeytown, Ill., to Fredicktown, Mo.

Friends and brethren of W. T. Holton, pastor at Fayetteville, Ark., will sympathize with him in the loss of his father who died recently at Louisville, Ky. His father was Granville Holton and had been a member of the Christian church all his life.

Religious statistics show that Christianity in India has increased in the different provinces from 25 to 446 per cent. The day of small things is ours yet, but who knows how soon the throngs will come to Jesus from those eastern lands.

The Sunday-school at Chicago Heights pledged $1,000 to the church on dedication day, with three years' time to pay it. In exactly one year from the time the pledge was made, the money was all in. There were 284 present on Easter Sunday.

L. Siebenmorgen has begun work with the Eastland Mission Church, Nashville, Tenn., a new church which was organized last November. Mr. Siebenmorgen has been spending some two years in the University of Missouri.

In a recent article in Collier's Weekly, P. C. Macfarlane classifies George H. Combs of Kansas City as one of the prominent pulpiteers of America. In a recent issue of Harper's Weekly Peter Ainslie of Baltimore was spoken of as one of the great world leaders in the Union Movement. His picture accompanied the article.

There were 24 additions as the result of the Decision Week that was observed in First Church, Akron, O., where George Darsie is pastor. Mr. Darsie recently separated his adult class and decided to teach the men only. Already the men's class numbers 180.

The church at Warren, O., where F. N. Calvin is pastor, is planning a new building and has already progressed satisfactorily on their building fund. The movement for a new church recently received new impetus by the announcement that the Carnegie Foundation had agreed to give $1,000 for an organ.

O. E. Tomes was voted an increase of salary at the close of the recent meetings held in the Mishawaka Church by White and Shaul. The number of additions to the church during the meeting was 142 and the work has received an impetus that insures a great year's work.

Dr. J. H. Jowett of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City is delivering the Lyman Beecher Foundation lectures at Yale this month. He takes for his theme, "The Preacher." Dr. Jowett is recognized as one of the greatest pulpiteers of the world today. He is having no difficulty in filling the great Fifth Avenue Church.

Mrs. Minnie Ross, wife of Rev. Floyd Ross, pastor of First Church, Vancouver, Wash., was ordained as a minister of the gospel of Christ at Vancouver, Apr. 14. Mrs. Ross attended Eugene Bible University at the same time that her husband was in school there and she has been assisting him in his work since. She will be pastor of the Sara, Wash., Church. J. W. Baker of Takoma delivered the ordination sermon.

Mrs. Bryan lives a mile and a half from Independence Church, Mo., and has five children, but she gets to Sunday-school every Sunday morning with them and teaches one of the largest women's classes in Jackson County. There may be other records to beat it, but this is a fairly good showing! In a recent convention address Mrs. Bryan said: "I never yet saw the Sunday-school that I would send my children to unless I went with them."

A. T. Campbell, superintendent of the Palmer playgrounds in Chicago and formerly one of the Chicago pastors, has been speaking in Hannibal, Mo., on the work in which he is engaged. The Commercial Club gave a luncheon and listened to the exposition of the plan, the Woman's Club had one address, one was given at the high school building and one in the First Christian Church. It is hoped that sufficient interest will be aroused to enable a similar movement to be started in Hannibal.

George A. Reinhart has resigned at Keokuk, Ia., to accept a call to Ionia, Ia., beginning work on May 1 at the latter point.

The church at Moore, Mont., has added 45 to its membership as a result of the special meetings held by Pastor Percy T. Carnes.

The Disciples of Christ have organized a church at Conrad, Mont., with about 25 members. Evangelistic services have been held by State Evangelist H. G. Bennett for about five weeks.

W. H. Erskine, at present in America on furlough from Japan, was one of the speakers at the convention of the district that met at McKees Rocks, Penn., April 11. There were over 100 delegates in attendance.

State secretary for Montana, J. S. Raum, has an eye-opening article in the April "Christian Men" which should be read by every one who feels the need of evangelizing America. The subject, "Taking the Northwest for Christ," is indicative of its trend and its spirit.

Walter M. Jordan is to accompany Dr. Franklin McElfresh on a Sunday-school educational tour of Montana, May 22 to June 3. Mr. Jordan is state teacher training superintendent, and being a Montana product, the only native born preacher in the state, he is well and favorably known. His subjects will be "The Bible School Vision" and "The Teacher the Highest Office."

Herbert Yeuell wires us from Guelph, Ont., on Apr. 15: "Started here yesterday in city hall, largest auditorium. Our buiid- is small and badly located. Membership is small, but of Guelph's leading people. No baptism in two years, owing to English and Scotch solid conservatism as to church allegiance. Meetings on English plan. American method has never won. From this British soil our paryers and love go with Brother Scoville and his assistants to Australia. Mrs. Yeuell, the Carrolls and Miss Roth assisting."

The Freemason St. Church, Norfolk, Va., is in splendid condition. Three of the members recently offered to give $25,000 provided the rest of the congregation would give a like amount and on Easter pledges were made to the amount of more than $14,000. There is every reason to hope that the entire amount will be raised and the new building erected. The pastor, C. M. Watson, recently received 24 persons into membership, 12 of whom came by confession of faith.

At the recent annual convention of Disciple missionaries in India, a plan of union was drawn up to be submitted to the executive committees of both home boards which, if adopted, will effectually unite the forces of the two societies, which have always worked in harmony but will now be able to economize in the matter of administration. Seven young preachers are reported as ready for service in the field as products of the school maintained there. The parish where our missionaries are working has a population of more than two million.

Levi Marshall, pastor at Nevada, Mo., writes us: "In an Easter rally, lasting from March 31 to April 12, there were 12 confessions. The preaching was ably done by A. N. Lindsey, pastor at Clinton, Mo., and C. E. Wagner, pastor at Webb City, sang very acceptably the last week of the meeting. Both the preacher and singer endeared themselves to the hearts of the Nevada Church."

E. N. Phillips sends us a wire reporting: "W. L. Harris just entered his second week here at Phoenix, Ariz. A wonderful meeting is in progress with 33 additions to date and great crowds. The church is packed to the doors and scores are coming to Christ."

At Kirksville, Mo., where W. D. Endress is pastor, Easter Sunday was a great day. An indebtedness of long standing was liquidated and 23 were received into the church, ten by confession. The church is rejoicing in the growth and the outlook for successful work.

Mrs. Mary E. Culver and R. H. Stockton have each announced a new gift of $10,000 to Christian University, Canton, Mo. Mrs. Culver's late husband and Mr. Stockton were associated in business. This gift makes a total of $65,000 which Mrs. Culver has given to the institution during the past year, while Mr. Stockton has given in all some $75,000 toward the building and endowment funds. The friends of education everywhere rejoice with the Canton workers on the coming of these gifts and congratulate the givers on their liberality and wisdom in thus so wisely investing their funds where the cause of training the youth will be so greatly strengthened.

G. L. Peters, pastor at Central Church, Springfield, Mo., is one of the leaders in the organization of an association for social welfare in the city. Ministers of all the churches are interested and will coöperate. The social conditions that are capable of improvement when energetically attacked are a challenge to the forces of Christianity in any community. The Good Samaritan was indeed a neighbor to him who fell among thieves and he has deserved all the commendation that has been awarded him. He did the best he could but one of his spirit would have rejoiced to have been able to have the road to Jerico adequately patrolled so as to prevent any such disastrous hold-ups.

New Zealand recently voted on the proposition, "Shall the manufacture, sale and importation of intoxicating liquors on the islands be forever prohibited?" The result was 255,000 votes for prohibition and 202,000 against it. The measure, however, cannot be effective, since the constitution requires 60 per cent of the vote polled on a referendum of this kind. The temperance vote only lacked 5 per cent of making New Zealand the first prohibition country in the world. She will probably take the honor yet. There is some disposition on the part of the prohibitionists to complain of the provision requiring more than a majority, but the experience of American communities would seem to confirm the wisdom of it. When 60 per cent of the people do vote for prohibition, there will be no problem of law enforcement. The sentiment will be overwhelming.

A new institution of learning among the Disciples of Christ has recently been launched in Georgia. At the state convention at Macon, Apr. 10, it was decided to begin at once the project of founding Georgia Christian College which is to be established at Atlanta very shortly. It is hoped to be ready for work in 1913. The selection of Atlanta is wise from several points of view, as it is the center in the state where the Disciples are strongest and also it has been demonstrated that the large centers of population are, all things considered, the best for the location of colleges. It is to be hoped, however, that our Georgia brethren will not make the mistake that has been so often made in the past by our brethren in their desire to have Christian schools. The institution should not begin till there is in sight a sufficient funds to properly equip and endow it. The struggling, impecunious college founded now will fare much worse than a similar one did a generation ago, and that is saying much.

James Small, secretary of the Evangelists' Association, has issued the following statement and appeal: "The National Association of Evangelists, organized at the Portland convention, proposes to unite our

DR. PRICE'S CREAM
Baking Powder
Made from pure, grape cream of tartar
Makes home baking easy. Nothing can be substituted for it in making, quickly and perfectly, delicate hot biscuit, hot-breads, muffins, cake and pastry. Insures the food against alum.
Pure, Healthful, Reliable
PRICE BAKING POWDER CO.
CHICAGO
NOTE.—If mixtures called baking powder are offered you at lower price, remember they are mostly made from alum, a metallic acid deleterious to health.

evangelists, evangelistic ministers and singing evangelists in a compact body for the purpose of advancing the interests of evangelism throughout the churches of Christ, protecting the members and churches from unworthy men and women, and otherwise contribute toward the welfare of the individual members of the society. The membership cards for the year 1912 are now ready and being distributed among those who have paid their dues for the year, amounting to $2. This entitles the member to membership and 100 copies of official letterhead. A letter has been sent to all evangelists, evangelistic ministers and singing evangelists by the office of the secretary, E. E. Elliott, of Kansas City, Mo., inviting all such persons to membership in the National Association and setting forth the objects of the coöperation, etc. The response thus far has been most encouraging. We want to go up to the Louisville convention with at least 200 members in the association. We are to have a program the last day of the convention that will be full of interest and power. The Louisville convention will probably be the largest in point of attendance ever held by the churches of Christ, outside of the centennial. Don't you want to have a part in making the National Association of Evangelists be to its members and to the churches what it ought to be and can be if our evangelists will unite with us in making the coöperation possible. Brother, let us hear from you."

Reimbursement or Retrenchment, Which?

The Board of the American Christian Missionary Society, in faith, has appropriated for a number of years more money than its income, to sustain and enlarge its missionary enterprise. It has cherished the hope that the Disciples of Christ would furnish the means for enlarging its missionary program. While gifts from congregations, Bible schools and individuals have increased annually, they have not been commensurate with the needs of the society and the dignity and ability of our people. An accumulated deficit forces a crisis upon the society, which must be met by prompt reimbursement of the treasury or retrenchment in the fields. There is need of $60,000, above the usual annual receipts, to maintain our missionaries and support dependent churches. In full confidence, the board challenges the brotherhood with the fact that not one missionary among the 491 in its employ, and not a mission supported by it can be forsaken without real loss and bitter disappointment to communities and the church at large.

Brethren, we have been silent while in our efforts, day and night, through all seasons, to arouse appreciation of religious needs in our country. The hour has come when we must make known, through our religious papers, the humiliating fact that the Disciples of Christ are giving only $120,764.06 to the mother Society to meet the needs of a continent. In 1911, states on the rim of the territory where our numerical strength is greatest, increased their contributions to American Missions. Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Kansas and Oklahoma, all these in the heart of the brotherhood, came short of their apportionments to the home land. Texas and Kentucky were exceptions. On such a record, where is our patriotism? Where is our faithfulness to Christ? Where is our shame?

Never in the history of the church in America have such serious factors been recognized in our national life as at the present time. All familiar elements that have made the Republic complex in its constituencies, are increased, while new influences, dangerous to our religion, spring into prominence. On the soil of the United States, there are now 74 heathen temples. In these are all ministrations of such temples in heathen lands. $40,000 were expended by Buddhists on the Pacific coast last year. Japan gave an idol, 500 years old, for a Buddhist shrine on the Pacific Coast. Mormonism is more defiant, more aggressive, if possible, and certainly exercising greater commercial and political power than in any year of its history. Roman Catholicism, within the last month, has obtained practical control of the Government Indian Schools. Thirteen states of the union are now foreign. New York, our largest city and second greatest in the world, is now foreign.

Brethren of our common faith! all sentiment, romance, novelty, optimism and pessimism are eliminated in this attempt to have these bald facts considered by every loyal follower of Christ. This is not an alarmist's strategy to get funds in order to maintain a record; but sober truth. The only unifying and subduing agent which can reduce this Babel to harmony and preserve Christianity with an open Bible, is the plea and prayer of our Lord.

The American Christian Missionary Society has shared, with the brethren everywhere, confidence, by spreading before them, monthly, its business transactions. There has been no useless expenditure of means or neglect of duties within the power of the society to meet them. Its administrative expenses have been reduced to less than 7 per cent, and strict economy is practiced by all its workers. A question of retrenchment must be answered by ministers and churches by the May offering. Will modern disciples of Christ, with hands put to the plow and looking back, escape the condemnation of our Lord, who said: "Not fit for the kingdom of God"? We are praying that this crisis will not be a Kadesh-Barnea.

I. N. McCash, Secretary.

"It is not going to be very difficult for us to raise the $600 for the living link."—Linley G. Gordon, Louisville, Ky., pastor of the Clifton Church.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

Economizes Butter, Flour, Eggs; makes the food more appetizing and wholesome

The only Baking Powder made from Royal Grape Cream of Tartar

Foreign Society News

"James C. Ogden (of Tibet) was with us yesterday and helped our people very much with his great message. The devotion of this young man to Christ and his work is remarkable. He cannot help making a deep impression upon the minds and hearts of multitudes that hear his message. He is a great inspiration to the work wherever he goes."—G. M. Brooks, Carlisle, Ky.

Mrs. Jens Morton of South Bend, Ind., an annuitant of the Foreign Society, died April 9. She was a good woman and did what she could. She had an abiding interest in the Lord's work.

M. B. Madden, Osaka, Japan, reports five baptisms in that city of a million souls. This is the first fruit of the work in what is known as the factory district where Mr. Madden has been preaching twice a week for some three weeks. He says they are greatly encouraged over the work in that city.

C. E. Robinson, Sendai, Japan, reports that our native evangelist, Kawamura, recently traveled 150 miles for the express purpose of baptizing a man and his wife. He had chance to give the woman some Christian literature on the train and this led to her accepting Christ with her household. Mr. Robinson also reports two other baptisms, both young men.

The missionaries on the Congo have prepared a little book of Old Testament stories. At the time of writing it was just being printed. This book is to be used as a textbook in the school and will be used to preach from a good deal also. Miss Eck is overseeing the printing of the last pages while A. F. Hensey is away with the Oregon.

The government general of the Belgian Congo has sent to the mission the final papers for Monieka. The law allows six months to occupy the station. Permission was granted to open Monieka on the ground that a medical missionary would be stationed there. The Society has not yet found a man for that position.

An Epoch Making Congress

(Continued from page 19.)

our older men possessed of his spirit, the young men would often lack heart to voice heresy. His appeal for sympathy and tolerance in the discussion of these questions could not but find echo in every heart present.

Discussion Period Too Short.

It was to be regretted that the time for discussion was so short. Both speakers had exceeded their time at a session which began late. Had that discussion continued another hour, it would have been historic. There was no end of people ready to talk and all in good spirit. The house, on the motion of Dr. Richardson, moved to proceed with the business of the Congress, so there were but twenty minutes in which a paper called by Dr. Garrison "the most radical in the history of our people" was given consideration. Dr. Garrison has a repartee quick as a sword-thrust at times and all enjoyed a facetious reminiscence. He said that but twice in his life had his brethren put him up to defend the conservative side of the baptism question. The other time had been when he met J. A. Lord in the Missouri lectureship and confuted him on the question of receiving the unimmersed. He said he had over-done that job and only hoped that he had not over-done this one also. The laugh at Mr. Morrison's expense was enjoyed by all, but by none more than Mr. Morrison himself.

Professor Samuel Z. Batten, Guest Speaker, Representing the Baptist Denomination.

Effects of the Discussion.

Of the impression this session made, there can be no doubt. Scores of young men have learned to look on both sides of what has been for them hitherto a closed question. The address of C. C. Morrison made a deep impression. Many are thinking and talking about a point of view which they had not thought could be defended with so great logic and scholarship.

The Congress has arranged for a permanent organization and has elected B. A. Abbott as the next president and A. W. Taylor as secretary. They will enroll members who will belong whether they attend or not and these will furnish the sinews of war.

We could have wished for better press reports in Kansas City. Some papers sent no

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION

Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic literary product of the Disciples' first century of history. Thousands have been sold and the volume is enjoying a steady demand. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Price, $1.00.

Z. T. Sweeney says:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

AN ILLUMINATING BIT OF AMERICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that make them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 35c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—The Christian Worker.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

A FASCINATING RELIGIOUS STORY.

ATLAR STAIRS

By Charles J. Scofield.

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.00.

"A most excellent serial."—J. H. Garrison.
"An admirable story."—J. J. Haley.
"A most forceful and healthful piece of reading."—Z. T. Sweeney.
"If one begins this book he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished."—Christian Observer.
"A strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement."—Religious Telescope.

BOOKS BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

BASIC TRUTHS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75c; paper, 35c.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style.

"For me the finest chapter in the book is that on the Resurrection. This gets one back into the lives of the Apostles on that Resurrection morn. It is a historical study indeed. One hears the tread of conquering hosts and the beating of the wings of twelve legions of angels."—P. C. Macfarlane.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

STUDIES IN THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

Cloth, $1.00.

One of the volumes in the Constructive Series of handbooks. It is prepared for the use of classes in secondary schools and in the secondary division of the Sunday-schools. It presents the entire material of First Samuel with explanatory notes, questions, and illustrations. It is used in a large number of Sunday-schools, in grades of the ages of eleven to fourteen.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS

Cloth, $1.25.

An introduction to the literature of the New Testament. The book is a work of collaboration with James M. Campbell, D. D., a prominent Congregational minister, who supplies the interpretative material in connection with each of the books of the New Testament. A handbook widely used by individual students and classes.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

Cloth, 35 cents.

A small handbook prepared for classes desiring to study the outline of the life of Christ, and a brief statement of the most important teachings of the Master. It is based upon the entire material of the four Gospels arranged in chronological order.

THE PROPHETS OF ISRAEL

Cloth, 35 cents.

A handbook on this, the most important theme of the Old Testament. It gives a survey of the history of prophecy in Israel from the beginning of the national life to the close of the Maccabæan age. It has been widely used in institutions of education and in Bible classes, and has passed through several editions.

THE RULING QUALITY

Board 35 cents net. Postage 4 cents.

A small book of sixty pages dealing with faith as the conquering quality in human life. The theme is interwoven with comments upon the quest of the Holy Grail as illustrated in Mr. Abbey's panels.

PUBLISHED BY THE BETHANY PRESS 700 E. 40th ST., CHICAGO.
NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

reporters and others sent people who could not understand the significance of the gathering. One speaker was represented as advocating baptism as a sanitary measure! At another time a journal reported that the Disciples were met to organize! In most of the reports, the conviction was voiced that the Disciples were going to split. Such utterly inadequate and false reports are worse than none. In the future the committee should arrange for accurate newspaper representation.

It has been a great and historic gathering of our people. Those preachers who stayed away will hear to the end of our history that they missed something. Let us hope that the next session, which will be held in St. Louis next year, will be able to confront us with a group of equally significant problems and throw upon them in equal measure a great flood of light.

Indiana State Convention

The state convention this year will be held with the church at Hammond May 13-16. The first session will be held Monday evening, May 13. The keynote address will be delivered at this session by Rev. C. H. Winders, of Indianapoiis. His theme will be "The Plea of Our Fathers and Our Plea." Tuesday forenoon and Wednesday forenoon will be largely devoted to the business of the convention. The last address of the convention will be delivered by Bishop Anderson of Chicago, Thursday evening. This will be a great session on Christian union and will be the climax of the convention. No one can afford to leave before the close.

L. E. MURRAY, Cor. Secy.

The Crisis in American Missions

The American Society has announced through its magazine and elsewhere the policy of severe retrenchment which has been forced upon it by the churches. For five years it has allowed its appropriations to run in excess of its income, hoping that the churches would finally heed its cry for help and justify its faith both in the churches and in the mission fields. At last it sees the day of judgment approaching and in order to save the ship from the rocks it has been forced to retrench and the order has been made effective immediately.

This neglect of the home base of supply for all our work is amazing. For years our churches have shown increased appreciation of the value and importance of every other field but that of America. The Disciples of Christ have two national boards, each of which are spending one-third more in pagan lands than our churches give to the American board for the home land, yet the home land is the basis of all other work, contains forty-eight millions of people away from Christ and the expense of work in a highly civilized country is vastly more than in an uncivilized land.

The churches in the middle west, where lies the great strength of the Disciples, need to be awakened to our alarming situation. Our churches out on the mission fields are responding year by year with increased offerings. It is from this source that the American Board has increased its receipts, but these offerings are restricted and must needs go back to the fields with increased appropriations for development. The offerings from the churches in our strong states have actually decreased in the last year. The churches of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri all fell down in their support to American missions. Right heroically are the men on the mission fields responding to this emergency.

F. F. Grim, Albuquerque, N. M., says: "I can scarcely believe it. It seems to me there must be some mistake. This means wreck and ruin to our work in New Mexico-West Texas. Is there not some way it can be averted? We were never in better condition for a forward movement. We have more and better men with better prospects for the future than ever before. But there is scarcely a man who can go on with his work without the appropriation he is now receiving. Most of them are receiving small salaries considering the prices they have to pay for living. Can you not possibly stand by us this year? I believe we can prove to the stronger churche that this is money well expended. What are the men with families to do? I don't know how they are to get along on less, and if they are compelled to move that means financial embarrassment for months and it may be for years to come. Some, it may be, will be forced to leave the ministry in order to make a living. And at this time when there is reported to be such a dearth of ministers this will be nothing short of a calamity to our cause. What inducement will there be for young men to enter the ministry? What kind of a crisis have we come to? I pray that something may be done to avert this awful calamity to our work."

GRANT K. LEWIS.

New York City Mission Notes

During March nine were added to the mission churches and they contributed a total of $418.76 for Missions and local support.

The special revival meeting, conducted by Evangelist Lutz, at the Borough Park Church is increasing in interest and power. The splendid ability of Mr. Lutz to present Bible teaching is of great value to this new work.

Central Church, led by Dr. J. M. Philputt, took their first offering for Missions Sunday, March 31. Over $1,000 was received.

Easter Sunday was truly a "red letter" day for Sterling Place Church. Thirty-one years ago this church assumed a mortgage of $12,000. At various times it was reduced, but it was a slow process and only $2,600 had been paid. When M. M. Amunson entered upon the pastorate of this church he felt the first important duty was to remove this burden before any real progress could be made. While it was a heroic task for a church already burdened to meet its annual expenses, they faced it and began preparation by arousing the people to the desire to see the mortgage removed. Easter Sunday was set as the day when the church should be free. The day was ideal, audience was splendid, and $8,000 was raised in about thirty minutes. Other pledges are coming in and the total of $9,400 is assured by Nov. 1, 1912. M. M. Amunson entered upon his duties here Sept., 1909. During his work fifty-six have been added to the church, $2,000 spent on decorations and repairs of the church building, and now the total mortgage raised. Mr. Amunson is preaching to steadily increasing audiences. The outlook is bright for this splendid church, that will most efficiently lead our forces in Brooklyn. If the Hoosier State can send us a few more Amunsons the future of our work in this great city will be assured.

Z. T. Sweeney of the Lenox Ave. Church is preaching to a crowded house every Sunday night and the church is already needing more room.

JOS. KEEVIL,
Supt. of City Missions.

Dr. D., a rich physician, told the committee who called upon him that he really could not give more than fifty cents each week toward the pastor's salary. He thought $25 a year a very generous allowance for him; but he sent home the same day a few pieces of furniture, for which his wife was puzzled for house room. They cost $25.—Lutheran.

REMEMBER

CHILDREN'S DAY

For Foreign Missions

FIRST SUNDAY IN JUNE

SUPPLIES FREE

THE UNUSED CROSS.

ONE HALF THE WORLD IS BEYOND THE REACH OF ANY MESSENGER OF JESUS CHRIST.
AND I, IF I BE LIFTED UP FROM THE EARTH, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day Supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Bible Schools observing the day in the interest of Heathen Missions.

FREE SUPPLIES

1st. Coin Pocket Missionary Collectors. These are a great improvement on the missionary boxes formerly used. Attractive, convenient, suitable for old or young.

2d. Darkness and Light. The new Children's Day exercise by P. H. Duncan. Filled with beautiful songs, exercises, and recitations. Good for older pupils as well as little folks. Adapted to any school.

ORDER AT ONCE. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance. Write to

STEPHEN J. COREY,
Box 884. Cincinnati, Ohio.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

CENTRAL CHURCH

New York, 142 West 81st St. Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

BOWLDEN BELLS FOR CHURCH AND SCHOOL

Sweet Tone Far Sounding Durable

Catalogue Free.

AMERICAN BELL & FOUNDRY CO., NORTHVILLE, MICH.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL

Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27

ESTABLISHED 1858

THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

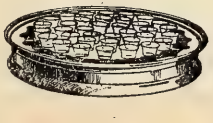
WE READ and clip for you daily everything printed in the current country and city press of America pertaining to the subject of particular interest to you.

NEWSPAPERS contain many items daily which would inform you exclusively of where you can secure new business, an order or a contract; where a new store has been started, a new firm incorporated or a contract is to be let. A daily press clipping service means more business

FOR YOU. Send Stamp for Booklet

THE CONSOLIDATED PRESS CLIPPING CO.

1109 167 W. Washington St., Chicago, U. S. A.



THOMAS INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE

OUR SPECIAL SELF-COLLECTING Cushioned Tray has no equal. NOISELESS, DUST PROOF, INTERLOCKING. Best for pew or altar communion. Uses short, shallow cup, glass or aluminum (indestructible) no tipping of head. Saves ONE-FOURTH cost other services. Over 12,000 churches use. Send for catalog and "Special Introductory Offer." Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 120 Lima, Ohio

The Christian Century

Charles Clayton Morrison.

A Progressive Religious Weekly For Christian Homes

-- Editors --

Herbert L. Willett

Thoroughly Up-to-Date

The Christian Century is a progressive religious weekly for Christian homes. It is abreast of the times. It stands for those growing ideals that are fast taking possession of the minds of modern men and women. It believes in education. It is not alarmed at the work of scholarship in religion. It gives a vision of things as they are to be. It places the reader in touch with those great lives the country over which are being spent for the welfare of humanity. It strives to develop in its readers the open mind, a broad outlook and the habit and passion of service.

Devoted to Christian Union

Of the many qualities that give The Christian Century distinction, none is more striking than the frank way in which it discusses the problem of Christian unity. To the great goal of a united church this paper is bending every effort. In this enterprise it stands with the Disciples of Christ, interpreting their historic plea to divided Christendom.

Many Additional Attractions

During the year that is ahead The Christian Century will be improved in many ways. More money will be spent in its mechanical form as well as in providing better literary product. The greatly increased body of readers which this paper has enjoyed in recent times, warrants the publishers in adding further attractions to its pages.

A Paper with a Mission

A host of present readers of The Christian Century believe that it is not only reflecting passing events and thought, but making history by its bold championship of the ideals which are today struggling for embodiment.

An Inspiration in the Home

The whole round of life is ours. The Christian Century is a religious inspiration in every home into which it goes. Pastors will find the readers of this paper the most useful and intelligent workers they have. Its pages are adapted to every member of the family. Children and young people, as well as grown-up folk, will find fascinating reading matter in its various departments. Continued stories of the highest grade are running almost constantly.

We Wish You To Bring Your Friends Into the Christian Century Family!

Subscribe now Two Dollars a Year $1.50 if Paid in Advance

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

700-714 East Fortieth Street, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX May 2, 1912 Number 18

A Cluster of Dooms

An Editorial by E. B. Barnes

Reveries of a Minister's Wife

By Mrs. Marie Ballou Garvin

Clara Barton

Dr. William E. Barton's Funeral Discourse

CHICAGO

Some Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing.
You need every one of this splendid list.

NOW PREPARING FOR THE PRESS.

THE MEANING OF BAPTISM

By Charles Clayton Morrison.

This notable volume is nearly ready for the press. A very large edition will be run at the first printing. It is expected that the book will have a wide sale throughout the Christian world. 250 pages, Cloth, $1.25

When this book appears it will be seen to be the most important work treating of the teachings of the Disciples that has appeared in this generation. It deals with a theme that is peculiarly alive to every mind that has had any part in the Disciples' reformatory movement. The author writes with conviction, but wholly without partisanship. He states issues incisively and faces them squarely. He holds an original and independent point of view for the treatment of the subject of Christian Baptism. He accepts the position of the Disciples as to the practice of immersion only, but rejects much of the reasoning traditionally put forth by his brethren and the Baptists in support of this practice. The book is refreshingly frank. In the opening chapter the author puts himself squarely in opposition to Alexander Campbell's argument.

FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

THE LIFE OF JESUS IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Loa Ermina Scott. A new Text Book for Young People's and Adult Bible Classes. Introduction by Professor E. B. Wakefield, of Hiram College. 120 pages, 50 cents. In quantities of 10 or more, 40 cents each.

This book comes nearer meeting all demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions — all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportions. It is the product of experience. The author used the material in her own successful career as a teacher. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in The Life of Christ, and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, Springfield, Ill.

For the purpose for which it was prepared it is superior to all other books with which I am familiar.—GEO. A. RAGAN, Claremont, Cal.

This work can not only be used profitably in our Bible-schools, but in Bible study classes of all sorts. Dr. Scott has done a splendid piece of work, which deserves a wide circulation.—CLAUDE E. HILL, Valparaiso, Ind.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Cleveland, Ohio.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study.—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland, Ohio.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the Gospels themselves. I would like to see this book used by a class in our Sunday-school in the near future.—A. W. FORTUNE.

The book is a happy combination of the catechetical and analytic methods of teaching and would thus seem to give the largest latitude for the exercise of the teacher's own personality.—B. A. ABBOTT, St. Louis, Mo.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION

Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic literary product of the Disciples' first century of history. Thousands have been sold and the volume is enjoying a steady demand. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Price, $1.00.

Z. T. Sweeney says:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

AN ILLUMINATING BIT OF AMERICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that make them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 35c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—The Christian Worker.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

A FASCINATING RELIGIOUS STORY.

ATLAR STAIRS

By Charles J. Scofield.

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.00.

"A most excellent serial."—J. H. Garrison.

"An admirable story."—J. J. Haley.

"A most forceful and healthful piece of reading."—Z. T. Sweeney.

"If one begins this book he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished."—Christian Observer.

"A strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement."—Religious Telescope.

BOOKS BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

BASIC TRUTHS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Paper, 127 pages, 35 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style.

"For me the finest chapter in the book is that on the Resurrection. This gets one back into the lives of the Apostles on that Resurrection morn. It is a historical study indeed. One hears the tread of conquering hosts and the beating of the wings of twelve legions of angels."—P. C. Macfarlane.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

STUDIES IN THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

Cloth, $1.00.

One of the volumes in the Constructive Series of handbooks. It is prepared for the use of classes in secondary schools and in the secondary division of the Sunday-schools. It presents the entire material of First Samuel with explanatory notes, questions, and illustrations. It is used in a large number of Sunday-schools, in grades of the ages of eleven to fourteen.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS

Cloth, $1.25.

An introduction to the literature of the New Testament. The book is a work of collaboration with James M. Campbell, D. D., a prominent Congregational minister, who supplies the interpretative material in connection with each of the books of the New Testament. A handbook widely used by individual students and classes.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

Cloth, 35 cents.

A small handbook prepared for classes desiring to study the outline of the life of Christ, and a brief statement of the most important teachings of the Master. It is based upon the entire material of the four Gospels arranged in chronological order.

THE PROPHETS OF ISRAEL

Cloth, 35 cents.

A handbook on this, the most important theme of the Old Testament. It gives a survey of the history of prophecy in Israel from the beginning of the national life to the close of the Maccabæan age. It has been widely used in institutions of education and in Bible classes, and has passed through several editions.

THE RULING QUALITY

Board 35 cents net. Postage 4 cents.

A small book of sixty pages dealing with faith as the conquering quality in human life. The theme is interwoven with comments upon the quest of the Holy Grail as illustrated in Mr. Abbey's panels.

PUBLISHED BY THE BETHANY PRESS NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO. 700 E. 40th ST., CHICAGO.

The Christian Century
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The Triumph of Man

SINCE THE TITANIC WENT DOWN THE voice of the cynic has been conspicuously silent. The cynic likes to cast slurs at manhood, to impute ignoble motives to noble deeds and to discount every story of apparent unselfishness with a sneer.

But the sublime chivalry of those who went down with the fated ship has revealed manhood's essential glory so plainly that no man dares to occupy the seat of the scorner. It is estimated that the material loss of the great vessel and her cargo was about fifteen millions of dollars. But over against that loss is to be placed the incalculable increment by which our common humanity has been enriched. The bravery, the self-control, the chivalry, the self-sacrifice, of passengers and crew have passed into the life of mankind, so that the value of every man has been enhanced thereby.

* * *

At first report the details of this event framed themselves in a ghastly picture with nature's forces in the foreground crushing man and defeating his purposes. In conflict with the vast powers of material nature, represented by the sea and the iceberg and the night, man seemed puny. How small, how helpless he is in the midst of the material order! As if to break his proud boasting, nature broke in two his "absolutely unsinkable ship" as Sampson broke the withes that bound him.

But this first impression of the meaning of the tragic picture changes as the picture is studied. Gradually nature with her forces recedes into the background, leaving man to occupy the central place. The big thing in the picture, the significant thing, the vast motif in the design of the mighty Artist, is not nature, not physical force, not fate, not defeat, not death, but manhood and manhood triumphant over all material forces.

Let us not name the picture "The Failure of Man," simply because his boat went down with the waves and Death swept sixteen hundred souls off the deck like the player sweeps the chess-men off the board when the game is done. But let us name the picture, "The Triumph of Man," for in his death and his failure Man was never so glorious and Death never so helpless.

The disaster sets out in bold relief the fact that man actually has triumphed over the sea. The sinking of the Titanic was not the rule but the exception to the rule. It is not the rule for man's boats to sink. It is the rule for them to make their port. The wonderful thing about sea travel is not that the Titanic went down but that ten thousand vessels reach port. It is years since the life of a passenger has been lost at sea. The picture shows no good reason for discounting man's power to control nature for his own designs.

* * *

But it is the moral greatness of man that stands revealed in the picture in outlines of increasing clearness as the days pass into weeks and we get a truer perspective in which to view the disaster. That there was no panic, no wild scramble each man for himself, shows how far our humanity has ascended from the customs of the jungle. No wonder the cynic is dumb as he views this aspect of the picture. It is his theory that a man will give anything for his life, that apparent unselfishness is always alloyed with mean self-regard, that when a man is driven to his extremity he will act on motives of self-interest. Small comfort for the cynic in this picture of the Titanic! "Women and children first!" is the command to which the brave souls of crew and passengers yielded active and willing obedience.

And these were not the pick of humanity who stood in such admirable discipline while the women and children filled the life boats. They were not carefully selected moral leaders, whose souls had been trained and tested by special disciplines. They were the "common run" of our humanity—first class, second class and third class passengers, yes, and first class, second class and third class men. There were first class men among the third class passengers and third class men among the first class passengers. The sixteen hundred who went down were typical of mankind. And in their courage and discipline and self-control they glorified the race of humanity which they represented. They revealed not merely what man is at his highest but what he is at the average.

Yes, manhood triumphed when the Titanic sank.

* * *

But not until we take a point of view before the picture from which we can see Man facing Death do we grasp the deepest motif of the Artist. Death stands in the picture with a leer of triumph on his face. But it is a fading leer, a fading triumph. The exultation with which he came upon the scene to work his work of desolation is still depicted on his face, but something else is depicted on his face. He seems to see the failure of his own success; he sees that he is defeated in the moment of his triumph.

And then we look at Man. Shuddering, yes, as the cold sea creeps up around him. But he stands with his cap in his hand gallantly waving at his dear ones in the life boat! This is not Death's victory; this is Man's victory. This is not Man's death; it is Death's death.

* * *

With the brave musicians playing until their instruments filled with water, with a millionaire stepping out of a life boat in which his wife was being saved to make room for a woman, with a soldier siezing and firmly pulling back a single panic stricken man who had broken the discipline and was leaping into a boat, with a young woman giving up her place to a mother whose children needed her to live, and, after all had gone down, with the captain and his first mate each siezing a little child and leaping from the bridge into the cold sea—with details like these filling up the composite of the picture, think you, O cynic, that you can ever open your mouth again in detraction of the Man whom God made?

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Fraternity Evil in High Schools

Twelve states of the union now have definite movements in them for the elimination of secret societies from the public schools. This general movement has a number of reasons. In the first place the public school is fundamentally a democratic institution. It is a school for all the children of all the people. It is supported by taxes from rich and poor alike. Hence any movement of young people from wealthy homes to organize to exclude less favored children from the privileges of the schools and to make them unhappy, is essentially undemocratic. Snobbery is contrary to Americanism anywhere and above all in our public institutions. Furthermore the worst of fraternity and sorority evils are to be found among those of high school age. There is more temptation to use the secret organization for immoral purposes. There is an exaggerated feeling about the importance of pull as compared with ability. There is marked inferiority in scholarship.

The fraternity teaches young people to lie. A celebrated pastor in a suburb of Chicago found to his surprise that his son had been expelled from the high school on account of membership in a secret society after this same young man had signed a statement promising to refrain from holding membership in such organizations while in the school. When questioned by his father about the matter, he explained that his fraternity had a rule that when any one asked a member if he belonged to a fraternity he was by that fact expelled and he was only reinstated the moment he denied membership! It was with such subterfuge that the secret societies tried to live in that suburb. Often mis-guided snobbish parents with social ambitions for their children have encouraged the fraternity evil. They have been obsessed with the typical American heresy that pull and not personal power is the basis of success in life.

Owen Wister has just finished the publication of a novel in McClure's upon the fraternity situation in Yale. In this novel he takes a position decidedly unfavorable to those organizations. We have been saying that fraternities are bad in high school but good in colleges and universities. Perhaps even this position must yet be modified.

The Divorce Question in Drama

The divorce question has long been debated in this land of divorce by the literary men with the majority of the talent on the side of easy divorce. At bottom it has been the church against the socialists. Only a few socialists have professed faith in free love but practically all of them have favored divorces obtainable on demand. The exception to this has been the Christian Socialist movement. Lately the question has come to be absorbing enough to the city mind that it has been dramatized. First we had Joseph Medill Patterson's play, "Rebellion." In this play, the playwright tells the story of the misery of a married woman and her final separation from mother church and her union with a second husband. In this play the story of incompatibility is played up in the most approved dramatic style.

Now we have on the boards the play by McGuire called "Divorce." This drama gives the answer to the other. In the opening scene, the clergyman discourses with a lawyer friend who is a socialist with reference to the book "Rebellion." In their conversation, the lawyer socialist, inconsistently enough, argues like an individualist on a matter of the most fundamental social import. The priest insists that an occasional unfortunate individual should be sacrificed for the good of society and for the welfare of future generations. As the play progresses, a divorced couple meet by chance in the sacristy of the church after they had each been re-married to another partner these many years. There they meet to their horror their two abandoned children, one a prostitute and the other a dope fiend. In the death of the girl and the imprisonment of the boy for murder the priest finds a text for some of the most powerful preaching that Chicago has heard in many a day.

The play is weak in its appeal to ecclesiastical authority as the foundation of the monogamous home, but it shows the fundamental evil of the divorce, in the blight upon child life, with great force. The divorce evil must be fought by reaching the causes and not by dealing with the effects. It is not at all important to harass people already divorced. It is deeply important to prevent divorce. A thirty day notice in advance of contemplated marriage and a medical examination would do much to prevent divorce.

Are We Becoming Socialists?

Prof. Walter Rauschenbusch of Rochester addressed the City Club of Chicago recently on the progress of what he called "Collectivism." He showed that we were moving rapidly in the direction of an industrial state. Once the state was a governing institution with practically no industrial functions. The roads were privately owned and financed with toll-gates, as were the bridges. The schools were private institutions after they passed out of control of the church. Now all these things are carried on by the people through government agencies. The post-office, irrigation works, dredging of harbors, and many other tasks have been added to the functions of government. In Europe that development has gone much farther than here. It would seem that we were headed straight toward the socialistic state.

On the other hand, the history of socialism shows a decided modification of that doctrine since the days of Karl Marx. Once the party took the attitude of self-satisfied idealists that waited for an "economic determinism" to work everything out. Then this was modified to admit propaganda. First there was contempt and even opposition to trades unions as being in the road of the big solution. This same attitude was adopted toward the smaller projects of social reform. Then there came the larger wisdom when the party decided to voice the cause of the union and of the smaller reforms to gain sympathy for the larger project. First there was an uncompromising insistence that all the tools of industry should be owned by the state, including land. Now most socialists will not preach to the small farmer the duty of ex-propriating this class but admit that even in the socialist state small industries might go on under private management for a long time.

Spargo, the modern apostle of socialism, has just issued a statement of the principles of socialism to which any orthodox economist of America might subscribe save for its theory of surplus value which is still distinctly socialistic. Mr. Roosevelt proposes to beat the socialists by utilizing their good ideas in the regular political parties. It is impossible that socialism should have wrought so long without influencing history. It is equally impossible to believe that socialism will ever get all it asks for.

Conditions in Nebraska State Prison

Recent startling events have brought to the attention of the public recently the conditions in the penitentiary in Nebraska. Since the conditions are typical for most of the states, a consideration of the facts is significant for us all. The Survey summarizes the story as follows:

Within the forty-eight days, February 11 to March 29, five murders in the Nebraska State Penitentiary at Lincoln and three killings by a sheriff's posse have peremptorily summoned the citizens of that state to give heed not only to the management of this prison at their state capital, but to their whole penal policy. The facts which startled Nebraska and surprised the whole country followed each other in rapid succession; the murder of a deputy-warden by a convict, February 11; the resignation of the chaplain, who publicly took issue with the warden's administration, March 9; the murders of Warden Delahunty, his deputy, and an usher, by three escaping convicts, who, on March 14, shot and blew their way out of the prison with four revolvers and nitro-glycerine caps; the killing of two of these convicts and a farmer forced to aid them in their escape on March 18; and the murder of one convict by another on March 29, "because he had to kill him or be killed by him," with a knife, afterwards found in the dead convict's possession.

The moral conditions in the penitentiary were found to be abominable. Sodomy, the use of drugs, profanity and obscenity filled the atmosphere. A man imprisoned for life for poisoning his wife was in charge of the prison pharmacy. The cells were built to hold one man each but on account of crowding, there were two men in most of the cells, mere striplings often sharing the couch with a hardened criminal. The ventilation was bad. The prisoners were most conscious of a bad system of feeding the convicts. The kitchen was dirty and unsanitary, the haunt of rats and roaches. In the prison the usual contract system of farming out the labor of the prisoners obtained.

Thus instead of the penitentiary serving any purpose of reformation, it was as well calculated to brutalise men as though the fiends of the under-world had designed it. It is not so much the fault of any given set of prison officials. The prison is an inheritance of a past age and is in the greatest need of reformation.

He who, from zone to zone,
Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight
In the long way that I must tread alone
Will lead my steps aright.

William Cullen Bryant.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Mr. Chesterton and the Missionaries

When Mr. Chesterton says anything we are compelled to read, though often not to believe. This famous master of paradox always says what he has to say in a manner that cannot be misunderstood, and is always delightful. There is wit in his seriousness, and seriousness in his wit. All subjects come to his pen for treatment, and go away, if not fully restored, at least better for the coming. From stupidity Chesterton is at the antipodes, and to say that he is ever uninteresting would be to convict one's self of the charge from which we relieve the great writer upon our first acquaintance with him. His philosophy is sane and wholesome. The morbid never appears. So we are glad to know that he takes the work of the missionary more seriously than do many of his craft, as will be seen in the following extracts taken from the Literary Digest.

"It is because the missionary is the isolated and perhaps accidental representative of a principle now ignored over nearly the whole of our planet. He is, I do not doubt, often blundering, often bigoted, often simply heretical—which means wrong. But he is the last representative left of the idea of changing a community from the inside; of changing it by changing the minds of its citizens. Or, rather (to preserve free will, the only basis of political freedom), to get the citizens themselves to change their minds; there are plenty of people here in England, too, whose minds seem to want changing. Missionaries do try to alter society from the inside; while all statesmen and sociologists, reactionary and revolutionary, old-fashioned and new-fashioned, try to change it from the outside. I have no theological sympathy with that sort of evangelical missionary who is said to cause trouble in many colonies and dependencies, and interrupt our imperial destiny. But, though the alternative would be agony, I think I would almost rather be the evangelical than the imperialist. I would rather fall into foreign trouble for some sort of enthusiasm than provoke or avoid it on mere commercial calculation. I would prefer (like a mere missionary) to be forced to fight because I had failed to persuade, rather than (like the ordinary imperialist) be forced to persuade because I had most conspicuously failed to fight.

"Turkey was turned into a complete British Constitution; and immediately began to butcher and ravish the Albanians. Portugal was turned into a pure republic; and instantly fired off guns at all the workmen who had the impudence to go on strike. All over the world today we can find the same futile and yet arrogant deception; the notion of a popular government which has no sort of support from the populace. Small cliques now proclaim a republic, just as in the intrigues of Henry VI. or Edward VI. small cliques used to proclaim a king.

"That is why I want my friend the missionary back again. I need hardly say that I want him to convert people to the right creed; that is, to my creed. But I want to know something more than that Chinamen have lost their pigtails. I am interested in their heads and not their hair. And I ask for some ordinary missionary to tell me, not merely whether Chinamen have been converted to Christianity, nor even whether Chinamen have been converted to republicanism; but whether Chinamen have, in real truth, been converted to anything at all."

Further Romanizing Tendencies

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ has taken up the question of priests who teach in Indian schools under federal control wearing the peculiar garb of their order. Efforts have been made to have the schools rid of every sectarian character, but thus far President Taft has nullified such efforts. On April 1 the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America sent to President Taft the following letter: "Dear Sir: The Separation of Church and State is a fundamental policy of our National Life that has been faithfully supported by the Protestant Churches of the United States. The Federal Council, which unites a large proportion of these Churches in matters of common interest, joined in the remonstrance that called the attention of the Hon. Robert G. Valentine, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to conditions that, after careful investigation, resulted in the sending out of an order from his office that 'In government schools all insignia of any denomination must be removed from all public rooms, and members of any denomination wearing distinctive garb should leave such garb off while engaged at lay duty as government employes.' In behalf of the great constituency represented in the Federal Council, we urge that a speedy hearing be given to all parties interested. We have no doubt that after such a hearing the principle involved will be sustained." In a letter just received from Rev. Dr. E. B. Sanford, the corresponding secretary of the Council, he says: "I have just learned that a hearing on Commissioner Valentine's order will be held March 8th at the office of the Secretary of the Interior. The Federal Council will be represented at this hearing by members of its Executive Committee and by the committee representing the Council at Washington. Bishop A. W. Wilson, Bishop Earl Cranston, Rev. Wallace Radcliffe, D. D., Rev. S. H. Greene, D. D., Rev. Samuel H. Woodrow, D. D., and Rev. Peter Ainslie, D. D., are members of this committee." In the above, "March 8" is evidently a misprint, probably for May 8. A strong committtee will appear before the Secretary of the Interior, and the issue of the case will be awaited with great interest.

Baptist Board Increases Debt

The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society has closed the year with a debt of $17,205.98, which, with the deficit brought over from last year, $61,453.45, makes a total indebtedness of $78,659.43. The total income for the year was $1,151,977.37, and the total outgo $1,169,183.35. Deducting the amounts received from the Woman's Societies and expended for their work, the figures for the Foreign Mission Society alone are, income $912,430.23, outgo $929,636.21.

The expenditures, apart from those for the work of the Woman's Societies and those covered by contributions designated by the donors for special objects outside of regular appropriations, were something over $20,000 less than the amount which the Society was authorized by the denomination through the Finance Committee of the Northern Baptist Convention to expend. Thus the Board under the pressure of the general financial situation has kept well within the budget.

Items of increase in the receipts of the past year as compared with those of the previous year were: Churches, Sunday-schools and young people's societies about $10,000; individuals about $57,000. On the other hand, matured annuity bonds have fallen off about $11,000 and receipts from miscellaneous sources about $8,000. The amount received from legacies and income from invested funds remain about the same as last year.

The Bishop of Fond du Lac on Unity

The following letter is interesting because it shows that other features of the Christian life are essential to unity, as well as the difficulties in the way of union. Unity is nothing unless there is holiness in the church. Its mission is righteousness; after that unity, to the end of making righteousness fill the whole earth. This letter appeared in the Churchman.

Your correspondent from Hot Springs, Va., seemingly faults my sermon on the "Three Religions," as not tending to Christian Unity. It is necessary, I think, if union is ever to be brought about, that there should first be a clear understanding of our differences. It was for this purpose the "World-wide Conference on Faith and Order" was put in commission. It was to bring forth no plan for union, but so far to clear the ground for it by showing where the principal religious bodies stand. These bodies may be divided under three heads: Protestantism, Romanism and Catholicism. While nothing is impossible with God, I do not see how they can be brought together. Romanism cannot give up the Papacy without committing spiritual suicide. Protestantism cannot accept the historic episcopate and priesthood without vacating its fundamental position. Catholicism, as expressed in Episcopalianism, can neither join with Romanism nor Protestantism without disruption. There is no Via Media, as yet practically proposed, like a unification of Church Government under a head governed by Canon Law, whose seat shall be at the Mother Church at Jerusalem.

But what we must work and pray for is the re-establishment of Christian fellowship and intercommunion, which is possible among some of the now separated Christian bodies.

According to my own spiritual vision, the idea of corporated Church Unity, however desirable, has taken too much importance in the minds of some of our good Church people, and is in danger of becoming an idol.

What I believe the Church most needs is not union but holiness. Organic unity such as Christ prayed for, that the Church should be one as He and the Father are One, is secured by our incorporation into Christ, by Sacramental Grace. The union which was to bear witness to the Church's Divine Mission has been marred—it might be restored by recognized Christian fellowship, where it would be brought about without sacrifice of Catholic principles, otherwise it is not worth having.

We must not be disturbed because the outward union of the Church is broken. It was prophesied so it should be, its outer garment was to be rent, the bones of His Mystical Body were to be out of joint. The vessel of His Church was to suffer shipwreck. When He cometh, will He find faith on the earth?

Our Church will not become more pleasing to God by becoming a big Church or large in numbers. God is not glorified so much by quantity as by quality.

Let us be humbly content to be a small body, testifying in the midst of a divided Christendom and an unbelieving world to the true Catholic Faith, and training souls in sanctity, and fitting them for Christ's Kingdom of righteousness.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

The Brotherhood of Man

God is very real to the man who writes, "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us; yea, and our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." He lives and rejoices in the presence of God. It is easy for him to talk about God. He uses no cant phrases.

The presence of God with his people does not signify that they have come into possession of all that he has to bestow upon them. In fact, they are just beginning to realize dimly what are the possibilities of fellowship with God. They do not undertake to tell what good things are in store for them; they know that the riches of divine love are exhaustless and that they guarantee an ever broadening and deepening human experience.

The presence of God sanctifies human relationships. Men who know and enjoy God enjoy one another and delight in serving one another. There is much talk about brotherhood that amounts to nothing, and the reason is that the men who do this kind of talking have no basis for brotherhood. Prudence is the highest virtue they know. They have discovered that avowed selfishness does not pay. They therefore profess concern for others that they may avoid inconvenience and loss. Life has no deep meaning for them. But the man who believes in the God whom Jesus called Father has a foundation for the doctrine and practice of brotherhood.

Obedience to the laws which regulate human conduct is easy when these laws are shown to be also the laws of the inner life. The family idea of relationship is slowly coming to its rightful place among the ruling ideas of the world. The life of our brother is our life and our life is his. What we ought to be we cannot be while we are hostile toward our brother. The laws of the state, when they are good laws, are aids to the expression of our better selves. We must condemn any law that aids the evil in us and in others. God's laws, however given, are all laws of life. To obey them is to live; to violate them is to die.

Release from sin not only brings us into right relationship with others but it is granted to us because we are finding human fellowship sweet and good. We help one another to find deliverance. No man sins alone and no man turns from sin alone. He turns with the assistance of other men and his turning assists them. God saves us in society, not out of it. Furthermore, we are finding that for the correction of evils we must seek social reform as well as individual repentance. It is folly to demand personal excellence while we tolerate conditions that hinder the best in men. We license saloons and preach sobriety. We put into some of our business organizations the principles of highway robbery and expect honesty of the men appointed to manage such organizations.

There is no divorce of ethics and religion in the teaching of John. Men who believe in God will do right. John uncovers the pretensions of those who say they love God and who at the same time hate their brothers, and he plainly says that such men are liars. We may believe that he would admit that some of these liars are ignorant, that they have wrong notions of God. What he does assert is that anti-social feeling is anti-religious. The student of religion may find religion where there is no sense of moral obligation; no writer of the New Testament knows anything about reverence toward God that is separated from duty toward man. And duty toward man is to be expressed in definite acts of service. We cannot learn much about God until we learn the lessons of service. The order is probably morality and then religion.

Boldness in approaching God and in prayer comes from sincerity. "If our heart condemn us not, we have boldness toward God." But it is necessary to know how a man wins sincerity before we praise him. He may gain it by ignorance and narrowness. It is to be noted that John speaks of sincerity after he has discussed moral obligation. After one has done all he can do for the needy, he has boldness in speaking to God. Prayer is not a substitute for food, clothing, instruction, exhortation, and other forms of friendly aid. Here may be an explanation of the deadness of some prayer meetings. There is more talk than work. We may work up emotion when there is nothing in our conduct to justify it. Then our speech does not ring true. It is false, and our neighbor knows it is false if we do not. Service is the support of all noble feeling. [Midweek Service, May 8. 1 John 3: 1-24.] S. J.

The Upper Room

A MEDITATION UPON THE LORD'S SUPPER.

There is no feature of Christian worship to which is accorded a more impressive place by all sections of the church than the communion of saints. Through all the centuries since the Master was among men in the activities of his personal ministry, his followers have delighted to gather at stated times in a service of remembrance and love, of which the central features were the simple elements of bread and wine used by him at the last Passover supper with the disciples. With great variety of appointment and frequency, the Christians of all confessions and orders have held a united testimony regarding the historic character and importance of the Lord's Supper. And for the most part, its observance has been above the line of controversy; all have recognized it as a helpful as well as venerable part of Christian worship.

* * *

In the study of this significant custom, which has long maintained an institutional status in the practice of the church, it is of interest to examine with discriminating attention the biblical sources from which our knowledge of the custom is derived. It is important that those who inquire into the nature of a practice so significant as this should know through what channels our present knowledge of the origin of the custom was mediated, and whether there was a fair degree of unity among the different writers who reported the early Christian practice. The mere combination of the New Testament passages in regard to the Lord's Supper does not yield the most satisfactory results. It is better to trace whatever growth may be perceived in the interpretation of so ancient and well-accredited a custom as the use of the bread and the wine in some memorial form. More than this, it is believed that every testimony borne by the writers of the New Testament to this practice of the early church will have a moral and devotional value of its own. For in the last issue every Christian derives from the Lord's Supper just the meaning and worth he puts into it. To the one who makes little of it, it can never have a worthful significance. But to him who accords it an exalted place in his plan of Christian worship it will never seem trite or commonplace.

* * *

The earliest of the New Testament sources for the study of the Lord's Supper is the Gospel of Mark. For although the utterances of Paul in the Epistles to the Corinthians may have been penned earlier that this Gospel, the sources from which the Mark narrative is derived run back to the very beginnings of the Christian community. It is interesting therefore to trace step by step the record of this earliest Evangelist, and to obtain a precise view of the event as it is there described.

* * *

The background and framework of the entire scene is the Passover feast. On the first day of unleavened bread the disciples inquired of the Master where they were to eat this meal. Apparently none of them thought of keeping it with their own families, as would be the usual custom. They had grown to be so much a little circle of companionable spirits that they thought only of finding a place where the familiar circle could gather. Jesus' direction to them was of the most natural sort. He sent two of them, whose names are not given, from Bethany where they were staying, into the city and told them that when they met a man bearing a pitcher of water, they should follow him. Apparently Jesus did not have in mind any particular individual, but knowing that the homes of Jerusalem would be freely open to any groups of strangers who might wish accommodations for the feast, he bade the two disciples follow any servant whom they met upon the street bringing the accustomed water for the ceremonial of the Passover in any well-to-do home.

* * *

They were to follow this man, whoever he might be, and when he arrived with his burden at the house they were to say to the owner that the Rabbi would like to accept the hospitality of his home for the occasion. Such a man would gladly invite them to take possession of his guest-room. Any home that made the least pretensions to comfort and good-will would be placed at their disposal at such a time. And the disciples, following Jesus' directions, found a convenient place, and there prepared the Passover meal for the Lord and the others of their circle.

* * *

On the evening of that Thursday Jesus and his friends arrived and were shown into the upper room where the preparations had been made. It was an impressive hour in the experiences of all these men. The festival was the most important in the calendar of the Jews. Originally a spring feast, such as all primitive nations observed at the opening of the period of flowers and awakening of life, it had been augmented in meaning by connection in the thought of the people with the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage, and its name was the impressive memorial of Israel's "passing over" from thraldom to freedom, and of the divine deliverance of Israel's first-born when Egypt was smitten.

* * *

But to Jesus the feast had a more pathetic significance, for he knew that the end of his earthly ministry had come. The people for whose guidance he had offered himself were unwilling to accept his leadership, and in the very circle of his closest friends there was one who through disappointment at the failure of his ambitious was preparing to betray his Master to the authorities. It was this of which Jesus spoke as they were eating. The announcement struck them with utter surprise and chagrin. Each questioned of the Lord, "Is it I?" Jesus answered, "It is one of the twelve, even one that dips with me in the dish." It was the custom in eating the Passover lamb to dip the morsels of unleavened bread in a sauce of figs, dates, almonds, spices and vinegar, a description of which is given in the Mishna. This was a common dish, so that Jesus' words did not point out the traitor, but served rather to indicate the treachery. Perhaps Judas sat near Jesus, but in this narrative none of the disciples knew of his conduct from anything Jesus said. The Master's words regarding the tragedy of that man through whom his necessary departure was brought about still further emphasized the reason for Jesus' depression of spirit.

* * *

It was while they were thus eating together the Passover that Jesus, taking a piece of the bread in his hand, looked around upon the circle of his disciples and said, "This is my body." It was the custom to offer thanks for the different portions of the Passover meal. Jesus did not add any new feature to this customary practice, save to say of the familiar unleavened bread, "This is my body, take ye." Similarly he took a cup of wine, one of several used during the Passover feast, and giving thanks for this in the same way he passed it about among them and they all drank. And the significance of this cup he indicated by saying, "This is my blood of the covenant which is shed for many." Then he added that he would drink no more of the fruit of the vine until the new day, near at hand, when he should drink it in the kingdom of God; thus intimating how short a time it would be until his hopes for the new order of society among men should be fulfilled. Then they sang the Hallel and went out to the familiar spot in the mount of Olives.

* * *

From this narrative, carefully studied, it will be seen that the earliest Evangelist thought of the first significant use of the bread and wine by Jesus only as a part of the Passover meal, and that the Master was not concerned to institute a new observance, but only to call the attention of his followers to the fact that the familiar symbols of bread and wine as used in the hallowed feast pictured his own body and blood, his broken career and his outpoured spirit, as the possession of all his people, to be shared and appropriated.

Confusion of the "Senses"

Rev. I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky., writes a two page article in the Christian Evangelist which he says is his response to several questions. These questions were put to him by The Christian Century in the issue of March 28. We had hoped for a much more simple and straightforward reply to our six definite inquiries. It was a very simple task we set before our esteemed brother. The Christian Century had affirmed and Mr. Spencer had denied that unimmersed Presbyterians were Christians "in the New Testament sense," members of the Church of Christ "in the New Testament sense," or baptized "in the New Testament sense." He however "cheerfully conceded" that they were Christians in some other than a New Testament sense, members of the Church of Christ in some other than a New Testament sense and baptized in some other than a New Testament sense.

Such statements did not seem to The Christian Century to make sense. We know of only one sense in which one can be a Christian and that is the New Testament sense, of only one sense in which one can be a member of the Church of Christ and that is the New Testament sense, of only one sense in which one can receive Christian baptism and that is the New Testament sense. To use any of these terms in any other than their New Testament sense is to misuse them. Mr. Spencer talks about a "dictionary sense" and a New Testament sense. It never occurred to us to go to the dictionary to find out what a Christian is, or the Church of Christ is, or baptism is. Dictionaries tell us what people think these things are, but the New Testament tells us what they really are.

If Robert E. Speer is a Christian in the dictionary sense and not a Christian in the New Testament sense, he is not a Christian at all. He is mistaken in thinking himself a Christian and others, including Mr. Spencer, are mistaken in calling him a Christian. If Mr. Speer is a member of the Church of Christ in the dictionary sense and not a member in the New Testament sense he is not a member of the Church of Christ at all. He is mistaken in thinking himself a member and others, including Mr. Spencer, are mistaken in calling him a member. The same is true of Mr. Speer's baptism. If he was baptized in a dictionary sense, and not baptized in the New Testament sense, he was not baptized at all. He is mistaken in thinking of himself as baptized and others, including Mr. Spencer, are mistaken in "cheerfully conceding" that he was baptized.

Mr. Spencer devotes much of his space to the question of future salvation and says, "Perhaps many Presbyterian brethren shall rise in the judgment and condemn many of us; and many Congregationalists and Methodists shall obtain in the final assize a far brighter reward than many Baptists and Disciples." This shifts the point of view entirely. The Christian Century has not written a single word in discussion of the future salvation of Presbyterians and the rest. Their future salvation was not involved in the six affirmations which occasioned the current controversy. We have no interest, for the moment, in that remote question of final destiny. We affirm that Presbyterians are Christians now, that they are members of the Church of Christ now, that they are baptized now, that their churches are churches of Christ now,—and all these affirmations are intended in the New Testament sense. To shift the issue to the judgment day is to raise another issue entirely.

Nor does The Christian Century make these affirmations concerning Presbyterians and the rest because of their superior character. That Mr. Spencer entirely misapprehends our purpose in citing distinguished names is evidenced in the following quotation:

> One of the favorite arguments to show that persons may now enter the church, even formally, without immersion in the name of Christ, is that the splendid character of affusionists, such as Martyn, Brainard, Livingstone, Jane Addams and Robert E. Speer—surpasses that of many members of "immersionist churches." The same plea might be made for Quakers. It might be made for heathen, Mohammedans, Jews and for a great multitude of moral citizens who make no profession whatever of Christianity. A young friend of mine, who in my judgment is a far better man in spirit and character than numerous preachers, elders and deacons whom we meet, although he is not yet a church member, told me recently that "the most unworldly man" he ever knew—although he knows thousands of church members—has been and is now living outside the church.

The question of character has never been raised by us. We would not affirm that Jane Addams and Robert E. Speer are members of the Church of Christ because of their "splendid character," highly as we esteem their character. We affirm that they are members of the Church of Christ because in faith and penitence they united with the Church of Christ, they were received into it, and are now living the life of Christians. Does Mr. Spencer intend to classify that communion of Christ's disciples who call themselves Friends in the same category as "heathen, Mohammedans and Jews?" The heathen, Mohammedans and Jews to whom he refers are not members of the Church of Christ, nor is his "most unworldly man" a member of the Church of Christ. Good character does not make one a member of the Church of Christ, and Mr. Spencer's assumption that The Christian Century so teaches is wholly gratuitous. A multitude of members of the Church of Christ possess no such splendid character as this "unworldly man." With many of Christ's disciples character is yet to be gained. They are struggling against coarse and brutish temptations. The issue of their struggle is yet in doubt. They are babes in Christ—but they are in Christ. They belong to his Body, his Church. Our purpose would have been served quite as well by citing one of these strugglers who belonged to the Presbyterian communion as by citing Mr. Speer.

Our purpose in citing the names of Robert E. Speer, Jane Addams and others was not to call attention to their "splendid character," but to keep our discussion concrete. The non-committal nomenclature by which some Disciples refer to Methodists, Presbyterians and the rest as "the pious unimmersed," "affusionists," "members of the denominations," etc., betrays them often into taking a position in the abstract which they would not for a moment support if it were translated into concrete terms. We have a good illustration of this in the current discussion. Rev. J. A. Lord, formerly editor of the Christian Standard, wrote a statement in denial of The Christian Century's affirmation that these other churches were churches of Christ. Mr. Lord used this vague and non-committal nomenclature to which we refer. The Christian Century pointed out that his choice of terms left the meaning of his statement in doubt, and on his behalf re-affirmed our belief that he regarded the Methodist church of Milton, Ore., his present home, as a church of Christ and its members as Christians. Apparently the translation of our affirmations into concrete terms made them quite satisfactory to Mr. Lord.

We have the same sort of an illustration in Mr. Spencer's own case. In the questions which The Christian Century put to him we asked him pointedly to state in what sense Robert E. Speer was a Christian, in what sense the First Presbyterian church of Lexington, Ky., was a church of Christ, and in what sense Mr. Speer had been baptized. We asked him then to state definitely what else was essential to make Mr. Speer a Christian in the New Testament sense, the Lexington Presbyterian church a church of Christ in the New Testament sense, and Mr. Speer a subject of Christian baptism in the New Testament sense. Furthermore, we asked him whether the Central Christian Church of Lexington was a New Testament church in "the strict New Testament sense" and whether its members were Christians "in the normal, adequate and strict New Testament sense." Mr. Spencer uses two pages of our St. Louis contemporary's space ostensibly to reply to these questions but does not touch them at all. He uses the non-committal vocabulary by which he is accustomed to deal with questions like this as abstractions, but he does not face the issues in their concrete form.

Fortunately, we know and our readers know and the Disciples know more of Mr. Spencer's large Christian spirit than has expressed itself in the current discussion. The abstract and hesitant vocabulary with which Disciple writers have traditionally treated this issue has misled even so clear a thinker as Mr. Spencer into taking a position which his more discerning Christian heart will not support when it is brought face to face with the concrete reality. Mr. Spencer will not deny that the Presbyterian church of Lexington is a church of Christ and its members Christians, members of the Church of Christ—and in "the New Testament sense." He will not deny that Robert E. Speer is a Christian, a member of the Body of Christ, the Church of Christ—and "in the New Testament sense."

Moreover, Mr. Spencer will not affirm that the church of which he is pastor is a church of Christ and its members Christians in any sense that implies that they fully measure up to the New Testament standard. Like their Presbyterian brethren they fail of measuring up to the New Testament standard adequately and strictly, both as a church of Christ and as individual Christians. There are no churches of Christ in the "normal, adequate and strict New Testament sense." But the essential, the constitutive, principles of a church of Christ, taught in the New Testament, are embodied in both Mr. Spencer's congregation and its Presbyterian neighbor. In some points one approaches more nearly the divine ideal, in other points the other. But which one approaches more nearly to the divine ideal in all points only the great Head of the Church himself has the right to say.

"There is one body"—not two bodies nor many bodies. "There is one baptism"—not two baptisms nor many baptisms. The fact that the name Church of Christ may be used in more than one sense does not imply that the thing Church of Christ exists in more than one sense. There is but one Church of Christ—and that is the New Testament Church. Likewise the fact that the name Christian baptism may be used in more than one sense does not imply that the thing Christian baptism has any reality in more than one sense. There is but one Christian baptism—and that the baptism authorized by the New Testament.

To "cheerfully concede" that Presbyterians have been baptized, but not in the New Testament sense, is to concede a mere fiction. To grant that Presbyterians are members of the Church of Christ, but not in the New Testament sense, is simply to grant that they are members of a body that has no existence at all.

The Disciples have gone past the time when they can endure such word-juggling as this. We are getting used again to the candid, hearty words of the Declaration and Address which refers to these evangelical brethren about us as Christians and to their churches as churches of Christ.

A Cluster of Dooms

A few weeks since, I sent the following questions to the Gospel Advocate, the Christian Leader and the Way, and the Octographic Review:

[These papers, it should be said for the information of any reader who is not acquainted with the fact that the Disciples are now two bodies, represent the extreme reactionary group of this religious community.—The Editors.]

1. Do you believe that Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational churches are Churches of Christ?
2. Are the members of those churches Christians?
3. If your answers should be negative, I should like to know, in few words, what you believe concerning their destiny.

To these, the editor of the Gospel Advocate, David Lipscomb, replied:

Dear Brother Barnes:

This is the forty-seventh year of my work on the Advocate. The questions you propound have never come before us as you present them. The Advocate has always taught that believers should be buried into Christ; that all believers should be buried with Christ in baptism. We urge this as needful to oneness in Christ, and obedience to God. As to whether the unbaptized will be saved or not, we leave this with God. We urge all to stand on safe ground by obeying God. We treat members of the churches you mention as what they claim to be, believers in Christ without having been buried with him. We have gotten along pleasantly with them.

F. L. Rowe, editor of the Christian Leader and the Way, replied as follows:

Dear Brother Barnes:

1. I am answering only for myself as publisher, but believe I voice the convictions of our readers. My attitude toward the "pious unimmersed," is the same as the attitude of Peter in his interview with Cornelius, who was "commanded to be baptized in the name of the Lord."
2. If Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational Churches are Churches of Christ, why did Alexander Campbell leave the Presbyterians? And why the need of the Reformatory effort inaugurated by him and others one hundred years ago?
3. If there are Christians among them, they are commanded to "come out from among them and be ye separate."
4. "The Lord will execute judgment upon all," and "render to every man according to his deeds."

It will be noted that in accordance with the precedents of our history both these editors evade the questions. They will not face the issue. The presence of problems means the absence of these editors; they take to the woods and hide behind barricades of texts. The fair inference is that they do not believe in the salvation of Presbyterians and the rest, else they would have said so. No man wishes to hide a generous sentiment.

The answer of D. A. Sommer, of the Octographic Review, is "a feast of fat things, a feast of wine on the lees, of fat things full of marrow of wines on the lees well refined." Here it is:

Dear Sir:

Paul says that we are "buried" in baptism, and that we are "baptized into Jesus Christ." (Rom. 6:3-4.) A man, then, who has not been buried in baptism is not in Christ, and if he is not in Christ, he is not a Christian, in the Bible sense of that word; and we have no right to recognize him as such in union meetings, etc. The apparently pious who have heard the full gospel on baptism and other points, and yet do not obey, will be condemned like all other disobedient ones. The pious unimmersed who have never heard a full gospel sermon, and have not the native ability to dig it out for themselves, will be judged accordingly. "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required." God does not require impossibilities of any one. Most people, however, have the ability to see that something is radically wrong with the religious systems of today, and they will be condemned because they don't study the Bible to see where the trouble lies.

We might add, too, our position concerning the leaders in the Christian Church. They have deliberately and wilfully left the simplicity in Christ and have led the people into Babylon, and hence will receive less favor with God in the next world than the pious unimmersed who have not heard the full gospel, for they are sinning against greater light.

And last: The half-hearted members of loyal churches of Christ will occupy in the judgment a far worse position than the pious unimmersed who have never heard the full gospel, inasmuch as they are sinning against greater opportunities.

In a subsequent note Mr. Sommer informs me that "by the leaders in the Christian Church, I meant not only the higher critics, but also all who advocate innovations which the Octographic Review opposes."

The difference between this reply and the replies of the other two is that this faces the issue squarely and heartlessly, without shrinking from the inexorable logic; while the other replies timidly seek shelter in some assumed uncovenanted mercies. However monstrous the conclusions of the Review, I prefer them to the evasiveness of its newspaper kinsmen. There is nothing to admire in men who will not accept the logic of their own conclusions; while there is a certain admiration due to brutal boldness. We know where the Review stands; there is something magnificently fearless in its ignorance. We are not sure of the positions of the other two. The premises of all are pharisaical; the conclusions are anti-Christ.

But even the Review, straight-laced as it is, has adopted a few phrases from the people of Ashdod. Where does it learn of this "full" gospel of which it makes so much? Prithee, I think I could find a Babylonish garment in its tent. Then there is a mystery in that reservation concerning the "apparently" pious. We never met that before. It may be that because the piety is apparent and not real all such will be condemned with "other disobedient ones." But the unambiguous language of the letter, as a whole, gives us the opportunity to see the teaching of those who deny The Christian Century's affirmations in its full orbed splendor.

A deep doom, be it observed, is reserved for the leaders of "the Christian Church" who "have deliberately and wilfully left the simplicity in Christ and have led the people into Babylon, and hence will receive less favor with God in the next world than the pious unimmersed who have not heard the gospel, for they are sinning against greater light."

Brethren, let us weep over the sorrows of the saints. There is now no hope for Professor Radford, Z. T. Sweeney, John T. Brown, and others like them who have been contending for the faith against the "higher critics"; for they are innovationists! We record with tears that all their noblest efforts are but filthy rags. And is there no hope for W. H. Boles who, when the old ship of Zion was at the mercy of the storm, came at the peril of his life to bring the faithful to the desired haven, and to line them up in proper order before the eyes of an on-looking Christendom? The world has breathed easier since all were marshaled in battle array. He is entitled to a reward for performing such services. But we chronicle the fact with anguish that for him there is no hope. He tolerates instrumental music and elects to be damned with his eyes wide open. But surely there is hope for our Editor S. S. Lappin, who has exhibitd so much zeal in his office? Our hearts almost break as we listen to the sentence that rings like a death-knell, "There is no hope for him." Then, brethren, all is lost save honor!

I can hear the editor of the Review say, "Brother Barnes, we would gladly save these brethren if we could; they are good men and true; they fear God and keep his commandments in many important particulars. But we have no choice in this matter. They are wilfully ignorant, and should know better. We must be loyal to the plea which must be saved, though the whole world be damned. Let God be true and every man a liar. This Restoration movement has been committed to our hands by the fathers, and we would welcome death rather than compromise or surrender. And you know that it is required of a steward that he be found faithful."

I pause to observe that the language of sectarianism is the same in every age.

"But, Brother Sommer, you would not consign J. B. Briney and Professor E. S. Ames to the same fate, would you?" And the answer is in print that innovationists and higher critics must share the same doom. Brethren, let me beseech you to become reconciled at once, seeing that you have to spend a long eternity together! Consider well the danger of delay!

But no matter how dreadful the situation, the Review has always a greater horror in reserve. The skeletons in its theological closet are more in number than the frogs of Egypt. Its theology is fertile in doom. It has the dreadful divided and subdivided until a microscope is needed to see the latest atom—the last is yet to appear. Its lowest hell just now is reserved for the half-hearted members of "loyal" churches, "who are sinning against greater light." By "loyal" churches it means those represented by itself. We have always cherished the belief that there was hope for a man who was a member of the church, even if he did fall from grace occasionally and make logical slips. But to belong to a "loyal" church increases one's perils so alarmingly that it is not difficult to account for the slow growth of its doctrines. To take membership therein is to build one's hopes within hearing distance of the roaring fires of the pit. A man is damned if he doesn't join, we admit, but we do not see that his prospects for heaven are greatly brightened when he does. We are safe in affirming that this document presents more opportunities for being damned than anything that we have read in many years. When we proposed our questions to the editor, we harbored a feeble hope that possibly a few outside the "loyal" churches might be saved. But imagine our dismay when we saw great majorities of saints swept into perdition with as little concern as the whooping billow swept the crew like icicles from the deck of the Hesperus! Think not, gentle reader, that we are resentful because we have been included in the general catastrophe. No, there is no more malice in our haerts than there is mercy in the judgments of the Octographic Review. It seems evident that no matter what one may do in a "loyal" church, he will wish he had done something else, unless, like the editor and his cabinet, he holds the keys.

In all seriousness, can we not see the folly of preaching union in the light of such terrific conclusions? But such is the perfection of any doctrine of exclusiveness. The rank and file of Disciples years ago abandoned such teaching to oblivion. The journals that still propagate it are left behind in the march of civilization as solitary as Lot's wife on the shores of the Dead Sea. It would be easier for these editors to expand a minim of mist into the blue dome of heaven, or a drop of dew into an Atlantic, than to unite any intelligent people on such a basis of doctrine. At such teachings serious and well informed people are moved either to pity or contempt. And certain it is that there is no escape from these absurdities, once they are allowed a place in our thinking. There are no extremes to which the devoted will not go to maintain them, no follies they will not adopt to secure their triumph. All such covet the privilege of going down with a sinking ship, and scorn the aid of a bark of bulrushes which some have cleverly devised in the doctrine of the "uncovenanted mercies."

These extremes ought to teach their own lesson. It is our misfortune that in recent years much of our thinking has been tending in that direction. The world has never been slow to set the stamp of its disapproval on any attempt to translate the dead doctrines of the past into the life of the present. Half-way concessions to our Christian neighbors must be given up. We must either wholeheartedly proclaim that they are Christians and their churches churches of Christ, or go straight back to the camp of anti-ism.

E. B. B.

The Master's Touch

In the still air the music lies unheard;
In the rough marble beauty hides unseen;
To make the music and the beauty needs
The Master's touch, the sculptor's chisel keen.
Great Master, touch us with thy skillful hand;
Let not the music that is in us die!
Great Sculptor, hew and polish us; nor let,
Hidden and lost, thy form within us lie!
Spare not the stroke! Do with us as thou wilt!
Let there be naught, unfinished, broken, marred;
Complete thy purpose, that we may become Thy perfect image, thou our God and Lord!

—Bonar.

A noted clergyman was in his study writing when his five-year-old daughter walked in and asked:

"What are you writing, papa?"

"I am writing a sermon, my dear."

"How do you know what to write, papa?"

"God tells me what to write."

After watching her father a few minutes, the little girl said:

"Papa, if God tells you what to write, why do you scratch some of it out?"

The Essential Plea of the Disciples

In the Light of Their Origin and Aim

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

EDITORS' NOTE—This is the third and final installment of the paper read at the Disciples' Annual Congress at Kansas City, April 18. The other portions of the article appeared in the two immediately preceding issues. Dr. J. H. Garrison, who reviewed Mr. Morrison's address, has been asked to furnish his paper for publication in The Christian Century in case provision has not been made for its publication elsewhere.

VIII. First Principles Obscured But Not Lost

From this time forward the Disciples proceeded by the dogmatic method—but not wholly. Through our hundred years' history there has run a silver strand of appeal of a wholly undogmatic nature, a strand which we must today seize and use as the clue to a true interpretation of our ideals and the hope of what Dr. Moore calls the "repristination" of our plea. This silver stand that has run through all our history, albeit often hidden by the coarse strands of dogmatism, debate and sectarian pride, is the appeal to Christians of all denominations to seek for the common denominator underlying their differences and to dwell together in unity upon that basis. The concept of the common denominator is the survival of the original principle of appeal to the living Church. In the Declaration and Address this principle is in a focal position. In the actual thinking of the Disciples it has been pushed to an obscure place on the margin. But it has never been wholly lost. It still stands side by side with the appeal to the New Testament Church to check and correct our interpretation and to rebuke us for using our interpretation for sectarian purposes. The history of denominationalism makes the fact increasingly plain that the appeal to the Bible can be a principle of unity only to those who recognize the equally obligatory principle of maintaining full fellowship with the whole living Church of Christ. The seeds of division are in the Bible itself when it is read by a mind that does not recognize its obligation to the living Church. Most of the denominations have been created by conscientious loyalty to holy Scripture. They are the result neither of perversity nor of presumption. Every sect in Christendom, from the Seventh Day Adventists to the Christian Scientists, proves its views and justifies its practices by an appeal to the Bible. The Presbyterian is not less sure that the Bible teaches his creed than is the Methodist that it teaches his. The Congregationalist quotes no more Scripture for his mode of organization than does the Episcopalian for his. The immersionist is no more confident that the Bible supports his contention than the optionist is that it does not. It is an affront to Christendom for one body to take a position in the name of unity which assumes that it alone knows or is trying more earnestly than others to follow the teachings of the Bible. This very claim is the root out of which the whole denominational order has grown. The sin of sectarianism is not disloyalty or unresponsiveness to the Bible but disloyalty and unresponsiveness to the claim of the living Church. Christians have allowed their conscientious views as to what the Bible teaches to alienate them from their fellow Christians who did not share their views. This is the essence of sectarianism.

Now the fundamental insight of Thomas Campbell, preserved to us in the illustration of the common denominator, is this, that these differences are not vital; they do not invalidate our brother's status as a Christian nor our sister churches as churches of Christ. We can practice unity in spite of these differences, he declared, and we ought to practice it.

The First Step Toward Unity.

This Disciples' conception of the common denominator as the solution of the Church's disunity is today, I am fully aware, the subject of much invidious talk and derision by prominent advocates of unity. It is characterized as a basis of "minimums" and in contrast it is urged that unity must be consummated on a basis of "maximums." It is stigmatized as a basis of "compromise" as contrasted with a basis of "comprehension." As against the critics of the Disciples and the heretics among the Disciples who are caught by this new jangle of words, I stand with the Disciples, and affirm our historic contention, that the first step toward unity is to get the denominations to see that if the whole denominational order were swept clean off the decks there would then remain the essential living Church of Christ. I have no finical fear of compromise when once the Church's eyes are opened to the puerility of the things wherein her divisions consist. If Methodist, Congregationalist, Baptist, Episcopalian, Presbyterian and other churches of Christ can find a basis upon which they may dwell together in the unity for which Christ prayed without doing violence to any participating conscience, I have no interest in the particular method by which they may reach that basis. You may call it "compromise" if you will—but you must remember that it is not a compromise of the Church of Christ, but a compromise within the Church of Christ. It is not a compromise of the word of God, but a compromise upon the word of God. And there are very good New Testament precedents for just such compromises. I do not say this because I believe the method of compromise is the only or the chief method of unity, but because the method is a matter of relative indifference to one who once grasps the primal thesis of our plea, namely, that the churches whose unity is contemplated are already churches of Christ.

Exaggeration of Denominational Distinctions.

A favorite slogan now much in vogue in Christian union talk is this: "Not what can we give up but what can we give to a united Church?" I notice, interestingly enough, that this slogan originated among a people who would be willing to accept almost any basis of unity provided only they were permitted to give to that basis one precious thing that distinguishes them! The effect of this conception of unity is to exaggerate the importance of each denomination's peculiarities. Hence a proclamation has gone forth advising that the years prior to the world conference on Christian unity be utilized by each sect in a study of its own distinctive principles or practices which it might regard as a worthy contribution to a united Church. As against this method of approaching the problem I stand with the Disciples and affirm that, in its first phase at least, Christian unity is a negative process, a giving up of things that are irrelevant, a minimizing rather than a magnifying of denominational claims, such a re-assessment of the great common catholic values of our Christianity as will make our sectarian distinctions seem silly and wicked—a reduction, in a word, of the many fractions to their common denominator which is the living Church itself.

This is the great task of the Disciples: to restore the norm of the living Church of Christ, the true New Testament Church, which lies underneath the denominational order as the common denominator lies under its fractions—to restore this normative magnitude to a focal position in their own thinking, first of all, and then in the thought and conscience of the Christian world. In this principle lies our genius and distinctiveness as a Christian union movement. Through it our contribution to present-day Christianity must be made. In the light of Thomas Campbell's guiding insight, confirmed by the entire history of Protestant denominationalism, and rendered yet more clear by the modern study of the New Testament, the Disciples are commissioned to go forth and declare with prophetic militancy and tenderness that no denomination has a monopoly of anything whatever that is essential or even vital to the Church of Christ; that their distinctions are inconsequential; that they are deceived by a historical fallacy into keeping alive distinctions of a former day after the real issues in which they were originally rooted have lost their meaning; that neither Methodists nor Baptists nor Presbyterians nor Congregationalists nor Episcopalians have one vital thing to give to a united Church which all the others do not already possess—except their own unreserved Christian fellowship!

Iconoclasts of the Denominational Order.

In the light of their origin and aim the Disciples should be the the iconoclasts of the denominational order, the breakers down of sectarian idols. Their message has never been given uninhibited utterance. It has been repressed by the sectarian practice into which they fell while their movement was still young. By losing contact with the living Church through a partially mistaken conception of the New Testament Church they fell into the practice of sectarianism. How could they plead for unity when they did not practice it?

But today by both conscious and unconscious influences God is reviving the old ideal in our souls. We are returning to first principles, the fundamental principles of the Declaration and Address. A new sympathy is abroad in our hearts, a yearning for closer fellowship with all Christians, an increasing subordination of, if not a contempt for, the fictions that keep us apart, and a new sense of urgency in the message with which we have been commissioned. Pleading for unity, we are bound to practice it—bound by our own logic, bound by the love of our brethren, bound by our origin and aim, bound by the Word of God, bound by the commandment of Christ—bound to receive into our fellowship all whom God has received into his Church.

The Cost of Smoke

Smoke costs the city of London by direct and indirect losses $25,000,000 annually; it costs Cincinnati $8,000,000, and Cleveland $6,000,000. Pittsburgh, aroused by these revelations, is to have an investigation by experts. As a "smoky" city Pittsburgh has a national reputation. There are fears that losses there may rival even those of London. Two chemists will learn what they can about the chemical nature of smoke and soot. A botanist is examining the effects of smoke on plant life, and will determine what plants can thrive and what cannot in the neighborhood of that city. Several physicians will make an investigation of the effect not only of breathing smoke and soot but of the damage to eyesight because of murky atmosphere and gloomy days through which no gleams of celestial radiance could filter. They will deal further with the nervous effects caused by depression of spirits under leaden skies. Pittsburgh is determined to pierce the canopy of gloom which big business has unfurled above the roar of its furnaces. It is as unreasonable to hope for an acre of blue sky to greet the eye when passing through Pittsburgh, under present conditions, as that a poet could thrive in its atmosphere of gloom. But better days are coming. Even in England, since the coal strike, the citizens in some localities have been permitted to see the blue dome of heaven by day and its starry vault by night. So Pittsburgh may know that there is hope for it, and that the smoke which has tormented her pride will soon be converted into a lake of fire.

This interesting data is cited to call attention to that modern spirit which is daily redeeming the earth, not only in the saving of souls, but in the saving of cities. Whatever helps to better the conditions under which men live is religious. It is the reproduction of the earth after that pattern wherein righteousness shall dwell. It is the translation of the divine enterprise into human achievement, and of the heavenly into the earthly.

God is showing himself to be the descending God, his ways finding expression in the alleviation of suffering and in the extinction of such nuisances as smoke. Once men dreamed of raising earth to heaven; today they are finding how to bring heaven down to the earth. And the miracles of the future will be concerned less with the casting out of demons than with the creating of an atmosphere in which demons cannot live. The future may have no miraculous voice that can say to the lame man "rise and walk", but it will be able to so renovate the environment in which fathers and mothers live that no man shall ever be lame fdom his mother's womb.

To discover a world is as great a miracle as to create a world; to open the eyes of the blind is equivalent to creating a world; to prevent blindness is a miracle equal to any of these. Jesus said, "Greater works than these shall ye do because I go to my Father." Under a Christian civilization these are being wrought. The hospital is doing for our age what the Great Physician did for his. The hospital building is preaching in stone to generation after generation the story of the Good Samaritan. The day is not far off when the slum-child and the lily can grow together, and there need not be that strange wonder in the waif's eyes when told of the greenness of the country and the crystal purity of the air where grow the lilies that swing their censers at the Easter service. In a word, the redemptive process makes life beautiful, healthful, and sane.

And nothing is more pitiable than the denunciation of some Christians directed against men who believe it is easier to save the souls of men in clean surroundings than in vile, and who live up to their belief in forwarding any work that has for its end social betterment. No disparagement of the gospel is possible to the preacher who has grace enough to see that the hungry are fed and the unsanitary washed. He knows that environment plays a mighty part in the work of redemption. Those who denounce social reconstruction may be wholly orthodox, but they are perfectly blind to the progress of Christianity in the world, and are certain to be left among the belated in the march of civilization. "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof," has a new meaning in this year of grace. Anything that increases the joy of living must be pleasing to our Heavenly Father. E. B. B.

Interpretations

A Burning But Ignored Question

Thirty-four and mad! A few years ago he was innocent, strong, winsome. But now his reason is dethroned, and he is shut up with those mad like himself. What is his name? Legion. He is from every state and country. His god was pleasure; and his end is pain and darkness. A few years since he was the pride of his mother. Today her soul is rent because of his mad indulgences. His friends avoid mentioning him—for his disgrace falls upon them. The sorrows of sin are not limited to the sinner. Sin and saintliness both recognize society as a solidarity.

We have grown somewhat away from the idea of the hell our fathers believed in, but we are becoming more aware of the awful consequences here and now of the transgression of God's law.

Life and death, the highest and the lowest, are closely connected with the sex instinct. Out of it are created a happy home and the mad-house. No one can be unaware of the need for direction in sex education. Every community has its gossip that is revealing. The medical journals quote alarming statistics. The doctors are not optimists when talking upon this subject.

Literature abounds with stories that stay with the reader. Ibsen in his Ghosts leaves his young man mad. His mother can come to believe that the standards of society were foolishly arbitrary, only to have her heart broken by the excesses of her son, which excesses she first smiled upon.

What a great story and how true to life is the Magic Skin of Balzac. The magic skin guaranteed the hero every wish, but with every evil wish it shrank, and the young man knew when it was all gone death would claim him. A great and fierce battle raged in his soul between his evil desires and life—and life lost. He, too, is legion.

How shall we decrease the legion? By education. The young must be taught to see clearly the two roads before them and the end of both.

Knowledge of self, chastity and temperance are more important than any studies in the curriculum of our schools.

Wise, frank, rugged and sane teaching is needed. Many fallacies need to be uprooted. A few of these are: Over-modesty, one standard for boys and another for girls, necessity or unavoidableness of wild-oat sowing, and disregard of chaperoning. One of the constant marvels to me is that parents are so careless as to their children's associations.

At the very critical age of youth great delicacy and wisdom ought to be used in teaching the youth. This task usually can best be performed by parents. There are many good books that can be put into the hands of the young.

The perpetuity of this nation depends upon its attitude toward pleasure. We have suddenly become metropolitanized. Will we be able to stand city life? The answer depends on man's attitude toward woman and drink. Did you miss that word of Mr. Connie Mack's in the Saturday Evening Post? If so, read it here:

Before we played the Cubs for the world's championship in 1910 I had one talk in particular with my men about the series. I told them that we had something "on" Chicago and ought to win; but, win or lose, we wanted to come out of the series without any regrets. I reminded the boys how after some world's series there were stories about—I don't know how true they were—that the losing club had dissipated, and so hadn't shown its best baseball. If nothing else that was mighty poor business. Nothing like that must be said of the Athletics, I insisted; and my players agreed with me. Then I told them I wanted each man who could do so to say that he wouldn't take a drink for the two weeks covered by the series and the preliminary practice; but I made the point that any player who couldn't go without his drink was to say so. I wanted him to speak right out. We called the names—and every man promised.

One of my old players, who did not handle a ball until the deciding game, did some great work on the coaching lines. After the fourth game he was so hoarse he could hardly speak—had a bad cold and seemed in for a case of grippe. He came to me that evening and said:

"Connie, I'm half sick. I need something to brace me up or I may be in bed tomorrow. If you don't mind I want to take a drink."

"All right," I told him. "Do as you like—but I'd rather die than take a drink!"

"That settles it," he said, "no drink for me!"

Next day I put him in the game. He got on first, stole second at a critical moment and helped turn the tide of victory in our favor. And he did it without his drink! Not one of the regulars or the substitutes took so much as a glass of beer during those two weeks —I am morally certain of that. We came out champions; but, had we lost, there would have been no regrets that could have been helped.

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Hannibal.

Editorial Table Talk

The Human Cost of Production

The cost-finding system has long since been introduced into most industries so that the producer now knows down to the last cent in many cases just what a given article costs to produce under normal circumstances. The printer figures in all the different items even to the cost of the ink that goes upon the paper and adding his percentage of profit announces a price, confident that his brother printer working under the same conditions and using the same system will not underbid him. This is true in the various forms of modern industry, even on the farm in some communities.

We have not, however, sufficiently estimated from a social point of view, the human cost of production. What is the influence of this work upon the workman? We know quite well that much of modern labor is monotonous through the high degree of specialization. It takes several men to make a single pin. What will the influence be on the intelligence of these men who are never called upon to meet new situations and make new decisions? Unless these men have some leisure for other pursuits, or else are changed sometimes to other places in the process, they will become sluggish and brutish. What is the human result of the twelve-hour day and the seven-day week that prevails nearly everywhere in the steel industry? It must mean drunkenness, and moral stagnation. A man living on such a program sees but little ahead except an occasional debauch to furnish some break to the monotony of long hours of toil.

Any process of production that breaks down the worker, either physically, mentally or morally is a hazard to our free institution. We pay too much for an article when we destroy a part of our citizenship to produce it cheaply. In the end we all suffer with the social wrongs of the toilers. No man lives to himself or dies to himself. We must raise the question of the cost of production from a new point of view as time goes on.

Work for Men to be Permanent

The Conservation Congress of the Men and Religion Forward Movement proved hardly half as large in numbers as the Congress of Laymen's Missionary Movement, two thousand delegates in New York as against four thousand in Chicago two years ago. Ninety per cent were the very same men. The Titanic news both hurt and helped the Congress. It hurt in publicity and impress that it was able to make upon the city, and it helped in the seriousness of its message. The Sunday covered by the Congress dates, April 21, was perhaps the most remarkable one New York ever went through. It was remarkable along the very lines for which the Congress stood, but it was the Titanic disaster and not the Congress that had the public notice.

Indications at the close of the Congress seem to be that the work is likely to be permanent to some extent. Rumors are heard of endowments for some of the lines, notably the Bible study and the Social Service, and of funds with which to put the publicity plans into working shape. Committees on cities, a moderate proportion at least, report themselves on a lasting basis. Local campaigns are in a way to become annual, and some leaders of teams may be able to make annual tours. To the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. belongs the credit of carrying the Movement through its first year, but there are indications at its close that some other organizations will now take hold in fact as they have so far in name.

The real results claimed to have been attained thus far are several. They are first, a tremendous push to the schemes of Christian unity. It is not felt that organic unity has been much helped, but it is felt that working unity is much the gainer. Second, there have been surveys of conditions that are of enormous value, both in the facts revealed and in the knowledge of ways to get new facts of the same kind. And in the third place the attention of the non-Christian people has been caught and held to some extent. Not much has been gained in definite plans for work, and not many of the 3,000,000 new men and boys have been gotten into actual church membership. As for money expended, it has been considerable, but so far as can be learned few unpaid debts remain. The National Committee is said to have expended about $125,000, the New York Committee spent $35,000, and an aggregate of expenditures by all local campaigns, difficult to estimate, is put at $240,000, making a total of $400,000. Leaders declare the campaigns to have been worth the money. Some others say much depends on what work follows. So far as can now be learned there are no new Movements in the air. The impression prevails that the present duty is to realize results on those that have attempted to sweep the country.

Dissatisfaction with Evangelistic Results

As a whole the results of current evangelistic meetings are disappointing. The methods are worn threadbare; the theology is archaic; the pressure to induce the young to become Christians is hardly Christian itself because of the apparent desire for numbers; the unnatural ferment caused by emotional preaching to which apocryphal stories give an uncanny color, may bring responses, but few will affirm that the results are worthy the effort. Those who have been through one of these campaigns know full well the disappointments that must be faced in empty pews, the absence of converts, the recession of the wave of enthusiasm that swept over the community, and even an increased deadness due to the inevitable reaction.

On the other hand, the faithful proclamation of the gospel, the personal word that is so effective during the revival, the same conviction that souls should be saved that is borne in upon us by the fiery appeals of the evangelist, would bring results which would be more satisfactory in the long run. An evangelist who could show the churches how to train the forces in coöperation with the pastor so as to insure a reasonable growth to the congregation year after year, would be a benediction to all our churches.

Astor Name and Churchmanship

William Vincent Astor, now head of the American branch of the Astor family, and coming into control of $150,000,000 is not yet of age. He takes a keen interest, it is said by his rector, in Christian work and has done so for some years: Often of late years his father, Colonel John Jacob Astor, who went down with the Titanic, attended Church on Sundays through the influence of his son Vincent. The father was a vestryman of the Church of the Messiah, Rhinebeck-on-the-Hudson, a church which he built almost entire. Vincent's grandmother, the late Mrs. Astor, owned a pew in St. Thomas Episcopal Church, New York, and Colonel Astor retained it. He also owned a pew in Trinity Chapel, New York.

Colonel Astor was for some years a trustee of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, and gave $100,000 toward its building fund of $3,500,000. He is now declared to have given much more money to charities, even to missions, than was generally supposed, and his fellow-vestrymen in Rhinebeck speak in much higher terms of him socially than have men of New York in late years with whom he has had business dealings. It is said the former really knew the man, the latter did not.

—The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions has broken all records in receipts the past year. Its income last year was $1,800,000, and it has increased its budget for next year by $100,000. Its increase is not, it says, from churches or from laymen, but chiefly from legacies. These amount to $300,000, an unprecedented amount. Women also increased their gifts, while maintaining their own receipts, by about $150,000. The legacies go into permanent funds, to be used when necessary to keep the Board out of debt, to be afterward replaced.

—A teacher asked her class to draw a picture of what they wished to be when they grew up. All went diligently to work except one little girl, who only chewed her pencil.

"Don't you know what you want to be when you grow up, Anna?" asked the teacher.

"Yes, I know," replied the little girl, "but I don't know how to draw it. I want to be married."

Reveries of a Preacher's Wife

By Mrs. Marie Ballou Garvin.

Once I read "The Reveries of a Bachelor" —I don't remember just when, but anyway it was during that period of my life after the "brook and river" met, and before they had merged in the sea of matrimony. I am sure it was before! It couldn't have been after, for since the wedding knells—I mean bells—rang for me I've been so busy with the present incumbent that I haven't had time to even read about another man—though I'll risk the statement in a very low tone, that I haven't lost my interest at all. In fact in my capacity as preacher's wife, I yearn very especially over the brethren. The only "literature" I have perused in late years has been street-car advertisements—miles and miles of them —and "Directions" on Castoria bottles. Of course there have been plenty of ponderous tomes on theological subjects sticking around, but I only use them for the children to sit on—it doesn't hurt them any—I mean the children. So, as I said, I'm positively sure that it was before. "The Reveries of a Bachelor" made a deep impression upon me, largely because in those days most anything pertaining to a "bachelor" was of interest. On finishing the little book I thought what a shame that a man with a mind and heart like his should be allowed to remain unattached—someone ought to marry him at once. I might have considered doing him that service myself, if my "services" hadn't already been spoken for. But I guess it was just as well, for I see now that if the dear man had been married there would never have been any more reveries. Married we live, single we dream. If, perchance, the married do drop into a little dream, they don't always "wake up" to a cosy room, a comfortable chair, a cheerful glow in the grate—but then we won't go into that. Suffice it to say, that "life is real, life is earnest," and if "the grave is not our goal," there are times when we're awfully glad it is not abolished, as it is many a married soul's single chance for a rest.

However, I didn't start out to talk about the "weeps" of wedded life, though it wouldn't be a dry subject at all. I was really getting around to something about "Reveries of a Preacher's Wife." Now, you must know that there isn't any such thing—it should be "Realities," but "Reveries" sounds more euphonious, and subjects seldom have much to do with what comes after anyway. Not that I haven't tried reveries. Just the other day I huffed and puffed and blew up a fire in the grate (his Reverence wasn't at home, or he would have helped puff I am sure) for the sole purpose of sitting down comfortably before it in the gloaming, and losing myself in a reverie. When the gloaming arrived and the children were all tucked up for the night silently I stole to the inviting chair before the blazing hearth, sank into its cosiness and lost myself completely. When daddy came home and perceived how very lost I was, he had to use his preaching voice to rouse me, and when I was sufficiently awake so as not to be more than half asleep, I realized that the fire was out, my anatomy cramped, and my reverie a total failure.

I think daddy has tried revelries—I mean reveries. He calls it "thinking himself through"—he is always trying to "think himself through;" but you see he is very deep, and of course it takes quite a while. Usually when he gets himself thought about half through he runs against the dinner question, and the argument has to be laid on the table —until further disposition can be made of it—which doesn't take long.

As for the Realities of a preacher's wife—well now we're getting started. She doesn't have to pinch herself to be sure that life is real—just needs to answer the 'phone and the door-bell, sometimes both at once. Her days never have a dull moment, and there are moments fairly dizzy with excitement—like the day when we were all ready to start on a boat trip and only had twenty minutes to get to the dock, and we couldn't find the baby. She had decided that it was a pity not to call on the neighbors when she was so dressed up. When she had been found and we were at last aboard a car, daddy stood on the front platform beside the motorman all the way downtown, with his open watch in his hand. I think the watch must have been making faces at him—anyhow their relationship didn't seem to be very pleasant. When we arrived at the dock we could see that the boat was still there, and the gang-plank still out, and daddy got both his feet on it, just as it was about to be pulled in. Of course, then it was out of the question to move it, and we all passed over safely, sat down weakly, and made absolutely no effort toward conversation for fully fifteen minutes. It is lovely to take a boat trip with the children. It is too warm in the cabin and too windy on the deck. The children get restless inside, and hang too far over the rail outside. They are thirsty again almost as soon as they return from a trip to the water-tank; and if they know there is a sandwich secreted anywhere in the family effects they want it before the boat has done backing out from the starting point. In fact the pleasure of the trip is only surpassed by the blessedness of getting back.

But I'm wandering—I was talking about 'phone and door-bell rings—the 'phone is ringing now—hush, children, while mother talks.

"Hello!"

"Hello—is the pastor there?"

"Yes, do you wish to speak with him?"

"Please ask him to come down quickly to the City Hospital—this is Mrs. Blank talking—my husband is—is worse—they say he is—is dy-ing—"

"Oh, my dear! Yes, I'll tell him—he'll start down immediately."

It rings again.

"Hello!"

"Hello, may I speak to the pastor?"

"The pastor has been called to a death bed and is hurrying to get started—could you give me your message?"

"No, I wish to speak to him."

"Perhaps you could call up later."

"No, I can't call up later—suppose someone is dying, aren't the living just as important?"

"Of course you're important," (soothingly) "just hold the 'phone and I'll call him.'

"No, never mind—ask him if he can give me the new address of the church organist."

The door-bell rings:

"Ah, what a pleasure! Come in, Sister Pentup!—Run to the playroom children—yes, take the baby up, too—let her have anything she wants, just so she keeps quiet until the caller is gone, then you can take it all away from her. Well, dear Sister Pentup, how are you?"

"Oh, pretty well, but I felt like I just must talk to someone—my heart is so full. We're breaking up housekeeping and going to a boarding-house. Yes, the whole family. I know that perhaps it isn't the best thing for the children, but if something desperate isn't done I'm going to hate my husband—yes, right down hate him! And (sobbingly) I loved him so—before I married him! I know this sounds ridiculous; but it is all on account of the monthly grocery and meat bills. For years my life has been a perfect nightmare of 'keep down the table expenses'—'save money on the meals.' I've had it dinged and dinged and dinged into my ears, and I've tried and tried and tried to keep the family properly fed with nourishing food on the sum he says it ought not to exceed—and I've failed—miserably! (Sobs). You know my husband has everything sort of diagrammed so much for this, so much for that—every bill allowed for except the undertaker's—so there wouldn't be any use in trying to die and end it all, as that item isn't in the diagram. Of course the table expenses are down for a certain figure, which would be all right if the figure were large enough—and he thinks I even ought to save on that. But he don't like beans, or hash, or hamburger, or stew, or anything plebeian and cheap. Enjoys steaks, chops, salads, high-class vegetables, fresh fruits, and can't stand anything in the way of gravy except the all-milk variety. At night I'll be preparing dinner, after fairly cracking my cranium trying to think of something good to eat for the least possible money. He'll come in with kisses all around, and an appreciative glance at the table, and a wifely glow begins to kindle around the region of my heart. But almost immediately he'll take the shortest route to where the grocery slips hang, then 'Great Scott, did you get all that stuff today?' Whereupon I become suddenly possessed of a fierce impulse to snatch the whole dinner from the range, throw it on the floor and tramp it right down through. Instead I bite my lips together, on account of the children, and just go on getting dinner. I have tried so hard—have even considered chloroforming the cat in the hope that her demise might help the grocery bill. Oh, if I could only chloroform the bills!

"Yes, I've tried the popular magazine plan of buying a roast and stretching it four meals, and I think it might be very successful if only we didn't eat it all up the second meal. Our appetites seem to stand so dreadfully in the way of my efforts at economy.

"Yes, and I've tried the 'meatless' dinners —things with 'meat value'—but by the time I get the fifty-seven different ingredients in, a juicy steak would have been cheaper—and my husband says, 'What kind of a mess do you call this?'

"If we go slow on the butter we go fast on the gravy. If I push down the milk bill, the egg bill tips up. No matter where I press there's sure to be a bulge in another spot. If we don't eat one thing, we eat another, and that's all there is to it. I simply am getting grey and wrinkled and blear-eyed over trying to decide whether the water off the macaroni had better be saved for soup or for gravy. I hate it, and am hardly a hair's breadth from hating him, too!

"How did I get him to consent to try boarding? Why I argued that it would be cheaper.

"Yes, we're going to 'The Livingstill.' Do come and see me—it has been such a comfort to tell you my troubles. There's one big consolation, I won't be spending three hours every day on a meal to be eaten up in ten minutes! I'm going to use the time now cultivating my good looks. Good-bye!"

"Yes, children, Mrs. Pentup has gone—you

(Continued on page 19.)

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS."

Copyright 1911, George H. Doran Co.

CHAPTER III (Continued.)

"You know I've written before about the standard being different. But father was all upset by it. Mother, I don't think I have any tempation to gamble as a regular thing, and I have promised never to bet again, but you know I like nice things and I wanted the money so I wouldn't have to bone quite so hard. Father is good to me to let me stay on. I don't know what I would have done if he had taken me out. There is no other school quite up to this for equipment and I'm not fit for anything else. I'm working on a new lamp for city street lighting. We are allowed so many hours a week for original study and research. I can't describe my work and you would not understand it if I did. But my problem is to find a way of making an electric arc light which will go without an expensive mechanism and be self-regulating without machinery. There is a German student in my class by the name of Felix Bauer who is working at the same problem. Bauer is a good friend of mine and we have our laboratory tables in the same number. Now, mother, you won't think I am altogether depraved, will you? I am planning to stick close to work from now on. I don't want to disappoint you and father and I don't believe I shall. But you will remember, won't you, that the standard here is different from the one at home in many ways. For example, mother, most of the fellows talk very freely and even coarsely about girls, and a good many of the rich set have pictures of actresses in heir rooms and tell stories about them that I can't repeat. All that disgusts me and I have never heard anyone utter any protest in a crowd where the stories are going around. You see the standard is different here. And I told father of a number of other customs that are different from those we are used to at home. I can't describe it exactly, but I can feel the difference. I don't believe there is very much of what we know at home as 'spiritual life.' There are some fine fellows here and some high ambitions, but the chapel service is all voluntary, and only a handful of fellows ever go unless some big gun comes to give a chapel talk, and then the president allows only fifteen minutes for the whole service.

"What you wrote about Helen having a beau was funny. I can't imagine what Helen will do when the callers begin to come. Well, mother, I want you to think of me as too busy with my work to get into any more trouble. I am awfully interested, especially in the original problem—I believe I almost stumbled on the making of a successful arc light, without a regulating mechanism, a few days ago. I have been dreaming over it ever since and I am quite confident it can be done. Felix Bauer said the other day he thought he had it all right, but the plan escaped him. It's exciting, mother, to keep trying different combinations, not knowing any minute when you may hit on a new discovery. I hope Louis is behaving himself in his studies. I am sending him by mail a time switch that he asked me about.

"Much love to all. Your affectionate son,
"Walter."

Esther read this letter carefully twice, and then, as her habit was, answered it almost immediately. It was a part of her training of her children that she had frankly taken them into her confidence when they were little and had had the wisdom and courage to discuss with them the questions that were really vital to their bodies and minds. There was one reason Walter wrote as frankly to his mother as he did about everything, knowing she would understand exactly. And that was the reason his mother in her turn could write as she did in reply, entering fully into the boy's real life.

She did not take much time to reproach him for the betting incident, believing that Paul had emphasized that quite strongly, but she did express the hope that her son would not be afraid to be independent of surroundings and stand on his own feet and have his own convictions, and then she went on to say: "One of the hardest things you will have to do all your life is to be independent. This will take more courage often than for a woman to be out of fashion. But there isn't a finer thing in all the world than an independent soul, one that knows the right and does it even if the whole world around is doing exactly the other thing. If the coarse stories you mention are told in your presence you don't have to join in the laugh over them. There are a number of ways in which you can clearly make those fellows understand your attitude in that matter and of course you have the right and privilege of guarding yourself from any talk of that sort in your own room. Your room is your castle. Guard it from impurity. I feel as if almost any kind of wrong could be excused in a young man who has the virtue of a pure heart and maintains constant respect for womankind. But, if I ever gave you any advice about the choice of a friend, I think I should be quite safe in saying to you, be very slow to accept into the sacred place of your friendship any young man who talks with impure lips of womanhood. Such a man is a blight on all he touches.

"I trust you, Walter, to make the most of your opportunities and make us all proud of you. Success to the arc lamp. Write us the minute you succeed. Tell me more about the German schoolmate. We are interested in him and somehow I feel from the little you have told us of him that he is a fine young fellow.

"Helen is very dignified about her callers. There is nothing more to tell about her.

"All send love, most of all, mother."

When Paul reached home he told Esther somewhat in detail the incidents of the boat race and his interview with the president. He was hopeful for Walter and believed the boy had learned his lesson and would not fail at that point again. But he could not understand the particular "streak," as he called it, in Walter's make up, which seemed to demand expensive and needless luxuries.

"The boy had bought a very elaborate dresser. It was quartered oak and had a number of patent arrangements about it that made it unusually expensive. Walter confessed it cost him forty-seven dollars. This was one of the things he went in debt for. It seems he had become enamoured of just such a dresser in one of the rooms he had been caring for, a suite belonging to Van Shaw, the son of the steel magnate at Allworth. Of course, we want our son to go through school with all the comforts around him necessary for his proper culture and education. But I cannot see for the life of me how a forty-seven dollar quartered oak dresser is going to make any more of a man of him, especially when he goes in debt for it. I told him so and to my disappointment he took what I said rather badly. That is, he flared up some and seemed hurt at my criticism of his luxurious habits. But it isn't the luxurious tastes I object to so much as the reckless and inexcusable act of going in debt for such a thing; that is perfectly inexcusable. Where did Walter get his tastes, do you suppose?"

"Oh, dear, I don't know," said Esther with a sigh. "You know Louis used to have just a streak in him. Perhaps some of my ancestors on father's side were French aristocrats before the revolution. You know the Darcys had estates in southern France in the sixteenth century. I don't believe any more than you do, Paul, that a forty-seven dollar dresser is at all necessary to Walter's education. He will have to learn better ways. We must not forget his splendid good qualities in other directions. He has a great many. I can't believe he is going to disappoint us."

"No, I can't believe that," said Paul gravely. "But the boy has much to learn and I hope he will learn it without unnecessary suffering."

It was this same week, two days after the receipt of his mother's letter, that Walter had an unusual and rather dramatic opportunity to act on his mother's advice, in the matter of asserting his rights about the kind of conversation he would permit in his own room.

Walter had very little acquaintance with Van Shaw and the rich men's sons' set at Burrton. But incidentally it had come out during his chance meeting with Van Shaw that Walter's mother was a Darcy. The Darcys were at the time immensely influential at Allworth, Van Shaw's home. The fact that Walter was doing manual labor at Burrton did not affect his social standing very seriously, as at the time, there had not come into Burrton the social stigma against a student working his way through which had already come into several state universities and technical schools in this country. Besides, there was in all of Walter's make up that indefinable stamp of high breeding and refinement, helped on by an unusually attractive and handsome bearing, which made him look distinguished in any group of young men. When he had put on his best suit before the forty-seven dollar dresser and come out on the rare occasions when he could spare time for some function, he was in many ways the most elegant person in all the company.

Van Shaw had gradually taken a peculiar attitude toward Walter, partly of recognition of his family and its antecedents and partly of patronage, as if he took for granted Walter would welcome his attentions. As a matter of fact, Walter resented Van Shaw's bearing toward him, but in his weakness and his leaning toward the upper society he envied, Walter endured what otherwise he would have been ashamed to acknowledge. On two occasions it had been a relief to Walter to be of help to Van Shaw in the electrical rooms. And on the particular occasion we are now to describe Van Shaw had come into Walter's room one evening to ask him about a point in connection with some original work which had to do with the winding of a single phase alternator.

While they were talking over the problem and Walter was trying to make Van Shaw see how important it was to take account of the position induced in the several turns and the fact of the reaction of the armature current, half a dozen other fellows dropped in. Walter was quite popular and not infrequently eight or ten students might be found in his rooms, as on this occasion.

Van Shaw was soon in possession of all Walter's knowledge on the subject, for he was bright enough mentally, and he carelessly sauntered over to the dresser and made a comment on it. Then he noticed a picture of Helen Douglas, a new one which Helen had sent to Walter within the last few days.

"Sister, isn't she?" asked Van Shaw.

Walter nodded.

"Mighty handsome girl. Hope she'll visit you some time," said Van Shaw, as he picked up the photograph and started to pass it around among the other fellows.

There was something so offensive in the tone and manner of Van Shaw that Walter who was standing near him, intercepted the picture before anyone in the room could take it. He put it back into its place without a word. Van Shaw laughed.

"Say, maybe she isn't your sister, either. That makes me think" and before Walter could realize what he was doing, Van Shaw had begun a questionable story, while the group in the room sat and lounged around with looks of anticipated amusement.

Walter Douglas will never forget that scene and his part in it if he lives a hundred years. Van Shaw was leaning up against the dresser, in a vain way mindful of the impression he was about to make, when Walter interrupted him. Walter was very pale and what he said came from lips that trembled with a mingling of anger, and fear of the result.

"Wait! I would rather you would not tell that story in my room."

Van Shaw could not have been more astonished if Walter had pointed a gun at him. The rest of the company simply stared in the most profound silence at Walter. Ten or fifteen seconds ticked away. Then Van Shaw, who had turned very red in the face, said slowly: "I don't know as you have anything to say about this. I don't intend to let a good story go untold."

"You don't tell it here in my room."

"I don't? Who will prevent it?"

"I will."

Van Shaw turned a little toward Walter. Douglas was smaller, shorter, and of lighter build in every way than himself. But he was in the real point of vantage, in his own room. The other students did not seem disposed to take any sides in the matter. But one of them said: " Oh, cut it out, Van, if Douglas doesn't like it. A fellow has a right to say what he wants in his own room. It's only a matter of taste anyhow."

Van Shaw looked at Walter savagely. Then he sauntered across the room.

"Come out in the hall, fellows, and I'll finish there. This air is too pious for my health."

Some of the boys laughed, and three or four fellows followed Van Shaw out. The rest stayed. When the door shut on Van Shaw, one of the older students, who had been silent throughout, walked up to Walter and shook hands with him. Then the rest of the group followed. Not a word was said by anyone. These youths, some of them already hardened by dissipation, had at least the native good sense not to mar the occasion by any silly attempt at words. They simply shook Walter's hand and went out. And when the last one was gone, Walter turned the key in his door and went into his bedroom adjoining, and flung himself down on the bed and cried.

I don't know that he could have given any real reason for his emotion. But he was somewhat unstrung by the event. And a number of tumultuous feelings were stirring deeply in him. He turned hot and cold at the thought of his own possible cowardice. And then he felt a reaction of shame in the thought that after this, Van Shaw and all his set would cut him dead. He was ashamed to feel, even after all he had done, that he still shrank from the possibility of social scorn, even from a set of men who had no more moral standing than Van Shaw had.

But, on the whole, having stood by his rights as he had, and having the pleasant consciousness of being true to his own principles, he was disposed to feel a glow of commendation, and later in the evening as Helen's splendid picture looked at him almost as if she were present, Walter said to himself: "I'm glad I spoke out. I'm glad."

And then, because he had been brought up from a small boy to confide in his mother, he found great relief for his feelings that same night in writing to her. He mentioned no names, simply said that curiously soon after his mother had written as she did about guarding his own room from evil talk he had had an opportunity to do it. He did not dwell upon the matter at all, and did not take any special credit to himself for his actions, but simply reminded his mother again of the difference in standards and conduct. He expressed gratitude that some of the fellows had at least silently stood by him. And he ended his letter by saying that he was almost on the edge of discovery of the arc light, although it still eluded him.

For the next two weeks Walter was completely absorbed in his studies. Every spare hour he could get he pored and worked over his original problem. There were points about it which perplexed and exasperated him. Felix Bauer was as hard at work on the same problem as himself, and said one evening with a good-natured laugh that he believed he had mastered it. "All I lack is that one thing necessary what we call the 'Beduerfniss' the 'einge gewolte.'" said Bauer, as he took off his shop cap and thoughtfully ran a lead pencil back and forth through the short curly hair over his ear.

"That's all I lack," said Walter. "If I could get your einege gewolte,' I would have my answer."

"Hope you will get it," said Bauer, pleasantly, as he closed up his locker and went out to meet another class period.

After he had gone, Walter worked on until he was the only person left in the workroom. He had the entire afternoon and evening, as it happened, and was so absorbed in his experiments that he was hardly aware of his being alone until he looked up and saw that the big room was empty, and that it was dusk. Without any thought of supper he turned on the light over his table and made some mathematical calculations. Then he ran out of paper and looked about over the litter of stuff in front of him for another piece, but not finding any, glanced naturally over to Bauer's table, which was next his own.

There was a folded bit of paper there, and Walter reached out for it, took it, and opened it up. It was covered on one side with some drawings and diagrams, and as Walter looked at them, not paying much attention at first, as he worked a high power formula over in his head, a little at a time it dawned on him as he continued to stare at Bauer's drawings, that without having realized it himself, perhaps, Bauer had actually suggested in his own drawing the key to the arc light Walter had been puzzling over for several months without success.

"Yes! yes!" Walter was saying, excitedly, to himself. "I see it! I see it! What a numby I was. The electrodes can be fitted with teeth at equal distances. Let the tooth rest on the porcelain plate. It will gradually soften and melt under the heat of the arc. Then—then. I see! I see—the electrode will, or it ought to, drop down of its own weight upon the next tooth. Then that will melt and the electrode will drop again. The two electrodes can be coupled together with a scissors coupling, so the teeth will have to be made in only one of them. I see the whole thing! Hurrah!" He said the last word out loud. The echo of it in the big, empty shop startled him. The glow of the discoverer, of the inventor, was on him and within him. Then he received a distinct reaction. That was Bauer's paper, not his! He had left it out of the locker when he went away! It was Bauer's discovery, not his, even if Bauer did not yet realize the real value and meaning of his diagram. He was on the road to the discovery.

Walter stared at the paper again and wished he had never seen it. For he was face to face with a real temptation, one of the hardest and most alluring his young manhood had ever confronted, and he was afraid, as he continued to stare at the diagram made by Felix Bauer.

(To be continued.)

A Little Nonsense

"Laugh and grow fat." "Yes, and then get laughed at."—Boston Transcript.

"Is this fresh-air experiment of yours a tentative one?" "Quite so. I'm camping out."—Baltimore American.

An excited labor member once shouted, "If this bill passes, I see before the workingmen of England a future from which they have been for too many years kept out."—New York Tribune.

"My doctor told me I would have to quit eating so much meat." "Did you laugh him to scorn?" "I did at first; but, when he sent in his bill, I found he was right."—Washington Star.

Two or three young men were exhibiting with great satisfaction the results of a day's fishing, whereupon the young woman remarked, very demurely: "Fish go in schools do they not?" "I believe they do; but why do you ask?" "Oh, nothing, only I was just thinking that you must have broken up an infant class."—Washington Star.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

CLARA BARTON

Address at the Funeral, by Rev. William E. Barton, D. D., Pastor First Congregational Church, Oak Park, Chicago.

The world's wars are fought by men, and they redound to the glory of manhood. Poets and historians sing for us in all ages, "I sing of arms, and the man." There is one side of war whose sole historian is the recording angel—the sorrows, the sacrifice and the heroism of woman. Every bullet that penetrates the flesh of man finds somewhere the heart of a woman.

"The maid that binds her warrior's sash,
With smile that well her pain dissembles,
The while beneath her glittering lash,
One pearly tear drop hangs and trembles—
Though heaven alone records the tear,
And fame can never know its story,
Her heart has shed a drop as dear
As e'er bedewed the field of glory.
The mother who conceals her grief
While to her breast her son she presses,
And breathes one earnest prayer and brief—
Kissing the patriot brow she blesses
With no one but her secret God.
To know the pain that weighs upon her,
Sheds holy blood as e'er the sod
Received on Freedom's field of honor."

Two Massachusetts women, both of whom lived past the age of ninety, exemplify the honorable share of women in the great war for the freedom of slaves. Julia Ward Howe had a vision of the spiritual significance of the conflict and she gave that vision to inspire the men who fought. She saw it through flame and smoke, but her eyes beheld the glory of the coming of the Lord. Her song put ardor into their fighting. But Clara Barton had another vision. It was a vision of the awful suffering which war brings. Ere the echo of the guns had died down she sought the battle field, and ministered to the wounded and the dying. Men who lay in agony in the dark, suffering from the pain and the gun-shot thirst, saw in her lantern the shining of a star of hope, and they drank new life from the cup she held to their parched and suffering lips. Men listened for her footfall on the hospital floor as for the sound of sweet music. Into the midst of men who late had been fighting with all the fury of demons, she came like an angel of mercy.

When peace returned she sought out the graves of the unknown dead, and brought tidings to those whose mourning had added to it the cruel sorrow of uncertainty. As she had brought the ministry of home to the battle field, so she brought tidings of battle field to the home. Tens of thousands of soldiers and their friends bless and still bless the name of Clara Barton.

She inherited a good name, a name borne in honor by many a soldier of the Revolution; the name of the man who gave us the United States seal, and who substituted for the rattle-snake with thirteen rattles the National Emblem of the American Eagle. She was a soldier's daughter and she had a soldier's spirit but she never ceased to be womanly. In all that she saw of hate and cruelty she never became anything less than a lady, a sweet-spirited, modest gentlewoman.

The Hope of Peace.

I live in the earnest hope of universal peace. It is a frightful thing that 1900 years after the coming of the Prince of Peace men and nations should engage in wholesale murder.

But bad as war is and terrible as the evils that accompany it, it has served to bring some fine qualities in the life of the race. It stands as an expression of loyalty that does not count the cost; for sacrifice that can be faithful unto death.

"When all the blandishments of life are gone,
The coward slinks to death, the brave live on."

We have need to guard by gentler means but with no less devotion the principles that were fought for and purchased for us by the blood of brave men.

Our enemies without are not those we need to fear. Ours are like those within Troy's wooden horse, welcomed within our gates. Well may we take to heart the lessons of Byron's lament over Greece:

"Clime of the unforgotten wave
Whose land from shore to mountain cave
Was Freedom's home or Glory's grave—
Shrine of the mighty! can it be
That this is all is left of thee?
Approach, thou craven, crouching slave!
Say, is not this Thermopylae?
These waters blue that round her cave,
O servile offspring of the free,
Pronounce what sea, what shore is this?
The gulf, the rock of Salamis!
'Twere long to tell and sad to trace
Each step from glory to disgrace.
Enough, no foreign foe could quell
Thy soul till from itself it fell."

We need some peaceful but potent ideal that shall have the moral value of war. We need a new leaf of the nation's blood like that of 1861 to build within us our faith in democracy, and to demonstrate the safety and efficiency of government by the people.

I do not underrate the work which men must do in peace and war to preserve unsullied the glory of our heritage. To men belongs, and ever must belong, I think, the larger sphere of public action. I am less interested in securing larger privilege for women—though I gladly favor that—than I am in rousing the manhood of our nation to its full responsibility. We cannot safely permit our manhood to sink its moral responsibilty in commercialism and load larger burdens upon womanhood.

But I say these words on manhood in parenthesis, and by way of guarding from the appearance of one-sidedness the tribute which on this day I gladly pay to womanhood.

Revelations of Worth.

There are some revelations of the worth of sacrifice which men understand only in a vague, remote and masculine way, but which are fully known to women. When Mary broke the alabaster box over the head of her Lord, she did a thing which no man would ever have thought of. Judas misunderstood through the baseness of his motive, but all the other apostles misunderstood. Women understand that incident. Even bad women give their all for love's sake; and good women understand by intuition the glory of a love that does not count the cost. That is the secret of the love of motherhood. That is the secret of such service as that of Clara Barton.

And that love is courageous. A hundred times—not less—men have said to me, "This will crush my poor wife,"—and behold, she has met the terrible tragedy with courage greater than his own.

Women who lived near the battle fields knew that. I have talked with scores of them, all over the Southland. And I see the tribute of those women here among the flowers. How eloquent are these flowers! And beside all these roses and lilies and violets are the southern magnolias—the tribute of southern womanhood: for she tenderly cared for the boys in gray as truly as for those in blue. We crown her with them all. For this is the day of her coronation.

Teach the World a Lesson.

Such lives as hers teach the world a lesson which it must never be permitted to forget—namely that this wealth of human life is not in what it gets but what it gives. What you get will soon be gone though you live for ninety years. But what you give—that, if anything, must constitute your right to immortality. It is the only way in which really earnest men ever estimate life—their own and others. It is the only way to judge of the success of the soldier, the artist, the poet, the singer, the preacher—or even the man of wealth. There is not in all Christendom a tombstone which bears the dollar sign as its message of the significance of life; but ten thousand monuments bear to the skies the cross—symbol of service and of sacrifice. And lives like this illustrate the meaning of that symbol translated with terms of personal character.

The apostle James asks, "What is your life? It is even a vapor which appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away." But the vapor fell to earth as a pearly raindrop, which watered the root of a flower. And then by subterranean channels flowing, broke forth in a spring and flowed singing to the sea. It made the flower more beautiful, it quenched the thirst of lakes, it turned the wheels of industry, and it bore great ships on their trackless journey. It vanished away; but when it rose in mist it was fragrant with its act of ministry, and the glory of the burdens it had borne grew radiant as the sun poured through its sevenfold prismatic splendor. There are lives like that. They fall from heaven, and flow through the years from infancy to age gladdening and brightening all life; and when they vanish the rainbow spans the grave, and its further end reaches the golden pavement of the city of God.

Great Honors.

Clara Barton received in her lifetime such honors as perhaps came to no other American woman of her generation. At home and abroad great men did her reverence, and kings spoke her name with gratitude.

The battle of Santiago had been fought. San Juan Hill was ours. Cervera's fleet was at the bottom of the sea. The city was ready for the tread of the conquerer. What ship first bore our flag into the harbor? Not the flagship New York with Admiral Sampson on board. Not the cruiser Brooklyn, commanded by the gallant Schley. Not the Texas, with brave Captain Jack Philip in command. But it was another Texas—the supply ship which by chance bore the same name. Admiral Sampson sent a pilot aboard her, and she led the way. All the ships of war anchored outside the harbor while the relief ship entered the harbor ahead. Not with the booming of cannon, not with the shout of victory, but with the singing of Christian hymns, and the outstretched hand of help. Never before in the history of warfare was there triumphal entry such as this. Above floated the stars and stripes, but high above that floated the Red Cross—the Cross of peace, good will and loving service in the spirit of the Christ. That ship for which the whole American navy made way was commanded by a little woman—and that woman was Clara Barton.

It was a prophecy, I think, of what we yet may see. The tumult and the shouting die. The sounds of the guns grow faint and cease. But heroism does not die. Love and loyal service does not die. High over all the flags of nations flies the banner of loving sacrifice, and the color of that flag is red with the life of all who serve, and its eternal emblem is the Cross.

Woman's Doings

—There is no doubt that a great deal of nerve and great courage were shown by the women who escaped from the Titanic. Miss Alice Farnam Leader, a New York physician, escaped from the Titanic on the same boat which carried the Countess Rothes. "The countess is an expert oars-woman," said Dr. Leader, "and thoroughly at home on the water. She practically took command of our boat when it was found that the seamen, who had been placed at the oars, could not row skillfully. Several of the women took their places with the countess at the oars and rowed in turns, while the weak and unskillful stewards sat quietly in one end of the boat."

—Kate Douglas Wiggin has gone abroad for her annual spring visit to the British Isles.

—Official figures just published show that more than two-thirds of the old pensioners in the county of London are women.

—Miss Harriet Quimby, an American air woman, dramatic writer for "Leslie's Weekly," crossed the English Channel from Dover, last week, landing at Hardelot. Miss Quimby is the first woman to accomplish the feat of flying across the channel alone. Her flight occupied two hours. She flew under the name of Mme. Alfrier.

—The Jewish women of St. Louis will build a home for the wage earning women of the race, and considerable progress has been reported as to the amount of money already raised for the purpose. The intention is at present to rent a large building, which shall afterward give place to a building of their own, possibly. It is expected that the home will be self-supporting.

—Miss Julia C. Lathrop, in Hull house work for twenty years, has been appointed chief of the new children's bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor. Miss Lathrop is the first woman to be made a bureau chief in any department of the government. Miss Lathrop came to Chicago from Rockford, Ill., in 1890, and has been prominently identified with social and reform work since her arrival. She is president of the Illinois Society for Mental Hygiene, vice-president of the Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy, chairman of the Phychopathic institute, is a graduate and trustee of Vassar college, and is a member of the Chicago Woman's club and the Chicago Woman's Civic club.

Boys and Girls

Preacher Billy

By Gertrude M. Fielder.

"Grandmother," said Billy, "I think I will be a preacher-man when I grow up."

"That will please me very much," said grandmother, "but you need not wait until you are a man before you begin preaching, Billy."

Billy opened his brown eyes very wide, "Why, grandmother, little boys don't preach!" he exclaimed.

"Billy," said grandmother slowly, "we are not all called like Doctor Davis to preach from a pulpit to a church full of people, but we are all called to preach by the example of our lives. Listen, Billy, if you take this one verse—'Be ye kind one to another,' and live it every day, by doing kind and loving deeds to all your little playmates, to the poor and sick and to all dumb animals, you will be just as truly a preacher as Doctor Davis."

That evening Billy's papa brought him home something in a tiny white box—and what do you suppose Billy found in the box? A blue button and engraved upon it in letters of gold were the words, "Be kind."

"Now, Billy," said papa, "you must see how many you can get to join your Gospel army."

The next morning Billy went out to play in the garden—there in the gravel walk, almost under his feet was a yellow worm taking a walk. What if it should get stepped on, so many people came up the gravel walk, the butcher-man, the grocer's boy and the ice-man. Billy ran across the lawn to the lilac bush and hastily picked a leaf, back to the gravel walk he raced, just in time too, for the butcher-man was almost at the door.

"Look out! Look out!" cried Billy and down on his knees in front of the butcher-man he fell.

"Whew!" said the butcher-man, "hurt yourself, Billy?"

"You almost squashed it," said Billy indignantly. He picked up the worm and laid it gently on the leaf, then he showed the butcher-man his badge and told him all about it.

"That's pretty good," said the butcher-man, "say, Billy, I'll join your army."

"All right," returned Billy as he hurried down to the orchard with the worm.

As he laid it gently down in the grass in the shade of an apple tree, he spied a bird's nest and in the nest were five blue eggs. Billy stooped to pick up the nest when a bird rose out of the grass and with frightened calls flew up into the apple tree.

Poor Billy, how should he get the nest back into the tree, the tree was so tall and he was so short.

Suddenly he heard a merry whistle, it was the grocer's boy. Billy ran to meet him, the nest in his hand.

"My, where'd you get it?" asked the boy. "I know a fellow who's collecting birds' eggs. Say, Billy, what'll you take for it?"

Billy's brown eyes flashed—he pointed to the blue button. "That means I've got to be kind to birds and—and everything," he said.

Billy had hardly stopped speaking before the grocer's boy was climbing up into the apple tree with the nest held carefully in his cap. "Haven't got another button, have you, Billy? I'd like to wear one too," said the boy, but Billy shook his head.

Just then he caught sight of grandmother coming out of the side door. She had on her white sun bonnet and the large shiny shears were in her hand. Grandmother was going to the garden to gather fresh flowers for the table and for the blue bowls which stood on the piazza. Grandmother loved flowers, so did Billy.

"Oh, grandmother!" cried Billy, "may I take a bunch, a great big bunch of flowers to sick Mrs. Graham?"

"Yes, indeed," answered grandmother. So while grandmother snipped pink, yellow and white blooms with the large, shiny shears, Billy told her about the worm and the bird's nest.

"My little boy is certainly preaching," said grandmother as she kissed the rosy face.

But even little preachers must eat and take naps, so it was four o'clock before Billy in a clean white middy suit started out once more on his preaching tour.

As he turned the corner of the house he heard the cook's voice in angry tones saying, "No, I don't give food to tramps," and a very sorrowful looking man was coming slowly down the steps.

"Wait right here a minute, please," said Billy and into the house he darted.

Very soon grandmother was in the kitchen cutting bread and meat with a generous hand. Billy put the plate down on the top step and sat down beside it. "Come," he said to the man. The man ate hungrily —when at last the plate was empty he looked up at Billy. "Say," said he pointing with grimy fingers to the blue button, "was it that made you do it?"

"Course," answered Billy, "wouldn't you like to be a preacher-man too?" he added politely.

"Say kid," said the man slowly, "spose you wouldn't give that badge away?"

Billy's under lip quivered, he had worn it only one day, he loved the blue and gold badge, but he hesitated only for an instant, unpinning it from his white blouse he handed it to the man.

"Could you pin it on?" asked the man, and Billy pinned it on.

"I need it more'n you do," said the man.

Billy watched him go down the walk and out of the gate, then he went in search of grandmother.

"I think," said grandmother, "that my little boy can preach even without the aid of the button, what do you think, Billy?"

Billy looked thoughtful for a moment, then he threw both arms around grandmother's neck and gave her a "big bear's hug." "I guess 'p'raps the hungry man hasn't any grandmother so I'm glad he's got the blue button," he said. "And I'm going to preach lots more tomorrow, grandmother."

Just a Kid

A little toddlin' kid,
With a frowsy, woolly head,
And a pair of denim breeches
Far too big;

With eyes like purple flowers,
And tears like April showers,
And a smile like summer sunshine
And the dew.

With teeth like rows of pearls,
And hair that clings and curls,
With shoes all scratched and scarred
At the toe;

Is the happy little feller
That keeps my old heart meller,
And lets a little sunshine
Through the blue.

S. W. Compton, Jr.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Beardstown church received five additions on Easter Sunday. The pastor is G. W. Morton.

The Mill Shoals meeting resulted in thirty additions to the membership. The meeting was conducted by Evangelists Hill and Knowles.

Robinson church, of which W. T. Walker is pastor, was assisted in a meeting by Miss Lucile May Park of Iowa. There were twenty-six additions.

Evangelist Charles D. Hougham of the Fifth District was scheduled to begin a revival meeting at Gillespie. The service is to continue indefinitely.

It is reported that H. C. Parsons, who has been pastor of Williamsville church for four years, has resigned, the resignation to become effective early in the summer.

West Salem church held a revival meeting under the leadership of J. V. Coombs. There were eight additions, six being by confession from the Sunday-school. The minister is G. W. Ford.

Edgar D. Jones of First Church, Bloomington, was recently invited to consider a call to the Central Church in Seattle. Mr. Jones is, however, too securely established in the hearts of his Bloomington congregation to be dislodged from that pastorate.

The pastors of the churches in Lincoln are holding a union revival in the opera house. They are having the assistance of a singer, O. L. Thompson. George W. Wise of the Church of the Disciples, is coöperating heartily in the services.

L. A. Chapman, who has been successfully ministering at Carmi, has received and accepted a call to the Fourth Church of St. Louis. The new pastorate will be assumed the first of May, which will leave a vacancy in one of the most ambitious of southern Illinois churches.

Cowden congregation, of which F. M. Stambaugh is pastor, celebrated Easter Sunday and received an offering of more than fourteen dollars, in addition to several barrels of fruit and clothing for the National Benevolent Association. There were two additions on this Sunday to the church.

A union revival meeting at Mt. Pulaski was concluded with a large number of conversions. The Disciple Church received about forty-five, all but ten being on confession of faith. This makes a total of nearly seventy additions to the congregation since J. Newton Cloe became pastor the first of the year. The church this year made an offering of twenty-five dollars for foreign missions.

E. H. Reed, pastor for four years of Washington Church, presented his resignation to that congregation to accept a call to Kansas church. The latter is one of the best of the churches among the Disciples in the smaller towns of the eastern part of the state. Mr. Reed's pastorate will begin in a short time.

Olney church, where W. S. Gamboe is preacher, profited by a lecture on "The Boy in His Teens," by Dr. W. A. Swarts of Danville. A lecture from a capable physician on such a subject should be profitable for any church. It is a step in the direction of interesting the congregation in the boy problem, which is after all only the world problem in its incipiency.

The Ministerial Association of the tri-cities, including Granite City, where O. W. Jennings has recently resigned the pastorate, framed resolutions of esteem complimenting the minister for his fraternal attitude toward his brother ministers, and testifying to his scholarship and exemplary demeanor as a minister of the Gospel. The resolution was signed by the president and secretary of the Association and published in the local newspapers.

The pastorate of W. F. Turner at Central Church, Peoria, was terminated Sunday, April 21. Mr. Turner has efficiently led this congregation for three years. The success of his leadership has been noted through the city and state and his departure is a distinct loss to the Illinois ministry. He becomes pastor of North Yakima, Washington, church, after a brief vacation spent in Missouri. The congregation at Peoria has not yet decided upon his successor, but is in correspondence with several applicants for the pulpit.

The pastor and congregation of Petersburg church found extraordinary delight and profit in the union Passion Week services, held in that city. The Methodist, Presbyterian and Christian churches coöperated in the services. A. I. Zeller preached on Palm Sunday night in the Presbyterian Church. His discourse was on Christian Union, which was received most cordially by both ministers and congregation. On Thursday night a union communion service was held, which proved to be remarkably inspirational. The Disciple pastor's observation arising out of a consciousness of the blessing which came to himself from the services will be echoed by all sincere Christian hearts. His observation was that "it is blessed to see folks getting together and getting acquainted, and that when we get to loving each other well enough it will come to us what to say and the Lord's name will be honored in our union." At the Easter services there were two additions by baptism in this church.

The enterprising officers of the Third District have published a twelve-page booklet with announcement of affairs pertaining to the work of that district. It contains excellent likenesses of the various officials of the District, with a spicy characterization of each one. It is printed in good form, the cuts are clear, and the entire piece of work most excellently conceived and executed. Special announcement is made of the District Convention, to be held at Dallas City, May 14-16. Those whose likenesses appear are: L. G. Huff, president; F. L. Moore, vice president; A. I. Zeller, secretary; H. J. Reynolds and C. Lee Stauffer, advisors; and District Worker J. D. Williams and Mrs. J. D. Williams. Entire responsibility for this initial edition of the booklet named "The Third District Reporter," is assumed by A. I. Zeller, secretary of the district, and reflects credit upon its editor, whose residence is no longer within the district, but continues the active secretaryship at the earnest solicitation of his co-workers.

J. H. Gilliland Stricken

J. H. Gilliland, now pastor of Normal church and for twenty-five years a minister in Bloomington, recently suffered a stroke of paralysis, and at present writing is at his home in a critical condition. Mr. Gilliland had just finished preparing a long article on "Twenty-five Years in Bloomington" to be read the day following at the concluding services of the seventy-fifth anniversary celebration of First Church, where his pastorate continued for more than twenty years with remarkable success. The paper, which was of unusual interest on account of personal and human touches, was read at the Sunday evening service by Milo Atkinson, pastor of Centennial church of the same city. Mr. Gilliland's friends, both in Blomington and throughout the state and Brotherhood, will be anxious to learn of his convalescence, and will pray most devoutly for his recovery. No man in the Illinois pulpit has had a more marked influence on the Brotherhood's progress throughout the state than Mr. Gilliland.

LATER.—Just as we are making ready for the press, the sad word comes that Mr. Gilliland passed away last Saturday. Edgar DeWitt Jones will tell Christian Century readers of the strength and richness of his personality and the signal achievements of his long ministry in Bloomington.

News Editorial

Counter Opinion on Sunday Revival.

Some months ago The Christian Century presented an interpretation of conditions existing in an Illinois city two and one-half years after a William A. Sunday revival. A study of this revival, with conclusions somewhat at variance from those presented in this interpretation was presented in a sermon recently preached by F. W. Burnham, pastor of First Church, Springfield. The city is the same for both reports. In the interest of truth it is well to have both sides stated. We welcome, therefore, the opportunity to relate in brief outline the sermon of a pastor who engaged sympathetically in the Sunday revival, and since has continued in the pastorate with the same church.

The occasion for the sermon was the celebration of the third anniversary of the reception of 347 converts from the revival into Mr. Burnham's church. Post cards were mailed by the pastor to all these converts residing in the city, extending an urgent invitation to attend the morning service in celebration of their entrance to the church, or requesting a reply where attendance was impossible. It is only fair to say that the writer was not privileged to hear the sermon, and in the prolonged absence of the minister from the city is compelled to report the discourse in resumé as outlined by several who did hear it.

"Most of the Converts 'Stick.'"

One of the first reports came by way of the newspaper where a headline announced, "Most of the converts of three years ago 'stick,' according to the Rev. F. W. Burnham." The figures to verify this, and which were taken from the sermon, show that of the 347 converts 59 had died or removed from the city; 55 were nominal members; only two had fallen by the wayside, and 230 were still active.

From among the converts, four have been elected deacons and are now serving in the congregation's officiary.

It was observed by the pastor that one of the most discouraging features in the congregation after the revival was the early backsliding of former members of the church, in whom enthusiasm had been re-born in the revival. The influence of their early falling away was among the most powerful factors in counteracting the enthusiasm of the new recruits. The reclaimed Christians were declared to be the first to become lukewarm following the meeting.

General Good.

As touching the general religious life of the community, it was pointed out that a flourishing Young Women's Christian Association and the Washington Street Mission, located in a poorer section of the city, stand as direct results of the revival. The former organization, while being agitated before the revival was planned, came into existence at the conclusion of the meeting and through the leadership of Mr. Sunday's helpers. In addition to these general religious organizations is a group of eighteen Bible classes, meeting for the most part every week, remaining as outgrowths of the cottage prayer-meetings held in large numbers daily during the revival. Here are women of all sorts doing class work, in some instances of university grade.

As a possible result of the revival it was pointed out that three fine church buildings are now in process of construction. Of these church properties one, that of Mr. Burnham's own congregation, will be valued at $130,000; a second, Episcopalian, at probably more than this figure; and a third, Lutheran, at $43,000. The first two will be the most expensive edifices in the city.

Referring to civic conditions influenced by the meeting, it was noted that Springfield had, some time after the revival, adopted the Commission form of government, and for a year this system has been operating successfully.

Saloons.

"The saloons," said the pastor, "are not closed, but it is to be remembered that during the closing days of the revival a campaign for good government was waged, which was defeated by the narrowest margin and that, too, only by means of a political trick exploited on the last day in the newspaper, with no chance after its publication to acquaint the voters with its falsity. But for this a mayor standing rigidly for law enforcement would have been elected, and the result of whose election would have been the closed Sunday saloon."

It was acknowledged by the speaker that the ideal method of bringing people to Christ was by means of education rather than revivalism, but it was thought the evangelistic upheaval, while not ideal, was occasionally useful and even needful, and that the work of Mr. Sunday was being used mightily of God.

Criticized as Unspiritual.

The criticism Mr. Burnham offered to the meeting was directed at its unspiritual character. It was noisy and mob-like, rather than devotional and reverent. In the speaker's mind it was contrasted, he said, with a company of orderly people to which an evangelist like Gipsy Smith would speak. This latter company of people could with perfect naturalness be carried at once into the celebration of the Lord's Supper, while the Sunday crowd would first require a session of preparation for such a holy service. One of the difficult sequences of the Sunday revival is to get the converts quieted down and ready to appreciate the sacred and deep values of silence and the quiet, gentle ministrations of God's spirit. "But," he added, "once they were quieted, they were capable of appreciating these values."

Secretary's Letter.

Ernest H. Reed closes his fourth year at Washington, June 1, and has accepted a call to the work at Kansas, Ill.

W. T. Walker held his own meeting at Robinson, assisted by Miss Lucile Park as song leader, with twenty-six additions. The church is striving for the Front Rank standard and have attained six points.

G. E. Scheerer is the new preacher at Thomson.

We are preparing to bind a volume of the state year books for our office, and we find we need two copies, 1898 and 1899. If a reader of this note can furnish one or both of these copies kindly mail them to our office at once. Your kindness will be greatly appreciated.

The following letter has been mailed from our office to preachers and church clerks in Illinois, and as it is of general interest to our work we hope every Disciple in the state will read it:

"Regarding our contract with the American society, it is an experiment for one year beginning with the first of April, and if the May offerings justify it, we will leave off the fall offering. But if the May offering does not bring in enough money to keep our State and District service going well we will need to ask for the offering as usual in November.

"Please get this clearly in mind in order that there be no disappointment or confusion. We are striving to keep up a good service and add to the comfort of the churches and ministry by a reduction of days if it can be done.

"In all these years we have asked for just one offering a year and no more. The sin of added days is not and has not been with the State society, and if by co-operating with the American society we can make a day less we shall be very glad.

"Now, it depends after all upon the churches. If they pull up good and strong with the Home offering in May we will be able to live up to our wishes and hopes.

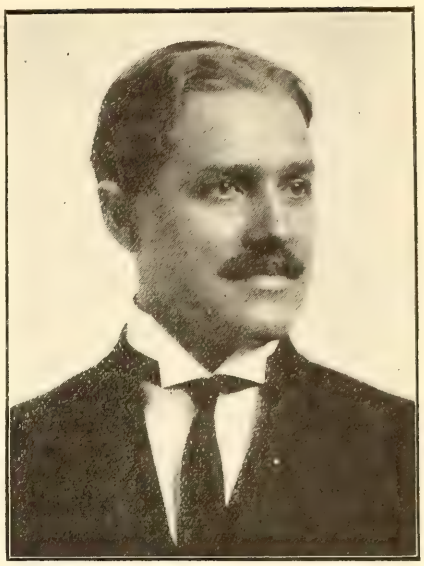
"This year will tell us just what our people and ministers want to do in the way of reducing the days and keeping up our State service.

"Remember that the May offerings are divided evenly between the Home and State societies."

During May, E. A. Gilliland will supply the pulpit of the Normal church of which J. H. Gilliland is the beloved pastor.

A. K. Mathews, the new minister at Cooksville, is much pleased with his work. He has time for a meeting this summer. His meeting at Farmers, Ky., resulted in 100 additions.

W. D. Deweese, Office Sec'y-Treas.
J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.
Bloomington, Ill.



Rev. A. W. Fortune, Pastor Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati, whose acceptance of the call to the professorship of New Testament Theology at Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., was announced in The Christian Century last week.

Reveries of a Preacher's Wife

(Continued from page 13.)

may come down, but papa is in the study and you must be very quiet so as not to disturb him. Is he sick?—No, but he has a very sick sermon. Little five-year-old, who has been bearing some hospital phraseology, asks, "Will it have to be operated on?" "Yes, dearie, I'm afraid it will." "Do you think it will get better, mother?"

"Dear, it simply has to be better by church time tomorrow!"

A sudden sermonic eloquence becomes audible in the study, with sentences curving up, followed by sentences curving down, and occasionally interspersed with, "Dear friends," so "mother," with a sigh of relief, says: "Come on, children, you may watch me clean out the kitchen stove, then we'll make some chocolate blanc-mange.

Now, I just adore cleaning out a range. One takes the little hoe-thing, and from unseen recesses brings out showers of soft, powdery soot, and the longer one hoes the more soot there still seems to be inside—it really is very fascinating. My maid objects to anything in the way of dirty work, so I slip out and do it when she isn't around, as she's such a jewel with the children I can't afford to lose her.

The phone rings: "Hello—the pastor?—Yes, just a moment."

Daddy emerges from the study. "Hello—Oh, how are you, Brother Crinkle? So glad to hear your voice—a special meeting?—why—er—yes. I believe I can—yes, I will—I'll be glad to—Oh, not at all—Good-bye." He hangs up the receiver and wheels jubilantly around to me:

"Brother Crinkle has asked me to occupy a seat on the platform at the big meeting next Tuesday—I don't know of any reason why I can't be there, do you?"

"No, I don't think that anything can fail but the platform. I never knew a preacher yet who could resist a sit-up-in-front invitation!"

Daddy says, "You imp!" and the children call, "Mother, hurry up and come out here—we want to get started on that chocolate stuff!"

The blanc-mange was made and eaten that evening with relish; the sermon recovered and was helpfully preached the next morning—and we all continued to just keep on keeping on.

Church Life

The Oklahoma state convention meets at Ada, June 10-13.

G. W. Moore has been called to Tiffin, Ohio, from Ionia, Mich.

Miss Rachel Dangerfield had 44 additions in a meeting in Galeton, Colo.

Arthur Long is in a meeting at Oelwein, Ia. At last report there had been 53 additions.

L. A. Chapman has accepted a call to Fourth Church, St. Louis, Mo., going from Carmi, Ill.

Hamilton and Stewart are in a meeting at Hennesy, Okla., with 15 additions the first week.

G. L. Snively raised $75,000 and more at the dedication of the $13,000 church at Elsberry, Mo.

Geo. A. Rinehart has resigned at Keokuk, Ia., to accept a call to Central Church, Ionia, Mich.

E. V. McCormick has resigned at Harlan, Ia., to take effect July 1. He has been at Harlan three years.

A. Homer Jordan, of Lorain, O., has tendered his resignation. He served the church two and one-half years.

There were 77 additions to Island Church, Wheeling, W. Va., on Easter Sunday. C. F. Hutsler is the pastor.

The Ohio convention will meet May 20-23 in Canton. There will be several speakers from outside the state.

There were 55 added in the meeting at South Columbus, Ohio, where H. Newton Miller assisted R. F. Stucker.

Carbonhill, O., is in a meeting with Rochester, Irwin, evangelist. Fifty-two were added during the first eight days.

First Church, Kansas City, Mo., W. F. Richardson, pastor, raised $25,000 on Apr. 14 for the enlargement of their building.

James Small and C. H. Hohgatt have begun a meeting at Murfreesboro, Tenn., where Everett Smith is the minister.

Houston will entertain the state convention of Texas May 13-16. S. G. Inman, F. M. Rains, and Robt. M. Hopkins are among the speakers.

Recently the men of the Urichsville, O., church built a taberancle to be used by the men's Bible class. The tabernacle is also to serve the purpose of a gymnasium.

Allan Wilson had 115 aditions recently in a meeting at Madison, Ind., and is now in a meeting at Woodland Street, Nashville, Tenn., of which R. Lin Cave is the pastor.

J. K. Shellenberger, of Wooster, O., who has been in the Brotherhood work for some time, leaves that work the first of April to take a pastorate in the state of California.

A special addition to accommodate the Sunday-school is being erected by the church at Lynchburg, Ohio, where C. E. Elmore is the pastor. The structure will cost $4,000.

Gus Thompson is the pastor at Charlottsville, Ind., where Evangelist Crabb is holding a meeting at present. There had been eighteen additions at the last report.

Bethany Church, where Geo. T. Smith is pastor, will be the host of the West Virginia convention which will meet May 6-9. It will be the forty-third annual convention.

T. S. Handsaker has taken the field as the agent of the National Benevolent Association for the purpose of raising funds to properly equip the institution at Walla Walla, Wash.

One hundred and twenty-six have been added in the first year of the pastorate of F. W. Brown, with Second Church, Warren, Ohio. The sum of $6,000 was raised toward a new building.

J. H. Brostow, of Palacios, Tex., has recently held a meeting at Norman, Okla., which H. F. Reed, the pastor, declares did much good to the church, though the conditions were not favorable to a large ingathering.

A. F. Hanes has resigned at Elkins, Va., and will leave June 1. The present pastorate has lasted two years. The congregation is only three years old but they have a $10,000 building and a fine location in the city.

One hundred and eight had been added at the last report from the meeting being conducted at Blunt, S. D., by Edward Clutter and wife. Lethbridge, Alta., Canada, is to be the next place where they are to hold a meeting.

The Kansas Ministerial Institute met at Chanute recently for a season of fellowship and discussion. Geo. H. Combs was the chief speaker and delivered five addresses. The Institute will meet next year at Emporia.

J. H. Goldner, of the Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, left in March for a trip through Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land. The Cleveland church knows how to improve a pastor. The church could make no better investment.

P. M. Kendall has joined the Minges Evangelistic Company and will be with them till September. They have recently been successful in securing nearly a thousand additions at Pittsburgh, Pa. Sam I. Smith is the pastor.

A few weeks ago the church edifice at Bryan, O., caught fire after the evening service and burned to the ground. John A. Jayne is the minister and we already have the promise that he will lead them into a new building enterprise.

There were 1,032 in the Sunday-school on April 21, in Muskogee, Okla., where G. C. Aydelotte is pastor. In the pastor's class there were 320. This is the church where more than 1,200 additions were had recently in C. R. Scoville's meeting.

There will be fifty additions to the Winters, Cal., church as the result of the meeting held by a Presbyterian evangelist recently which resulted in 100 conversions. The Christian church thus gets half the numerical results from the union meeting.

W. A. Shullenberger, pastor at Mexico, in a revival with his home church, reports 27 added at the end of the first week's efforts. J. K. O'Neall is leading the chorus, and a great meeting is expected. The Sunday-school is very prosperous and has about 600 in attendance.

The diamond jubilee of the church at Cicero, Ind., was recently celebrated, B. L. Allen, the pastor, presiding. B. M. Blount, a former pastor of the church, who is now 84 years old, was in attendance. The movement for a new building was launched and over $1,000 was raised.

W. R. Walker, the minister of one of the Christian churches in Holmes County, O., is a delegate to the constitutional convention now in session at Columbus. He was slow in speaking, it was said, but when he did speak the convention knew where he stood on the temperance question.

E. N. Philips telegraphs us that W. L. Harris planned to close the meeting at Phoenix, Ariz., on April 21, but was prevented owing to the large response to the invitation on that night. The meeting was planned for two weeks and had already run over a week and this last extension made four.

J. W. Hilton has resigned his position in Cotner University, where he was dean of the College of Liberal Arts, and professor of sociology. He will give his full time to the work of pastor of the East Lincoln Church, which work is growing so rapidly that they feel the need of the best type of leadership.

Roger T. Nooe, minister at Frankfort, Ky., writes us under date of Apr. 22: "Have just closed short meeting with home forces, resulting in 76 additions to the church, making over 100 since the beginning of my ministry here, December 1. Four hundred and ninety-two in Sunday-school yesterday, 95 in men's class."

H. O. Breeden has decided to give up his work in the evangelistic field and locate as pastor, and has been secured by First Church, Fresno, Cal. Mr. Breeden's meeting with Central Church, Denver, Colo., resulted in 99 additions, which was considered a great success owing to the difficulties in the way of a down-town church.

In the last twenty years 61 new denominations have been formed in the United States, and this in spite of the growing sentiment for union. The greater part of these were the result of dividing denominations already in existence and the Disciples of Christ have the honor of supplying to the census report at least one of the new ones.

The enrollment of the Sunday-school of the First Church, El Paso, Tex., has increased during the last quarter from 348 to 550. P. J. Rice is the pastor at First Church and is also preaching on Thursday evenings at Austin Park, the new congregation which is growing in a very gratifying way, with a Sunday-school of 75 already. There were six additions to First Church on April 14.

The eightieth anniversary of T. P. Haley, the veteran leader of Kansas City, was celebrated on April 19. A great reception was tendered him by the Linwood Boulevard church, of which he is a member. The unselfish and statesmanlike plans that were made and carried out by Mr. Haley are largely responsible for the magnificent growth of the churches in Kansas City.

The conventions for the Northwest and Far West have been fixed, and will be held during June and July. The Montana convention will be held June 10-12; South Idaho, June 14-16; North Idaho, June 18-20; E. Washington, June 17-22; W. Washington, June 21-23; Oregon, June 22-30. The two California conventions will be held in July, one at Long Beach and the other at Santa Cruz.

Prof. Martin L. Pierce, dean of the Bible department of the Johnson Bible College, Kimberlin Heights, Knoxville, Tenn., and who for the past fourteen years has been connected with that institution, has been called to the presidency of the Southern Christian College at West Point, Miss., and has accepted the call, to begin June 1.

A unique bequest is reported from a will recently probated at Sacramento, Calif., according to which the church which has the best music for a whole year is to receive $2,500 and this is to be repeated five years in succession. Of course it is within the power of the giver to originate any sort of freak bequest but a more excellent way surely could have been found of disposing of $12,500.

Charles Mahon, a member of the Steubenville, O., church left the sum of $500 to the church in his will which has recently been probated. It is rather remarkable how infrequent such bequests are among the Disciples. It is believed that the matter of leaving some part of one's estate to the work of the church is, however, receiving more attention than formerly. A. F. Stahl is the minister at Steubenville.

George A. Campbell, pastor at Hannibal, Mo., has announced the following series of sermon subjects for Sunday evenings: "The Emotionalist—Is He Dependable?" "The Sectarian—Does He Need a Bigger God?" "The Mystic—Can 'Spirit with Spirit Meet'?" "The Formalist—Can He Have the Inwardness of Spiritual Character?" "The Christian—Is He the Addition of These Others or Something Different?"

The work of Geo. P. Rutledge at Philadelphia is progressing more than ever. The audiences are increasing and there are baptisms nearly every Sunday, sometimes eight or ten at a time. The offerings for missions and benevolences last year amounted to over $1,100. The Bible class taught by the pastor is only a year and a half old but has 100 members. Mr. Rutledge is in his fifteenth year with Third church.

China is modernizing itself so rapidly in these days that it is in danger of losing its picturesqueness. It is said that the ancient walls of Shanghai, Hangchow, Canton and other cities are soon to be demolished. An interesting fact to Christian people today is that seven out of the ten members of the new Chinese cabinet are Christian men. Some one has remarked that this is more than we can say of the cabinets of some of the so-called Christian countries.

George Darsie's great church at Akron, O., made a gain of about $200 in their Foreign Missionary offering over last year, which is about the average gain. Their offering at last report was $1,436 and it was thought that it might reach $1,500 as all the solicitors had not all reported. This was in the midst of the building enterprise which the church is now engaged in. With the offerings of the other organizations the church expects to contribute at least $2,000 to Foreign Missions this year.

G. W. Moore, of Ionia, Michigan, has been called to the work at Tiffin. Some ten years ago Tiffin was a fairly strong church. H. H. Moninger served this church upon graduating from Yale and was doing a very efficient work when he was called to Steubenville. Since that time the church has gone from bad to worse until it became necessary for the state to step in to save the work. It is now a mission work. It is believed that Mr. Moore will will bring about a better state of affairs.

W. Remfry Hunt reports that the scenes in China in the famine district are pitiful in the extreme. Famine alone is bad enough, and yet to the failure of the crops and the consequent destitution are added war, pestilence, the sacking of the cities, wholesale brigandage and the looting and burning of any place that offers chances of food or money. Before the armies of the republic came along, large bands of rabble-soldiery had paraded the country and seized the reins of power. The generous contributions of American Christians are greatly needed at once.

Bernard Gruenstein has resigned at Selma, Ala., to take effect not later than June 10. The work at Selma has prospered under the ministry of Mr. Gruenstein, who has unusual fitness for the work in the way of experience in other lines. Mr. Gruenstein was connected with the editorial staff of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat for seven years, and has had several years of academic preparation for the ministry as well. Churches desiring to communicate with a good man may address him at Selma. J. H. Garrison and F. M. Rains are both acquainted with Mr. Gruenstein, and would be glad to recommend him.

George L. Snively, writing from Indianapolis says, under date of April 24: "Last Lord's day I dedicated new $1,300 church at Elsbery, Mo. B. G. Rearn is pastor. We need $5,000 to off-set all debt. None thought we could get it, but we did. Then we raised $2,000 more for parsonage; then $600 additional to equip basement with literature, shower bath, gymnasium, etc. This is the best church building in Lincoln or Pike County, Missouri. Raised $11,700 here for C. M. Fillmore the Sunday before, and dedicated the church free of debt. Have had 25 additions in revival following.

In four of the leading Chinese cities there are no fewer than 22 newspapers that are owned and controlled and even edited by women. It is reported that the movement for giving women the ballot attracting attention in Mohammedan lands, thus giving women about the same time as the men to come into full citizenship. The

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St.
Chicago

fact about the movement is that it is world-wide, being limited to no race or country or religion and the old differences which were made between the sexes in point of privilege will be soon regarded with the same sort of abhorrence that we now think of human slavery.

W. C. Bower has resigned the pastorate of Wilshire Boulevard Church, Los Angeles, Cal., after a pastorate of a year and a half, during which time the membership of the church has increased 160 per cent, and every department of the work has been made to prosper. The Sunday-schoool has trebled in attendance, a large C. W. B. M. has been organized, and a successful men's work started. The church has now property to the value of $50,000. The church board passed resolutions of the highest character on the occasion of the withdrawal of the pastor from his field and the farewell reception had, as one feature, a gift to him of $250. Mr. Bower will spend the spring and summer at his summer home at Wolcottville, Ind.

The Men's Brotherhood of First Church, Oklahoma City, Okla., had an interesting and profitable session recently in the form of a debate on the subject of capital punishment in which the governor of the state was one of the debaters and took the negative side with great earnestness and enthusiasm. There were over a thousand people present to hear the debate. Governor Cruce said that he had been trying for more than forty-eight years to find a reason for capital punishment and had, so far, failed. He declared that if the judge and jury were required to do the hanging of the people they sentence, there would be fewer hangings and he expressed the hope that the state would soon abolish that form of punishment altogether. He declared that so long as he remained governor, he would do all he could and all that the law allowed in the direction of preventing executions.

The Association of Christian Colleges and the National Bible School Workers' Association will hold meetings in Indianapolis, May 7 and 8. A joint session has been arranged looking toward a co-operative effort on the part of the colleges and Sunday-schol by which the Sunday-schools may have their educational methods and ideals advanced, and the colleges receive more nearly adequate support from the Sunday-schools. The colleges are seemingly coming into their own in the way of recognition and it is not too much to hope that the Disciples may, before many decades, have at least their strongest institutions properly endowed and supported. This has never been the case but the signs now visible seem to indicate an awakening on the part of the constituency of the colleges. It cannot come too soon.

At a meeting of Disciple men held in New York in connection with the conservative congress, the following resolution was passed.

"Resolved, that the program of work proposed by the Men and Religion Forward Movement is the best plan yet proposed for utilizing the forces of the church in meeting the opportunities now offered it, and further be it

"Resolved, that the work of conservation depends upon the response of the individual church by reason of the Committee of Ninety-Seven closing its work with this congress, therefore, we recommend to the various state and national conventions of the Disciples of Christ that they devote a session, or part thereof, to the presentation of the Men and Religion message, and we request that copies of this resolution be sent to all church papers and national and state secretaries."

Notes on American Missions

Remember May Fifth!

The world's faith in Jesus as the Christ awaits proof that America is a Christian nation.

Buddhists spent last year $40,000 in their missions in the United States—two-thirds as much as all the churches of Christ gave the A. C. M. S. to make Him known and extend His church. Jesus will not consent to share our land with Buddha. Will his followers surrender it to the enemies of the Cross?

Chicago, with a greater population than California, asks for better equipment and reinforcements for Bro. Keusseff, our mission among foreigners in that city. May fifth will answer.

Christians in the United States and Dominion of Canada are becoming conscious of religious perils, entrenched and advancing, unparalleled. Our only hope of preventing national degradation and humiliation is in the power of the Gospel of Christ. Shall we have sufficient means to give to all peoples?

Lumbermen in the woods of the Northwest, are without church privileges nine months of the year. They number about 75,000, and can be effectively reached by evangelists and colporteurs. Two thousand dollars would enable the Home Society to send a competent evangel to them. Who will supply this need?

New York City has 478,200 Russians. Of these, 157,746 are in a district bounded by 14th street south to Catherine street, and from the Bowery to East River. Disciples of Christ have one mission among them, supported by the Home Board. More than a score of young men have accepted Christ. One of that number has returned to his native land and is preaching to his countrymen. Such a mission in America is both a church and a training school for home and foreign lands. Thirty thousand dollars are needed to take that successful work out of rented basement rooms into its own quarters. Four hundred dollars additional must be had to pay overdue rent. Increased offerings are confidentially expected. I. N. McCash.
Secretary.

The Last Appeal

The American Christian Missionary Society is making the atmosphere o'erhanging the western continent vibrant with its "C. Q. D." call for help. Many ships of Zion have heard our cry and have responded with the cheerful news that relief is on the way. The mail orders for the May offering supplies now reaching the office indicate an awakening conscience. Help from every church is imperative. No offering means "contributory negligence" if the disaster threatening our home work eventuates.

Right nobly all the Mission states on the "rim" are responding to meet the needs arising in consequence of our financial distress. Already there is felt the rising tide of increased offerings to help float the ship over the sand bars, from these very states where a retrenchment policy would be most severe.

Earnestly do we appeal to all the north central and middle west states, and especially to the churches of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and other states of our strength, to come immediately and directly to our succor. There are literally hundreds of churches in each of these states that have never sent an offering to the Missionary Board that has organized one-third of all our churches. Let there be a generous response from every church in behalf of American Missions in order to divert the danger threatening this important enterprise.

Remember the Day
The Fifth of May.

Send all offerings to the American Christian Misisonary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio. Grant K. Lewis,
Secretary.

Benevolent Association Items

The Union Avenue Sunday-school, St. Louis, is maintaining its splendid record of generosity toward The National Benevolent Association. From present indications the offering will reach $3,000. "Seeing is believing." The Union Ave. Church is seeing the work that is being done. It believes in it, and believing in it acts by giving.

Report says that Otis Hawkins, the Association's Southwestern representative, spent Easter Sunday with the Soniat Avenue Church, New Orleans, and as a result the Easter offering ran over $200.

The good old First Church at Sedalia, Mo., reports an Easter offering of $225. One class alone, that of Mrs. F. Meriwether, became a Life Line by giving $100. The First of Sedalia has always been a generous friend to the widow and the orphan.

A good doctor, an elder in one of our good Missouri churches, came to the Christian Orphan's Home in St. Louis not many days ago, bringing with him a wee babe, not more than two days old. The churches are thus taking advantage of the institutions of the Association to meet the claims of their members and thei respective communities for prompt relief in times of need.

Two more annuities have just been received. One for $200 and one for $2,000. The annuity bonds of the Association are growing increasingly popular.

Word has just been received from San Angelo, Texas, that Mrs. Nora Woodruff, who served so efficiently as the superintendent of our hospital at Valparaiso until her health failed, has passed to her reward. Mrs. Woodruff was a devoted member of the church, a highly trained nurse, and a most efficient servant of the brotherhood as the superintendent of the Christian Hospital at Valparaiso. She was a widow. She leaves behind a young son four years old.

The plans for the new home for children in Dallas, Texas, are nearing completion. The building when erected will care for 100 children. The plans are modern, including all the essential features necessary for high-class work resulting from years of experience. The building will cost about $30,000. We have $20,000. We must have $10,000 more.

T. S. Handsaker, who had much to do with aiding in the establishment of our work in the Northwest, has been employed to represent the association in the Northwest and to look especially after the interests of our home at Walla Walla, Washington. Mr. Handsaker is widely and favorably known as an efficient pastor, a successful evangelist, and a devoted friend of the widow and the orphan.

The annual election at the Christian Home for the Aged at Jacksonville, Ill., resulted in a change in he official staff. The following are the new officers: President, A. C. Rice; vice-presidents, Mrs. James T. King, Mrs. J. H. Campbell, Mrs. William Fay; recording secretary, Mrs. G. W. Rawlings; corresponding secretary, C. F. Ehne; treasurer, D. Rees Browning. Advisory board, J. R. Loar, C. L. Mathis, W. J. Hale, C. L. Hayden, W. D. Osborne, W. T. Clarkson, D. Rees Browning.

The Easter offering is still coming in. The first response is quite satisfactory.

We hope that it will continue. It is never too late to be good. We suggest that our friends who for one reason or another failed to observe Easter still have an opportunity for fellowship with Christ in His compassion upon the poor. A number of schools have done as well and better than last year. The school at Mattoon, Ill., increased its offering from $87 last year to $150 this year. Nevada, Plattsburg and Mexico, Mo., and Albia, Iowa, continue in the Life Line column by giving $100. Crawford Road Bible-School, Cleveland, Ohio, reports over $200; St. James St., Roxbury, Mass., $46.52; Sheffield Ave., Chicago, $33.78.

Jas. H. Mohorter.

Notes From the Foreign Society.

G. P. Street, Elkton, Ky., sending their missionary offering, says, "This congregation, together with some others in this vicinity, had the honor of sending out the first foreign missionary ever sent out by our people. I refer to Alexander Cross who was purchased from his master by the Green River co-operation and prepared for the work of his choice and sent to Liberia to carry the gospel to his people." Alexander Cross lived in Hopkinsville and was a barber. He was an eloquent speaker. When he was leaving Hopkinsville court was in session and it adjourned, judges, jury and all, to hear a farewell address by this eloquent man. He founded a community in Liberia and named it "Kentucky." He lived only one year after reaching Africa.

The Summer Conference of the Laymen's Missionary Movement at Lake Geneva July 27-31 is sure to be an interesting gathering.

Dr. G. E. Miller, writing from Mungeli, India, says, "Three people are ready for baptism. They are relatives of one of our Christians and live in Bhulan where we recently opened a school."

The hospital work goes on apace at Mungeli. Christian teaching is diligently given to the patients and the missionaries strive to make them realize that they owe to Christ all that has been done for them. Last year over $100 in fees was raised and Dr. Miller expects to raise $150 this year. The church at Uniontown, Pa., suports the incidental expenses of this institution.

David Rioch is moving from Mungeli to Damoh where he will take charge of the orphanage. The native Christians gave Mr. and Mrs. Rioch an enthusiastic farewell reception and presented them each with a ring.

The missionaries at Mungeli have been on an extensive evangelistic tour which lasted about a month. They touched thirty-five or more villages and delivered magic lantern lectures on the life of Christ. Every evening they treated hundreds of sick. They report that they were everywhere well received.

A Christian family in Cleveland, Ohio, makes a pledge of $7,000 to the Foreign Society for the work of Dr. Macklin's hospital in Nankin, China.

Children's Day grows with the years. As the Sunday-schools increase in attendance and efficiency this great annual festival becomes more and more a factor in their life. The outlook this year is exceptionally encouraging. Nearly five hundred more schools have ordered Children's Day supplies than ever before at this date. From all directions come words of enthusiasm.

Children's Day since its begining in 1882 has brought to the Foreign Missionary work more than $1,100,000. Who can tell, save God alone, to how many darkened souls this great fund has brought the words of Life? Thousands have heard of Christ for the first time because of Children's Day.

Do you want to make the neighbors sit up and listen? Do you want to demonstrate to the community that your Sunday-school and church are up to date and in touch with the great movements of the Kingdom? Do you want to give your town a demonstration to the effect that your people are eternally committed to the census and program of Jesus? If so, do not fail to observe Children's Day.

Ohio Secretary's Letter.

The next thing in Ohio is the State Convention. The date is May 20-23. The place is Canton in the big new workshop of P. H. Welshimer and his great church and Bible School. Everybody is coming. There will be a great program worthy of a National Convention. Matters of vital importance to the churches will be discussed. More than usual time will be given to the business sessions of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society. There will be a great Sunday-school session. The new Superintendent, Myron C. Settle, will be in charge of it. A report will be made of the work of the year of the O. C. M. S. There are some things to be said in that report that will gladden the heart of every live disciple. It has been a great year for results. Opportunities have been more than ever before. Open doors have been most enticing. These have been entered to the extent of our ability as reported from time to time through the press. New doors are still swinging open.

The latest is Middletown. At last report 80 people had definitely signified their desire that a church be constituted in that growing city. Others were yet to hear from. At this writing State Evangelist, L. I. Mercer, is on the field gathering the forces together. State President John P. Sala of Dayton visited them twice before Mr. Mercer could go. Evangelist Sam W. Crabtree rendered valuable assistance by a visit and report.

Cambridge has secured an option on a good lot. State President John P. Sala was with them three days and secured almost one-half the entire amount needed for its purchase.

In both Cambridge and Middletown the opportunity was developed by union evangelistic campaigns which brought to light the strength and the opportunity of the Disciples. W. H. Boden of Athens held a successful meeting at Cambridge under the direction of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society and gave form to the present enterprise there. While at Cambridge Mr. Boden preached Sunday afternoons at Byesville. We are expecting the rejuvenation of the work at Byesville in connection with our assistance at Cambridge. For a number of years they had ceased to meet but some weeks ago they took on new life and have been pushing their work vigorously ever since.

Friends of the State work know that with the heavy burdens laid upon the State Board at Portsmouth convention our funds were exhausted without providing for any of these places that have come up thus unexpectedly.

Special calls to friends of the work for individual gifts for help for Cadiz have resulted in about two-thirds the necessary amount. In order that we may be enabled to give the required assistance to Cambridge an appeal has been made to Ladies' Aid Societies (including Dorcas Societies, Mite societies and other such organizations) to take up this as their mission in Ohio and to make special gifts for its maintenance. So far the response is encouraging and steps will be taken soon to secure a good minister for that field, T. J. Wallace, who has faithfully served in holding together the band of disciples for some time past, is supplying the pulpit until the permanent arrangement can be effected. All remittances intended for Cambridge should be sent to this office so that the state board may be enabled to make a suitable appropriation.

Cadiz still grows. On April 21, 137 were in Bible School; 45 in the men's class. There were two confessions. Those good people are aggressive and are pushing on steadily to larger things. I. J. Cahill.

2047 E. 9th St., Cleveland, O.

REMEMBER
CHILDREN'S DAY
For Foreign Missions
FIRST SUNDAY IN JUNE
SUPPLIES FREE
THE UNUSED CROSS.

ONE HALF THE WORLD IS BEYOND THE REACH OF ANY MESSENGER OF JESUS CHRIST.
AND I, IF I BE LIFTED UP FROM THE EARTH, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day Supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Bible Schools observing the day in the interest of Heathen Missions.

FREE SUPPLIES

1st. Coin Pocket Missionary Collectors. These are a great improvement on the missionary boxes formerly used. Attractive, convenient, suitable for old or young.

2d. Darkness and Light. The new Children's Day exercise by P. H. Duncan. Filled with beautiful songs, exercises, and recitations. Good for older pupils as well as little folks. Adapted to any school.

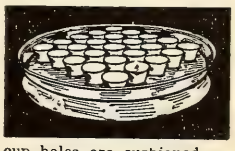
ORDER AT ONCE. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance. Write to

STEPHEN J. COREY,
Box 884. Cincinnati, Ohio.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
CENTRAL CHURCH
New York, 142 West 81st St.
Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

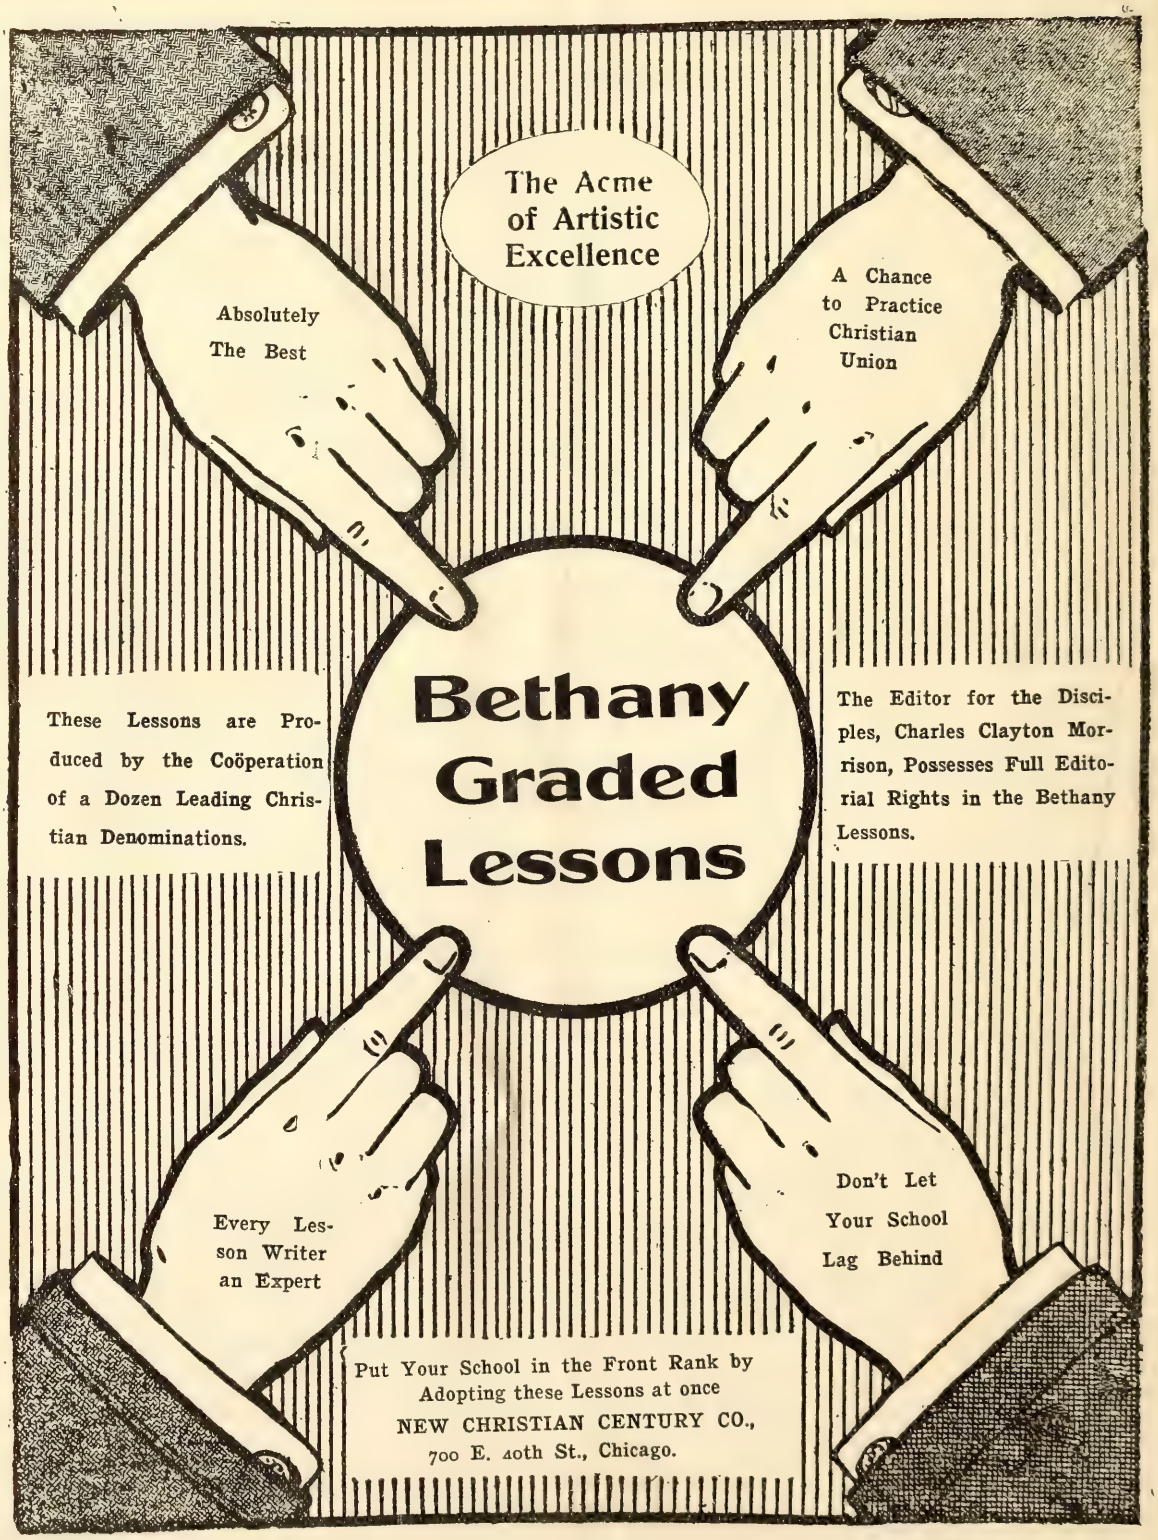
CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE INDIVIDUAL
"Noiseless"
CUSHIONED TRAYS
4 Different Features
WHY?



1st—"Noiseless"—As all cup holes are cushioned.
2nd—Dust-proof—The Trays interlock.
3rd—A short glass—no need of tipping back the head.
4th—Automatic Filler—Fills rapidly and evenly.
Does not mar the sacredness of the service.
Write for booklet. Outfit sent on trial.

DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
107 No. Dearborn St., Dept. T., Chicago.



The Acme of Artistic Excellence
Absolutely The Best
A Chance to Practice Christian Union
Bethany Graded Lessons
These Lessons are Produced by the Coöperation of a Dozen Leading Christian Denominations.
The Editor for the Disciples, Charles Clayton Morrison, Possesses Full Editorial Rights in the Bethany Lessons.
Every Lesson Writer an Expert
Don't Let Your School Lag Behind
Put Your School in the Front Rank by Adopting these Lessons at once
NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.,
700 E. 40th St., Chicago.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

THREE COPIES
Willett Prof H L
1220 E 56th St

Vol. XXIX May 9, 1912 Number 19

MEN and RELIGION CONSERVATION CONGRESS

Held in New York City

THE FATAL DELUSION

BY GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

CHICAGO

Some Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing.
You need every one of this splendid list.

NOW PREPARING FOR THE PRESS.

THE MEANING OF BAPTISM

By Charles Clayton Morrison.

This notable volume is nearly ready for the press. A very large edition will be run at the first printing. It is expected that the book will have a wide sale throughout the Christian world. 250 pages, Cloth, $1.25

When this book appears it will be seen to be the most important work treating of the teachings of the Disciples that has appeared in this generation. It deals with a theme that is peculiarly alive to every mind that has had any part in the Disciples' reformatory movement. The author writes with conviction, but wholly without partisanship. He states issues incisively and faces them squarely. He holds an original and independent point of view for the treatment of the subject of Christian Baptism. He accepts the position of the Disciples as to the practice of immersion only, but rejects much of the reasoning traditionally put forth by his brethren and the Baptists in support of this practice. The book is refreshingly frank. In the opening chapter the author puts himself squarely in opposition to Alexander Campbell's argument.

FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

THE LIFE OF JESUS IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Loa Ermina Scott. A new Text Book for Young People's and Adult Bible Classes. Introduction by Professor E. B. Wakefield, of Hiram College. 120 pages, 50 cents. In quantities of 10 or more, 40 cents each.

This book comes nearer meeting all demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions — all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportions. It is the product of experience. The author used the material in her own successful career as a teacher. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in The Life of Christ, and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, Springfield, Ill.

For the purpose for which it was prepared it is superior to all other books with which I am familiar.—GEO. A. RAGAN, Claremont, Cal.

This work can not only be used profitably in our Bible-schools, but in Bible study classes of all sorts. Dr. Scott has done a splendid piece of work, which deserves a wide circulation.—CLAUDE E. HILL, Valparaiso, Ind.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Cleveland, Ohio.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study.—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland, Ohio.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the Gospels themselves. I would like to see this book used by a class in our Sunday-school in the near future.—A. W. FORTUNE.

The book is a happy combination of the catechetical and analytic methods of teaching and would thus seem to give the largest latitude for the exercise of the teacher's own personality.—B. A. ABBOTT, St. Louis, Mo.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION

Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic literary product of the Disciples' first century of history. Thousands have been sold and the volume is enjoying a steady demand. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Price, $1.00.

Z. T. Sweeney says:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

AN ILLUMINATING BIT OF AMERICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that make them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 35c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—The Christian Worker.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

A FASCINATING RELIGIOUS STORY.

ATLAR STAIRS

By Charles J. Scofield.

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.00.

"A most excellent serial."—J. H. Garrison.

"An admirable story."—J. J. Haley.

"A most forceful and healthful piece of reading."—Z. T. Sweeney.

"If one begins this book he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished."—Christian Observer.

"A strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement."—Religious Telescope.

BOOKS BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

BASIC TRUTHS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Paper, 127 pages, 35 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style.

"For me the finest chapter in the book is that on the Resurrection. This gets one back into the lives of the Apostles on that Resurrection morn. It is a historical study indeed. One hears the tread of conquering hosts and the beating of the wings of twelve legions of angels."—P. C. Macfarlane.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

STUDIES IN THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

Cloth, $1.00.

One of the volumes in the Constructive Series of handbooks. It is prepared for the use of classes in secondary schools and in the secondary division of the Sunday-schools. It presents the entire material of First Samuel with explanatory notes, questions, and illustrations. It is used in a large number of Sunday-schools, in grades of the ages of eleven to fourteen.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS

Cloth, $1.25.

An introduction to the literature of the New Testament. The book is a work of collaboration with James M. Campbell, D. D., a prominent Congregational minister, who supplies the interpretative material in connection with each of the books of the New Testament. A handbook widely used by individual students and classes.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

Cloth, 35 cents.

A small handbook prepared for classes desiring to study the outline of the life of Christ, and a brief statement of the most important teachings of the Master. It is based upon the entire material of the four Gospels arranged in chronological order.

THE PROPHETS OF ISRAEL

Cloth, 35 cents.

A handbook on this, the most important theme of the Old Testament. It gives a survey of the history of prophecy in Israel from the beginning of the national life to the close of the Maccabæan age. It has been widely used in institutions of education and in Bible classes, and has passed through several editions.

THE RULING QUALITY

Board 35 cents net. Postage 4 cents.

A small book of sixty pages dealing with faith as the conquering quality in human life. The theme is interwoven with comments upon the quest of the Holy Grail as illustrated in Mr. Abbey's panels.

PUBLISHED BY

THE BETHANY PRESS
NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

700 E. 40th ST.,
CHICAGO.

The Christian Century

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The Fatal Delusion

THAT THE "TITANIC" was unsinkable proved to be the fatal delusion. That delusion had a basis. The ship was long in building. She cost millions. She was built by the world's best designers and workmen. No wonder the minds of captain and crew and passengers came to be possessed with the delusion. If pressed, doubtless the officers would not have maintained that the ship was unsinkable. But deep in their hearts they felt such to be true; and therefore they acted not upon their reason but upon their feeling. They were warned of the icebergs, but so thoroughly was the impression of the unsinkableness of the boat lodged in their minds that the warnings could not dislodge it.

* * *

The feeling of safety, led to neglect, and neglect led to the awful catasthrophe.

It is ever so with life.

No sooner have we boasted of our safety than defeat follows. Peter warmly declared that the Master could count on him though all others should forsake Him, only to deny Him shortly after.

* * *

"Pride cometh before a fall." It is infinitely more difficult to examine the strength of a soul than to pass upon the seaworthiness of a boat. Priests and ministers come to view themselves as the owners of God, or at least his guardian officials. They look upon themselves as the makers and the defenders of the faith. This attitude of security is perhaps more or less shared by the rank and file of all Christians. They regard themselves as already possessing—many of them cease to press on—they already have attained—the truth has been encircled.

* * *

Any phase of Christianity or life is capable of infinite soundings. We conclude because we have superficially studied a psalm or a chapter or a subject that we have mastered it. There is grave danger in our too great confidence. Millions have lost their spirituality because they were certain they were spiritual. Because of their supposed safety they did not cultivate greater depths and areas of their souls, and though this neglect came to lose their appreciation for the highest. This thought is verified by so many phases of our life.

* * *

Many young people fail to become educated because too soon they think they are educated. A diploma if taken for finality in one's education is a curse. Only he is educated who is ever seeking to become educated. Stationary holiness leads to death. Perfection is a point constantly moving forward.

* * *

Christ at every step was perfect, but the perfection that came through each stage of suffering was higher than that of its preceding stage.

* * *

On every side character is in peril. We are never safe beyond the need of vigilance. To all of us comes this peril of foolhardy assurance. The pharisee of Jesus' day was under this delusion. He was sure he was safe. The rules and laws of piety were prescribed, and he obeyed them. But Jesus made it clear than inwardly his soul was starved and poor and false.

* * *

Over against the "unsinkable" character of the pharisee Jesus put the common sinner who was aware of his sin and who was responsive to divine offers of help and said, "This one shall go into the Kingdom of God ahead of the other."

* * *

We are not saved by attainment but by vigilance. It is not because we are good that we are safe but because we obey our Master's command to watch always. Many a frail craft crosses the ocean safely while the Titanic went down, simply because its officers knowing their vessel's weakness are constantly alert to every sign of danger.

* * *

I suppose we all have a duality of confidence and misgiving in ourselves. But confidence to withstand temptation, and confidence to endure sin without harm, are not unusual characteristics of young men. They regard their character as unsinkable. Just here is the fatal delusion that has engulfed many.

* * *

How plain is this principle! We know the end of the arrogant, the thoughtlessly pleasure-mad, the undisturbed sensualists. As they sail the sea of life we know absolutely that their ship will meet disaster.

* * *

I have just looked over our religious papers of this week and with the above thought in my mind I felt that there was application of the idea to our own collective life. We are a people who believe we are called of God to bear a message of unity to the world. I wonder if we are not too cocksure. I wonder if the Lord can use us to help bring in the unity of his church. Is our ship unsinkable? Is she made of faith, hope and love? Or is she made of envy, strife, jealousy, slander?

* * *

There are harsh, bitter notes in our current literature. The trouble is not that we differ; but that we malign one another. Can God use us to aid in ushering in a united church? Is our craft unsinkable?

God only knows. In the meantime every soul of us might humble himself before the great mysteries and the unfolding future and be a little kinder—even to his erring brother.

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Housing Question.

In the great cities, one of the most fundamental problems is that of housing the people properly. In the older tenements there were dark rooms into which the light of day never entered. The writer has walked down a hall-way in a Bulgarian lodging house at mid-day without being able to see his hand before him. In front of the place stood some poor fellows spitting their lungs away. In other situations, rents are so high as to compel the letting of rooms to boarders. The family has no privacy and the result is immorality following hard upon the heels of immodesty.

"There's no place like nome"—in Chicago.

Among the tumble down old structures there is no fit place for a child to play. There are sections in the city where the children never see a blade of grass. The lessons that come to childhood from physical nature are missed by those children.

Various efforts have been made to improve housing conditions. Some of the younger cities like Chicago have avoided some of the worst tenement conditions by passing rigid building laws before the city came to be a metropolis. The older cities labor under the inherited evils of past generations. Private corporations with benevolent purpose have tried to produce cheaper homes that would furnish right conditions for the people and still be on a strictly business basis.

In 1896 in New York there was formed the City and Suburban Home Company under the leadership of E. R. L. Gould. The company has an investment of four millions of dollars and furnishes apartments to families at rents from $1.60 to $4.60 per week. The company owns three large groups of tenement buildings for white people and one for colored people. Every apartment is a complete home in itself, with private toilet accommodations wholly within the dwelling. Every room has quiet, light, air and an abundance of ventilation. The interesting thing is that this company is declaring four per cent dividends without taking into account the rise of values in the property.

Lynching in the United States.

The records are compiled with reference to the lynching in the United States for 1911. There were sixty-three colored men put to death. It is commonly supposed that this kind of punishment is reserved for one particularly odious crime. The statistics show that the alleged causes were in thirty-six cases murder of a white man, and in only eighteen cases were crimes against women even alleged. The brutality of the mob has gone far enough that women and children now suffer death by lynching. At Okemah, Oklahoma, a colored woman accused of shooting a sheriff was hung with her fourteen year old son.

The defense that is given for lynching is that it prevents crime. Instead it can be shown by carefully gathered statistics that a lynching is usually followed by more crime. The negro population is embittered. They have no faith in the white man's justice. They are human enough to strike back in ways that are deadly to the welfare of the community. An embassador from a foreign country tells us that the United States has the unenviable reputation of being the only civilized country on the globe where such a thing as lynching could take place. Lynching is unknown throughout Europe, and even in the Turkish empire such methods would not be employed with impunity as here. Though sixty-three negroes were put to death by mob violence, there was not a single conviction in 1911 for these crimes against order and justice. This was not because the guilty parties were unknown. They were so well known that in certain sections of the South penny picture post cards printed in Germany were sold showing the faces of the men in the mob so any one might recognize them.

As we write, we have before us the pictures of two mobs, but not a man in this crowd ever suffered for his crime. Both north and south are guilty of this crime and it is not a sectional issue. The most atrocious lynching of the year was at Coatesville, Pennsylvania, where a wounded man was dragged from a bed in a hospital and thrown into the fire. His writhing body was poked back into the flames as he tried to drag himself away. The God of justice who remembered the Israelite in Egypt will not forget the cries of such as these.

Why Do Lynchings Continue?

Some may enquire why the United States continues to wink at such utter anarchy as mob law. It is not because we are dull in our human sympathies. Let there be a famine or a disaster in any part of the world to men of any color, and we are the foremost in the work of relief. Nor is it because our governmental control is weak. We have ordinances in our cities that control such offenses as spitting on the sidewalk and they are efficiently enforced.

The reason lies deeper than this. We have been brutalized in our attitude to the black man through holding him in bondage for centuries. If slavery was a curse to the black man, it was a deeper curse to the white man. It dulled his human feelings in regard to men of the African race. In addition to this the North made it possible for lynchings to become the regular way of dealing with negro crime through the abuses of the reconstruction period. A habit first started in the South has now spread through the North. In addition to this, officials have often condoned mobs. The governor of Mississippi made himself infamous a few years ago by his declarations on lynch law. Judge Charles H. Brand of Lawrenceville, Ga., refused to call the troops to protect two negroes from lynching and justified himself in these words: "I don't propose to be the engine of sacrificing any white man's life for all such negro criminals in the country. * * * I am in perfect accord with my conscience and my God. I would not imperil the life of one white man to save the lives of a hundred such negroes."

Governor Blease of South Carolina says, in regard to a recent lynching in his state, that rather than use the power of his office in deterring white men from "punishing that nigger brute" he "would have resigned his office and come to Honeapath and led the mob." Such attitudes on the part of officials are the attitudes of large numbers of citizens or these officials would not make such brags. So long as a community has such social leaders, who put the mantle of charity over the most infamous crimes against humanity, we cannot expect the evil to abate. There must be a remedy from some other source for this evil.

The Remedy for Lynching.

The educated negroes are organizing for the protection of their race as we might expect them to do. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, held its annual meeting in Chicago recently. Its opening sessions were in the Sinai Synagogue whose Rabbi is Dr. Hirsch and the reception was held at Hull House. The negro leader of this movement is W. E. B. DuBois, a graduate of Harvard University with some German university experience. He is known to many of us as the author of "The Souls of Black Folks." This association numbers in its membership such eminent white leaders as Jane Addams and Rabbi Hirsch.

Another remedy for lynching lies in the reform of our courts.

They often delay in the meting out of justice, and thus by their delay and uncertainty encourage the rough and ready action of the mob. It is to be doubted whether this would put an end to lynching, however, now that that vicious habit has been made respectable among us. It seems to us that the true remedies are to be found in two directions, one legal, the other moral. Before legal action can be effective, there must be born a conscience on this subject. It must be preached as many another great reform, until a slothful conscience is aroused to sensitiveness and action. If the church is to follow the custom of anniversary sermons, one day in the calendar might be justly given to the matter of negro rights. With an awakened conscience we would then want political action, for the latter could not come without the former to support it.

Once it was the theory of government in this country that the federal government had no police powers of any sort and could not interfere. Now there are sufficient court decisions to make it certain that the federal government can interfere when any state refuses to protect any part of its citizenship. The legal remedy then lies in the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment. For the good name of our country, troops should be sent into any state north or south that fails to preserve order or to punish the members of mobs.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Competition in Evangelistic Work.

The problem of eliminating competition in evangelism is pressing now, not only upon country and village, but upon city churches also. Few denominations are large enough to face it. The selfishness of the human heart compels many to ignore the problem altogether. Officialism in the denomination demands party triumphs at any cost; it must have annual or even monthly reports of success. Back of these reports may be conditions which make the success temporary or in reality a failure. From rivalry and overlapping of interests the Disciples, like others, have not always been free; nor have they profited every time by the violations of the principle of Christian comity. There are fields where we have gone in against the protests of those who were better acquainted with the conditions than we. Their interest was construed to be a sectarian one—a desire to hinder the progress of the truth. After the converts were counted it seemed that those on the ground were wrong in their appeal for the latest evangelist to keep out. Two years after, no one was more certain of the righteousness of that appeal than the evangelist himself. What became of the far-flung triumph? Where are the numerous converts. Ask of the winds that "far around with fragments strewed" the churches that were already doing work before the evangelist came. Therein may be found what was left of the work that denominationalism heralded as a work of grace against which all the gates of hell should not prevail. What is true of one people is true of all. A boat can be overloaded; so can a community with churches. One is just as certain death as the other. In Chicago this principle of avoiding church-crowded territory is being carried out, and with good success. Here is the record set down in the Congregationalist.

Five leading Protestant denominations in Chicago have a co-operative plan in church extension which marks a long step in advance over the methods which obtained before the organization of the Co-operative Council of City Missions about four years ago, In evangelizing the immigrants, new work is divided among the denominations, much as has become a fixed policy in foreign fields. The Persians have been committed to the care of the Presbyterians; the Hungarians divided between the Baptists and the Methodists. While all the denominations work among the Bohemians, special efforts have been recently made to prevent overlapping. A case in controversy was recently settled by assigning to a Presbyterian mission a certain section of a field adjacent to, but not conflicting with, a flourishing Baptist church. The North Shore beyond Evanston was co-operatively canvassed last year, and it was advised that for the time being Congregationalists and Methodists establish no more new churches, but that Presbyterians, Baptists and Disciples should plant two each, as soon as these denominations found suitable openings. According to this program, mutually agreed upon, a new Presbyterian work has been opened in Wilmette and a Baptist church in Highland Park. A Methodist work has recently been revived in Hinsdale with the approval of the Council, although not without something of protest from the existing churches in this suburb. The drift shows that in the strategies of church planting even the most democratic denominations have gone over to episcopal ideals. Both the Presbyterian and Methodist superintendents paid tribute to the superior alertness of Supt. J. C. Armstrong in pre-empting new Congregational fields. A system of centralized aggressiveness in the office of the City Missionary Society has made the strength of Congregationalism in Chicago proportionate to its place in the country at large. This, Dr. Rowe of the Methodist Society declared, is true of no other of the five co-operating denominations.

Methodists and Biblical Criticism.

Some fears have been expressed that an unpleasant discussion of higher criticism may be precipitated at the General conference of the Methodist church in Minneapolis. Such a discussion says the Northwestern Christian Advocate, would be damaging "to the spirit and work of the General Conference * * * * * and could only develop tempers inimical to all judicial consideration of the real estate of the church, and fatal to all really helpful constructive legislation." Commenting further the same paper says:

And still other conferences have passed resolutions against officers in the church touching views in regard to the authorship and interpretation of the book of Daniel. Now all students who have given the matter attention are agreed that, strictly speaking, the book of Daniel is anonymous. Nobody knows, and in the present state of biblical knowledge can know, who wrote it or when it was written. Nor is such an issue to be determined by a majority vote of the General Conference, however eloquent the debate. And whether it shall be interpreted as belonging to the literature of history or of apocalyptic, who shall say?

The truth is, a man can be a disciple thoroughly approved by the Master and thoroughly loyal to the faith and hold pretty much any view he pleases about the book of Daniel. It would be a perfectly fair assumption that one might canvass the entire lay representation in the General Conference and two thirds of the ministerial representation, and discover that a study of the four visions of Daniel had only left them with a sense of bewilderment and a headache. It might also be disclosed that a very significant proportion of the entire body, including the lobby, could not tell what the four visions were, to say nothing of their interpretation.

It does not follow because men, so far as loyalty to Christ is concerned, may hold about any view they please about the book of Daniel, that one man's view is as good as another's. Something must be allowed for scholarship and the rights of scholarly research. Goodness is not itself sufficient to determine questions of literary authorship and interpretation. And if the church is to keep in touch with the life of the time in which it works it cannot ignore the findings of devout scholars who have given themselves to the determination of such questions. Professor Driver probably knows more about the book of Daniel than any other living man; and a sound intelligence in the absence of other expert knowledge will give weight to his findings. Knowledge as against ignorance has a claim to consideration.

What is Soul Saving?

Merely to give to a man the assurance that his sins are forgiven and that he can read his title clear to mansions in the skies, is not to save his soul.

Millions of men have had that assurance with no misgivings at all, and have remained selfish, hard-hearted, greedy, extortionate, pushing their schemes ruthlessly over their prostrate competitors, with no sense of any social obligation and no other motive in life than to get the most they could out of all their fellow men, and to give as little as possible in return. There are such people in all our churches, plenty of them. And it is becoming a serious question whether the churches, whose business it is to save souls, ought not to make it plain to such people that their souls are not saved—that they are not even in the way of being saved.

It is just this class of people who are apt to be most strenuous in their demands that the minister shall confine himself to the business of saving souls. It is high time that they were taken at their word and that they were fully enlightened as to just what happens to a man when his soul is saved. Nothing is more needed than a good deal of very elementary teaching about what is meant by the saving of of souls.—Washington Gladden.

Away, then, with all feeble complaints, all meager and mean anxieties! Take your duty and be strong in it, as God will make you strong. The harder it is the stronger, in fact, you will be. Understand, also, that the great question here is not what you will get, but what you will become. The greatest wealth you can ever get will be in yourself. Take your burdens and troubles and losses and wrongs, if come they must and will, as your opportunities, knowing that God has girded you for greater things than these.—Horace Bushnell.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.
United Religious Press Building

Spiritual Power

Believing in the reality of that which we see and hear and touch, we look in the world of the senses for evidence of spiritual power. We do not deny that there exists a realm beyond that which the eye can see and the ear can hear, but for present uses we do not assign to it any importance unless it manifests itself to the senses.

Man exhibits his spiritual power by fixing the place and value of each experience. "Human knowledge and power meet in one." Ignorance and impotence dwell together. It is nothing to remember that we have had pain and pleasure, that we have traveled in many lands and conversed with many kinds of people. We must be interpreters of what we see and hear in order that we may be efficient.

The technical skill that enables man to employ to advantage the resources of nature is itself power and it affords him the opportunity to increase his power. It gives leisure for science, art, and religion. It is an aid to true democracy, for it teaches respect for those who can do something well and it will ultimately undermine the power of all who ask exemption from useful labor.

In the midst of turmoil and confusion, power manifests itself as calmness. The weak are distracted by conflicting demands made upon them. They are often paralyzed in the presence of their most important duties. The noise of battle brings up the reserves of the strong man. He applies his strength where it is needed. He sees "what is small and what is great," and he wastes no time on the trivial.

The peace which the spiritual man enjoys is the peace of righteousness. He signs no treaty of peace with the powers of darkness. He aims at unifying his life by making it worthy. He expects to see men united by the love of righteousness. Strife and confusion accompany the pursuit of low aims. The peace of indifference and moral cowardice has nothing to commend it to the spiritual mind.

Paul and the Philippians were partners in a great enterprise. He had the knowledge and inspiration of an apostle. He gave himself willingly to the churches. He taught the weak, rebuked the proud, and admonished the wayward. The Philippians had a little of this world's goods. They ministered to the physical needs of the apostle that he might be able to preach the word. They were doing just as spiritual a service as Paul. It was their desire that men should hear the truth, believe it, and let it live in them. They showed their desire by their ready coöperation with Paul. It is the strength of those who can work together that builds up the church. The person who will not work unless he can always have his plans adopted is apt to be a destroyer. He thinks he is a man of power. Individually, he may be stronger than his co-workers; socially, he may be the weakest of the group.

The spiritual man denies himself and he is sufficient unto himself. He denies to his purely private interests the right to control his actions that have an influence beyond himself. He is sufficient unto himself in the sense that he does not wait upon chance to determine his happiness. He is reasoning with Jews in their synagogue, addressing the philosophers of Athens, telling a mob his religious history, or in prison for the testimony of the Lord, but, wherever he is, the word he speaks is his own, not that of conditions. He grows by using circumstances, not by being used by them. He much prefers kindness to cruelty. He will not, however, cease to be kind because others are cruel to him nor will he permit courtesy to cover up sin.

The interests of the spiritually strong are many and varied. The strong man's activities fall short of what he hopes to see done. He has a word of encouragement for all workers. He sees how those who think they are enemies are nevertheless working toward the same end. He deplores the rancor and malignity which sometimes characterize ecclesiastical controversies and at the same time he recognizes the religious value of a life even when it is weakened by sectarian or personal bitterness. He discovers goodness in unexpected places. While he pays honor to the church, he cannot grant to the church a monopoly of religious truth. Truth is truth by virtue of what it is and not by the authority of councils and synods. It is the virtue of the strong man that he recognizes truth and goodness wherever he finds them and that he has no fear that they will prove dangerous, because they have never been labelled by the established authorities. [Midweek Service, May 15. Phil. 4:4-13.] S. J.

"Lord, Is It I?"

A MEDITATION ON THE LORD'S SUPPER.

Those who have given attention to the literature dealing with the last week of Jesus' public ministry know something of the questions that have arisen regarding the time that he ate the final meal with the disciples, and gave to the bread and wine the new and significant meaning which the church has treasured ever since.

Some of the facts are clear; others quite obscure, and certain utterances of the Evangelists present palpable difficulties. The Passover was a national feast of the Jews, the central feature of which was a lamb roasted and accompanied with bread, wine and certain herbs. This feast was eaten on the 14th day of the spring month Nisan. In the year of Jesus' death, the 14th of Nisan fell on the Sabbath, or Saturday. It is apparent from the New Testament records that Jesus' crucifixion occurred on the previous day, Friday the 13th, and that the evening on which he met his disciples in the upper room was Thursday the 12th. Yet Mark, the earliest of the Evangelists affirms that it was "on the day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover," that the preparations for the meal were made, and Jesus and his disciples partook in the upper room. The first portion of this statement relating to "the first day of unleavened bread" is followed by the first Evangelist, though the phrase "when they sacrificed the Passover" is omitted.

* * *

It seems probable that the statement in Mark is based upon an erroneous source. It is impossible to take the view that Jesus and the disciples ate their meal on the regular Passover day, for by the time the tragedy of Jesus' death was finished. It is probable that Jesus, knowing that he was under suspicion by the authorities, and that his arrest had been arranged between Judas and the priests, decided to eat the Passover meal with his disciples at a time sufficiently early to avoid the danger. Thus it was not the technical Passover of the 14th Nisan, but a meal which would serve as such. Whether that meal included the sacrificial lamb we do not know, for according to the ritual the lamb must first be presented at the temple on the Passover day. But at least it was a meal sufficient for the purpose of Jesus and the disciples, and was the time of some of his richest counsels to them.

The narrative of this occasion as furnished by the Gospel of Matthew differs in some interesting particulars from the earlier source, Mark. And in this study it is to the Gospel of Matthew that attention is directed. On the day which the Evangelist understood to be the "first day of unleavened bread" Jesus sent the twelve disciples to the city, from their temporary home in Bethany, and bade them look, not for any servant who might be met bearing a pitcher of water, but for a particular man with whom supposedly he had made previous arrangements, and who was now to be informed that the Master's time was at hand, and that he desired accommodation at his house for the meal of that evening. The writer of the narrative was impressed with the fact that Jesus had felt the necessity of planning with some friend in the city for this secret gathering, that he might not be disturbed by the malice of his enemies in the moment of his final interview with the twelve.

* * *

In the evening after the preparations were made Jesus and the disciples were sitting at meat when he suddenly exclaimed, "One of you shall betray me!" Instantly the astonished inquiry went round, "Lord, is it I?" Jesus responded, "He that dipped his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me." The Evangelist evidently understood that by these words Jesus intended to mark out the traitor definitely. It seems more probable, however, that the narrative in Mark is closer to the facts. There no hint is given as to the identity of the traitor, but only the character of the treachery. Would not Judas have been overwhelmed at once by the indignant protest of the disciples, had they known that it was really he? With the rest, Judas himself asked the question, "Is it I?" and Jesus responded in that ambiguous phrase, which never affirmed certainty in Jewish speech but only hinted at possibility, when he said, "Thou hast said." He thus left it to Judas' own conscience to discern the certainty of Jesus' knowledge of his acts and the character of the transaction on which he had already embarked.

While they were eating, Jesus took bread and blessed it in the customary way and gave it to the disciples, saying, "Take, eat; this is my body." And a moment later he took a cup of wine, and giving thanks for it said, "Drink ye all of it; this is my blood of the new covenant, shed for many unto remission of sin." In Matthew's Gospel the request to eat and drink is added to the original narrative of Mark, and also the words "unto remission of sins," as intended to make clearer the phrase "the blood of the new covenant shed for many." Then Jesus added the solemn and touching words of farewell and anticipation, "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink anew with you in my Father's kingdom." Here, as in Mark, the emphasis is laid on the shortness of the time until the great change shall come, ushering in the new social order of which Jesus always spoke as the kingdom of God.

* * *

The significant features of Matthew's account of this meal are the absence of all questions on the part of Jesus in reference to the Passover, and the command uttered by him in reference to its observance; the designation of a particular man and house as previously known to Jesus as the host and the scene of the final meal; the pointing out of Judas as the treacherous member of the twelve; and the addition of the phrase, "unto remission of sins," as designating somewhat more fully and reflectively the nature of the covenant which secured remission of sin to the many, thus giving them the right to the covenant blessing.

In these items will be discerned something of that reflective and apologetic character of the Gospel of Matthew which separates it at many points from the earlier narrative of Mark and gives to it the tone of a later and more elaborate comment upon the facts of Jesus' life.

But even here the simplicity of the meal is clear. It was the Passover in all regards. No new features were added to it. There was no institution of a new rite such as the church in later days observed with careful and unfailing devotion. Jesus merely pointed out the symbolism of the bread and the wine as representative of his own broken and outpoured life. There was no suggestion in his words, even as recorded by Matthew, that his friends were to continue the practice of using bread and wine in any other than the ritual sense of the Passover feast.

* * *

Yet all the more impressive for this very simplicity is the scene in the upper room. The sadness of Jesus' spirit contemplating the treachery of one of his friends, the anxious inquiry of the disciples, not concerning each other but rather as to their own standing in the thought of the Lord, and the beautiful suggestiveness of the elements blessed by Jesus and distributed with the customary request to partake, all this gives to this second account of the final meal of Jesus and the disciples, a beauty and tenderness which no believing spirit can resist. Not because Jesus instituted a rite and commanded his disciples to observe it are we the perpetual keepers of the feast. But because the love of Christ constrains us to perpetuate so significant and descriptive an event for its educational value and its inspiring power. With unfailing remembrance of Jesus' words, simple and suggestive as they are, the church through the centuries observes the breaking of bread and the pouring of the wine, as a tribute of affection for its great and ever-present Friend.

Union of Baptists and Disciples.

The volume containing the "Proceedings of the Baptist Congress" at Atlantic City, in the autumn of 1911, furnishes some interesting data on the subject of union between Baptists and Disciples. Unfortunately, a number of the Disciples who were assigned places on the program was unable to be present. Peter Ainslie's paper was pacific, as might have been expected, and was more hopeful than any papers by the Baptist brethren. Dr. H. L. Willett made a brief address, indicating several methods by which the subject of union might be approached. I think it unfortunate that some of the speakers for the Baptists were Southern men because they cherish the old resentments which are unknown in the West and in the North, and which make any advance in the direction of union, at this time, an impossibility. Southern Baptists will not forgive Alexander Campbell for remaining in their fellowship when he was out of sympathy with them, and for the success which attended his efforts in persuading thousands of Baptists, and many entire congregations, to come into the Disciples' movement.

With that bias a Southern Baptist could hardly be expected to make any irenic overtures on the subject of union, and particularly when he approached the subject filled with the conviction that doctrinal distinctions made union impossible at this time. The address of Professor W. J. McGlothlin of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville, is a good statement of the impossibilities of union between the two bodies. The old prejudices are revived, and the bristling issues of the war time made to pass before us in unfavorable review. But the world loves a fight, and we are not surprised that the Professor's address met with applause surpassing that measured to other addresses. He tells us in the beginning of the address that the differences which caused the separation of Baptists and Disciples—had their rise in the peculiar views of Thomas and Alexander Campbell, and that whatever is original and distinctive among the Disciples has been inherited from the Campbells, for the body as a whole is but the lengthened shadow of the founders. Whatever changes have marked the history of the body in recent years have been in the way of return toward the common Christianity from which the Campbells departed.

That is frank, but from the Disciples' point of view hardly a correct statement of the case.

The Professor declares that Alexander Campbell as an interpreter "was rationalistic, agnostic, literalistic, and individualistic," and, as if that were not bad enough, he devotes about two pages to make good his statement. Alexander Campbell had his faults as we know too well, but there is no reason why the intemperate spirit of a century ago should be called upon today to describe them. Possibly the Baptist mantle of charity has been used on so many occasions that it is completely worn out, and a new one was not provided at the time of the Congress. Says Professor McGlothlin,

Baptism for the remission of sins in the South is the great barrier to union between Baptists and the Disciples. Such a doctrine is both unscriptural and practically dangerous to the reality of a vital and living faith.

And further—

Now most Baptists feel that union with such a body that holds such views would be a repudiation of our whole history and a blow at spiritual religion itself. Union would seem to be impossible until the Disciples modify their position on the design and place of baptism in the Christian system.

Incidentally, we should remember that there are even greater hindrances to the union of different churches than the form of baptism. Here, where we are agreed on the form, are presented differences that seem insuperable. Indeed this entire address shows that Southern Baptists are threshing over the old controversies today as their fathers did before them. And though we might grant that everything in this address were true—which of course we do not—its defect is in the manner with which it treats a subject of this character. To emphasize doctrinal differences is only to keep them alive and to postpone the day of union.

I quote the following paragraph that we may see ourselves as others see us. We must confess that there is some truth in these charges. Out of that word "sect" we have made a harp of a thousand strings, and its music is not pleasing to the memory. The sooner we find some better word to express our meaning, the better off we will all be. We have almost abandoned the use of "Babylon" as a term of ignoble description, and "sect," as a term implying a good deal of phariseeism, should be sent to the same limbo. The harsh light in which Professor McGlothlin sets the Disciples may be of assistance in our desire to give every faith and every creed its proper setting. Here is what he says:

Strange to say, the attitude of the Disciples toward Christian union is one of the difficulties in the way of union. They are the disciples, Christians; all others are sects, upon whose poor heads the vials of wrath are poured out until the vocabulary of vituperation is exhausted. [Were we ever so bad as that?] Careful distinction is made between "church union" which is advocated by the "sects," and "Christian union," which is advocated by themselves. The latter means the disintegration of "the sects" and their coming to be "simply Christians," that is, Disciples. For a century they have been advocating Christian union with vehemence, as the chief plank in their platform, and yet they have united with nobody except the followers of Barton W. Stone with whom they were in substantial agreement. Nobody takes them very seriously, for they have shown as little of the spirit of fraternity and conciliation as any of the so-called sects. They have continued their predatory habits of proselyting down to the present, and think of union on no other basis. They have rather divided and embittered than united and harmonized. Baptists could hardly accept the assumptions of the Disciples in this direction.

The Professor thinks it is perilous to prophesy, but the signs of the times seem to indicate that "union between the Baptists and the Disciples is a good way in the future in Kentucky and the South." We agree with him, and largely because the old control versies will not be allowed to die. There seems to be an unwritten law on both sides that canonization awaits those who will immortalize these differences. Professor McGlothlin's address is a sincere effort in that direction. E. B. B.

Editorial Table Talk

Church, State and Marriage

In recent years the wide-spread prevalence of divorce has stirred the religious forces of America to great activity in the hope of effecting some changes for the better. All manner of remedies for the evil have been suggested, and it must be confessed that even now the avenue of escape from the peril of divorce is only beginning to be seen. Divorce is the easy and the popular way out of difficulties which embarrass individuals, destroy the family circle, and poison the tides of life in the oncoming generation. Most of our divorce laws deal with effects, not causes; they provide relief from uncongenial alliances. Happily, we are beginning to advocate measures which will make marriage possible only to the physically and morally fit. That is to begin at the source of what may be and ought to be a blessing to the citizens of our land.

The world has ever believed that marriage was an individual and a private matter, concerning only the persons involved. We are beginning to see that marriage concerns the state, that nothing is of more vital concern to the public. Few events can concern the state more. Its future depends upon its citizenship, the citizenship depends upon the home, and the home depends upon the conditions growing out of the marriage relation. The state has to deal with the complications growing out of unfortunate marriages; what seemed to be the business of a few persons may become the business of the neighborhood, of the community, and finally of the courts. Then if misbegotten children are the result of unfortunate marriages the problem is further complicated, and the woe and want of criminal and possibly pauper children compel the activities of the legal and benevolent activities of any state.

Whatever concerns the state should be regulated by the state. It is better for authority of some sort to say who may live together than to have that same authority say who need not live together; it is better for such a voice to speak before two misguided souls approach the altar than to be compelled to speak in the interest of the community when they approach moral and spiritual bankruptcy. It is as rational for the state to protect two lovers from each other as to protect society from them later on. It would require no greater discernment to say who should be joined in marriage, did we once set ourselves to that task, than to say what marriages should be put asunder. Education is our only hope, and such education as will fill the minds of the young with a conception of the sacredness of the marriage vow and acquaint them with the laws of their being and their obligations to society.

No Alarm for the Old Ship

It is a great relief to many that at the Kansas City Congress the old ship came safely through with flying colors, and that Charybdis is not listed among the passengers "on her deck." We were a little fearful that the historic whirlpool would get over the traces, if we may borrow a figure from a contemporary, and do considerable damage. But being held down by kicking straps, if we may continue the figure, the dangers from iron-shod heels was averted, and only once or twice was Charybdis seen to tuck its tail—if we may borrow the figure once more which we shall soon return with pleasure—as if on mischief bent. There is no reason why Charybdis shouldn't be a horse as well as a whirlpool, a flying machine, a tree toad or anything else that can climb or fly or jump on a vessel's deck. And if our readers will refer to a winter issue of the Christian Standard they will see that such a feat was performed by Charybdis. We rejoice that Charybdis made no such excursion in the spring as in the winter. It has found out that its presence is not to be tolerated on the deck of the old ship of Zion.

Then that escapade on the deck afforded a bad precedent. What would become of the old ship if Scylla followed the example of its neighbor? Angels and ministers of grace defend us! Then we would have trouble. It is our faith that the old ship can carry a monstrous whirlpool, but it is doubtful that she can carry a rock big enough to crack ocean liners like egg shells. We cannot so believe, and the brethren may write us down as heretical if they will. Don't impose too much on even a herculean faith; it can be shattered, no matter how many reverses it has already stood. Imagine what that rock would do on the old ship's deck if it got to rolling in a storm! All our powers break down under the strain. But the old ship is sailing on, and the dangers of the Congress are past, and Charybdis and Scylla remain undisturbed, for which we are truly thankful, and all on board will likely reach the desired haven, or the Grand Central depot, if we may borrow another figure from our friend.

Boosting the Church.

It is not so easy to do as roasting the church, but it is more Christian and therefore more profitable. Human nature can always wax eloquent over failures and follies, and it would seem that the critics of the church never sleep. There are few who can tell how things should be done; there are many who can tell how things should not be done, and they are content, in the majority of cases, to let their labors end there. This is why we knock the "knocker"; he is so numerous, and conspicuous. He never complains of working over time. If we could only harness the critic and the discontented and the sore and the sour to some worthy enterprise of church life what untold good would result? And how the faces and the vocabulary would change! Then the outlook on life would change, and none would be happier than the crowd who had been translated to fields of usefulness from caves of Adullam. Please pass the boost on, of which the following from the Universalist Leader is a good example:

It has seemed sometimes that the church was being pulled down by the people inside; so many ministers and members are finding fault, and not in the spirit of correction always either. We ran across a sample of the right kind of boosting in a paper called The Herald, published down in Reading, Pa. Note how it skims over no fault, but at the same time puts the finger right on the spot where the trouble is, and thus transmutes fault-finding into encouragement and good cheer. "The church is not a failure. Christianity is not on the down grade. The pulpit is not outgrown. There just needs to be a new adaptation; that's all. The cry of 'back to the church' is a very wise and reasonable cry, and ought to be dinned eagerly into the ears of those who are drifting away from the church. But they won't go back to the church and the church won't welcome them back unless there be new manners and new measures. The ascetic monk of medieval times played an important part in the world's advancement. But there is no room in the world for him nowadays. The modern parson must not be a bookish recluse with his mind forever on hidden meanings and his soul ever basking in the glow of a future heaven. The modern pastor, if he would be successful—and by success we mean the winning of men and the ennobling of society—must have red blood and plenty of it. He must have kinetic energy; and he must—begging his pardon—have legs. He must be a student of men—and of women and children, too—a good deal more than of ponderous tomes of theology and the latest popular novels. Unless he gets round among his people—and those who are not his people, too—and hobnobs with them about their daily toil, about the little troubles that fret and irritate, about their ambitions and aspirations and hopes and efforts, about their distresses and disappointments, their griefs and their glooms, he is but a poor sort of a pastor, what though he rises up each Sunday morning and preaches with the tongue of men and of angels to a select bucketful of the salt of the earth."

Is the Preacher Cowardly

There are occasions when the preacher magnifies his office by speaking out in no uncertain way; there are times again when he does his calling a great service by keeping still. In every community there is a class who never weary of telling us that "they like a preacher who tells what he thinks." As a matter of fact such people would rise in indignation and cast the preacher out of their city, if he told what he thought of them. They gnash on him with their teeth if he tells what he thinks—if his thinking is at variance with their own. No, they say exactly what they do not mean. The preacher soon learns how to estimate this portion of his hearers. Then there is another class of auditors who believe the preacher on special occasions should be a Boanerges, and denounce all the evils of the country. He must rebuke sin, they say; and their conception of language is such that denunciation is as near profanity as the preacher dare to go. They associate boorishness and even vulgarity with bravery. There are few who can appreciate righteous indignation that suffers in silence, and is kind. Nor are there many who appreciate judicial facing of wrongs, assailing them with calm, forceful speech. The frenzied attack counts for too much. Extremes are not always rational. To have the spirit of the prophet makes a genius of the preacher in a world full of wrongs that need correction. He will know when to cry aloud and spare not, and when to forbear. This fine paragraph from the Christian Register (Unitarian) should be pondered with appreciation.

A great deal of nonsense struts as novel sense in the frequent charge that preachers are cowards and time-servers who do not take into their pulpits any subject and any contention that they or others think it their duty to lay before their congregations. To rush into indiscretion and offensiveness for fear that some ont will think them silent out of fear is to show another kind of cowardice. A good rule to adopt in this matter is the rule that obtains without question in other circles, the rule that does not consider fear at all, but only courtesy, a sense of fitness, sagacious measure of what is to be accomplished, and a decent regard for the tacit pledge under which one has the privilege of addressing a Sunday audience at all. A political candidate invited to address some non-political audience does not take umbrage nor think his liberty of prophesying abridged if he is requested to exclude from his speech any reference to political subjects. He recognizes that on an occasion when men of many political faiths are present for the consideration of subjects having nothing to do with politics, it would be in vicious taste and a violation of all proprieties for him to seize the opportunity of making capital for his party. A very independent and courageous man would be very careful not to abuse freedom, or think his courage needed such vindicating. The more preachers have the courage to refuse the seductions of every other topic but their own and to hold a waning interest up to the high level of subjects left to the pulpit alone, the more attention and respect their message will gain.

Recruiting for the Ministry

Is the minister compelled to face poverty? Is he denied many of the legitimate pleasures of life? Does his work exclude him from the friendship of his fellow men? Does that work tend to make him feminine? Is he to be scholarly and a recluse, or a handshaker and an indifferent student? Must he be busy jollying the idle of his congregation in lieu of any other diversion for them, and gain their favor, or stem to be indifferent to them while really preparing himself for the duties of his office? Must he be true to himself and often offend by the plainness of his speech, or must he compromise himself for the sake of keeping on good terms with the well-to-do of his congregation, or even the offenders? Must he regard himself as a preacher whose stipend comes as an alms, or because he has given value received? How can he meet the demands of the age in which he lives, accepting the traditional doctrines of his church while keeping an open mind to the newer learning? These are some of the problems of the ministry, and a perusal of them may help us to understand why the recruits for the ministry are so few. It is true that the ideal candidate for the ministry may not be perplexed by such questions as these, but many candidates are; the ideal candidate is a rara avis. Then the problem of poverty must be faced often during student days. Are there as many difficulties in other callings? Do they offer better compensations than the ministry? Do they make life fuller and more free?

Questions like these could be multiplied at length. But ministerial candidates must have a call that will reach their conscience; they must be well prepared for their work; they must on all occasions declare God's truth as they see it; their accounting must be with God and not with man. Consecration and sanctified common sense will do much for a minister in view of many other defects. And the minister himself must make full proof of his ministry. No church ever climbs higher than its pastor. What he is the church is likely to be. The following table of the decline and fall of ministerial students in recent years is taken from the Watchman (Baptist):

The Sixth Annual Report of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching gives some interesting information about the sources from which theological seminaries draw their students for the ministry. The Methodist seminaries receive 74 per cent of their students from Methodist colleges, Baptist seminaries 41 per cent from Baptist colleges, Presbyterian seminaries 37 per cent from Presbyterian colleges, and Episcopal seminaries only 9 per cent of their students from colleges under Episcopal control. From colleges under the control of other denominations Baptist seminaries received 27 per cent of their students, Presbyterian seminaries 16 per cent, Episcopal seminaries 10 per cent, and Methodist seminaries only 2 per cent. The rest of the students come from undenominational or state colleges, or are received without graduating from college. The report also shows that the number of students in theological seminaries increased faster than the population from 1870 to 1890, and the relative increase was then less than that of the population until 1903, when the tide again turned, and the students for the ministry have increased faster than the population since 1905. In general the period from 1890 to 1903 was a time of great commercial prosperity, and the lure of prosperous business openings drew many young men away from serious thoughts of devoting themselves to the self-denying work of preaching the gospel. The Baptist seminaries on which the report is based are Newton, Rochester and the University of Chicago Divinity School.

—A well-known Baptist leader gives five reasons for being a Baptist as follows: (1) The absolute loyalty of Baptists to Jesus Christ; (2) their emphasis on spiritual manhood and womanhood; (3) their passion for liberty; (4) their belief in a social Gospel; (5) their enthusiasm for missions. The time is close at hand when the implied affront, albeit unintended, in such claims as these will be apparent to all. No Baptist would face an assembly of Presbyterians, for example, and say right out: We are more loyal to Jesus Christ than you, we emphasize spirituality more than you, we believe more passionately in liberty than do you, we preach a social gospel and you do not, we have the missionary spirit and you do not possess it. All such talk as this is essentially pharisaical and false. The differences among the Christian denominations do not extend so far down into the roots of our faith and conduct as this sort of talk makes out. The things about which we are divided are surface things, negligible, even contemptible in the light of our agreements upon the very five points upon which this Baptist above claims superior excellence for his own denomination.

—In the northeast corner of the lower peninsula of Michigan, says the Christian Standard, there are "ten counties in a bunch, and not a single church of Christ," though there are 75,000 people in the district. In the upper peninsula, where there are 300,000 people, there is "only one church of Christ"; two counties in "the thumb" have 70,000 people, and "not a single church of Christ," and in the southern part there are "five counties connected and no church of Christ." This is hard on Michigan! But is it not harder on the newspaper that can in this day of light appropriate to itself and its own sect a monopoly of the Church of Christ? How has the vocabulary of the Disciples changed since Thomas Campbell wrote the Declaration and Address!

—Opponents of the practice of Christian union will soon find the brethren becoming impatient with the talk about its being "divisive." The lack of a better argument will soon rob this bogey of its terror. A good scripture text, a "thus saith the Lord," or a single pertinent Christian principle showing why a church of Christ should not receive into its fellowship any person whom Christ has received into his Church would be much more effective to stop this forward movement than to keep up wild vociferations of alarm.

—Two of the most prominent Baptist churches of the East, Mt. Morris Church of New York City and the Ithaca Church, recently abandoned the practice of restricted membership by voting to accept all Christians into their fellowship regardless of their form of baptism. These churches will continue to practice immersion exclusively. This is practically the same program as that recently adopted by the Disciples at Berkeley, Calif.

—In response to our request for Dr. J. H. Garrison's review of C. C. Morrison's paper on the Plea of the Disciples The Christian Century has received word that it is to be published in The Christian Evangelist.

Men and Religion Conservation Congress

The Closing Campaign in New York

Representatives of the Conservation Congress of the Men and Religion Forward Movement began to arrive in New York the early part of the week. Conferences were held and the boards were enabled to meet with a fuller quota of their members present than has ever been their wont. The purpose of the morning and afternoon sessions of the first day was to give a comprehensive statement of the achievements of the various organizations, denominational and interdenominational, doing specific work for men and boys. At the morning session syllabi giving an outline synopsis of the work of these different movements were distributed and by these were guided the thought throughout the following days of the assembly.

The theme of the morning was "Men and Boys and the Kingdom of Jesus Christ" as viewed by the Federal Council of the Church in America, the Brotherhood, the Gideons, the young people's societies, the Sunday-school Council of evangelical denominations in the United States and Canada.

Second Session, Sunday-school Work.

The Ven. Archdeacon Madden, Liverpool, conducted the devotions, and in a few introductory remarks said that through the receipt of a cable received from Fred B. Smith, he had been saved from being a passenger on the Titanic. He had purposed sailing on that ship, but Mr. Smith had recommended him to come by the Mauretania. Hence, he was there that day, thankfully to take part in the service.

Marion Lawrance briefly reviewed the report of his Association, tracing its history, purpose, achievements and future program. Its present enrollment numbers 16,617,000, of which approximately 3,000,000 are men and boys, not including lads under twelve years of age. In the various states and provinces there are about 200 men and women, for most part experts, giving their whole time to the work, under salary. By far the largest and most important part of the work, however, is that done by volunteer workers. There are more than 150,000 of these volunteer workers, who, it is estimated, devote annually an average of at least one week each, without pay, to the Association they represent. This is equivalent to more than 3,000 paid workers giving full time to the work.

Y. M. C. A.

Alfred E. Marling claimed that the Young Men's Christian Associations were the agents not the rivals of the church; that the movement, now sixty-one years old, had steadily grown in public favor; that if the interest of the church of Christ in the work of the Associations was withdrawn there would be nothing of them left. "We are doing the best for the immigrant too," said Mr. Marling, "not only helping him as far as possible after his landing, but by counseling and instructing him before he leaves his mother-land. With regard to the charge that the Y. M. C. A. is not a spiritual force, I may say that I'm positively tired of hammering it in. Proof to the contrary is overwhelming, and through our Associations men are, all along the line, being won for Christ so often, that I'm positively tired of hammering it in."

Missionary Movement.

Mr. Harry Wade Hicks said the Missionary Education Movement was part of an emphasis and part a movement. It sought to stimulate and foster the missionary spirit. The principle on which emphasis should be laid is that the message of the church is a social message and that the social message is inseparable from the missionary spirit. Social service, in as far as it is Christian, is missions. "The church," said Mr. Hicks, "is the great and final missionary society, and, in the future, membership with the church should entail membership with its missionary program."

E. E. Taylor said that the Laymen's Missionary Movement did not seek to multiply agencies but to foster those already in existence. It aimed at getting the best there was in any congregation into harness. It strove for a program of active missionary work in each local church—a program which meant prayer, education and giving. It went in for the every-member canvass, the weekly offering, the assimilation of the principles of Christian stewardship, and a thorough study of means and methods whereby dependable funds could be raised.

J. Campbell White said in part: "We have found that men can be interested and enlisted in missionary work, if they are approached in the right way. We have also discovered that multitudes of men are glad to have some worth-while work to do in the church. Some hundreds of thousands of these men have been appointed as members of Missionary committees in their own churches. These committees undertake to get an adequate missionary policy into actual operation. In a multitude of cases they have succeeded in making their churches do from two to ten times as much for missions as they had ever done before.

Increase.

"The total increase during the past five years, in contributions to Home and Foreign Missions, has not been less than $25,000,000. At the same time the current revenues of the churches have been more easily and adequately provided for. The movement has led to the adoption of more thorough system in all church finance. The number of systematic contributors is also being multiplied, for higher standards of stewardship are being widely accepted. A much larger proportion of laymen are becoming active in Christian service. The faith of many men is being strengthened in the power of Christ to meet all the needs of the world. The movement has also done much to develop the spirit of co-operation and unity among the various churches and there is a place in the active work of the Laymen's Missionary Movement for every man at this Congress." Archdeacon Madden dismissed the session with the benediction.

Third Session, Christianity and Government.

Mr. James G. Cannon, chairman of the Committee of Ninety-seven, welcomed the Congress to New York and said that no better place for its being held could be imagined. The center of American industry and throbbing life, New York, presented such a variety of opportunities for the study of questions such as the Congress covered, discoverable, perhaps, nowhere else. "And the religious life of this city," continued Mr. Cannon, "is high—higher than is usually supposed. The day is past when men in New York have to apologize now for not being Christians and this movement of ours has demonstrated that men of brains, moral fiber—the real men of the nation—are vitally interested in religion."

Carl Milliken said that much was heard about the ending of the campaign, but in his judgment it was but beginning. Hitherto men of the movement had been at school, as it were, and that Congress stood for the commencement exercises, when school ended and work began. Referring to the Titanic tragedy, Senator Milliken said that out of it came a note of triumph, as in the hour of crucial testing men had nobly died. "May we, in like manner," he concluded, "be found equal to the demands of duty and service in its clamant, insistent hour."

Bryan Speaks.

In introducing the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Fred Smith said he had crossed his path all over the country. He had followed him, preceded him and been simultaneously on the same ground; and everywhere the same story had to be told. Mr Bryan ever left behind him the highest kind of reputation and impression

"I have known Mr. Fred Smith for years," said Mr. Bryan in his opening sentences, "but his real value I have appraised too late. Had I known of his capabilities in the days of certain campaigns of which I have some little knowledge, I might have been speaking tonight with more authority." A great burst of laughter greeted this sally.

"Religion," Mr. Bryan went on, "exerts a powerful influence on government. But government is merely what the people make it; thus what improves the people improves the government, too. Christ said a tree should be known by its fruits, and Christianity has already proved what it is by the fruits that it has borne. It is the leaven of Christianity which is elevating the entire world. Whatever progress there is has been borrowed from the Christian nations. Go where you will, you will find that it is the Christian ideals which are the revolutionizing forces in every country. The man who does the most good will always be the greatest among us.

Costs Less.

"If all of us would conscientiously practice the teachings of Christ what a world of peace and progress this would be! Christianity develops mankind, and mankind develops government. It costs less to keep a man from going astray than to bring him back and compensate society for his wrongdoing. Without a sense of responsibility to God, there is no guiding hand in a man's life. These things being so, who can doubt the necessity of religion to good government? Reason, by itself, and without the guidance of religion, can be warped and dethroned by self-interest and passion.

"You can't build a noble life out of an arithmetic. Religion is eminently practical. Man can't get along without it. Men need the church to strengthen them for the duties they have to perform. A man can't lead a righteous and industrious life without becoming a tower of strength in his community. If a man thinks of nothing but pleasure he ultimately wakes to find that his life is wasted and that he himself is unhappy. That is the difference which an ideal gives to life. It is all the difference between success and failure.

"We Americans have the best educational system in the world, and we have one of the best systems of government in the world. But, though education may plant and government may water, God—and God alone—can give the increase."

A Canadian View.

Addressing himself to the same subject, Mr. J. A. Macdonald, editor of the "Toronto Globe," in an address of exceptional power, made the following points:

(1) The fact of American democracy puts responsibility for American government directly and immovably on the American people. If there is evil in the land, injustice, oppression, wrong-doing, the people are responsible.

(2) The character of government is judged not by its forms, but by its fruits. Names and phrases and symbols do not signify. We may talk of the monarchy or of the republic. We may prate about autocracy or about democracy. That government is best which produces the best results in individual freedom, in civic efficiency, in national character.

(3) In so far as government under our democracy has come short, that shortcoming is due not to the inadequacy of democratic institutions, but to the frailties and failures of the people, who are the government themselves.

(4) But the new democracy will be no better than the old, unless there come with it a new moral standard and a new moral dynamic. Christianity can do nothing worth while for governments except to Christianize the life of the people. of all the people, in whom is the source and power of democratic rule.

There is no power for the redemption of life but the power of a person. The dynamic of Christianity is the living person of Jesus, the Christ. Personal love and loyalty to Him is the compulsion that will make this Congress tell in the life of America and of the world. His name is above all the names with which we try to rally the forces of progress and reform. Make it the rallying cry in this Congress, in all our churches, in the halls of legislation, in the unions of labor, in the boardrooms of finance, in the dull and waste places of our life. His program! His power! His name!

"I know of a land that is sunk in shame,
Of hearts that faint and tire;
And I know of a name, a name, a name,
Can set that land on fire.
Its sound is a brand, its letters flame,
But I know of a name, a name, a name,
Will set this land on fire."

Fourth Session, The Ministers.

Addresses by Dr. Talcot Williams, Director of the Pulitzer School of Journalism, Columbia University, and William T. Ellis, Secretary of the Commission. In the course of his remarks Dr. Williams said that exactly as a newspaper was loyal to the state, aided the enforcement of law, and gave its sympathetic aid to charitable endeavor, so the newspaper was bound to support religious effort with the impartial attitude of the state itself. The newspaper in the moral sanitation of society had a duty constantly misunderstood to do its share of making public the evils from which society may suffer.

The church itself ought also, on its side, to aid the newspaper to make plain the good which it does. Every theater has its press agent. Every corporation has its agency for reaching the public. The beneficial work of the church, its contributions, its preaching, its utterance on social questions ought to be spread abroad by every denomination in every city by a press agent, supplying to every newspaper and every agency of publicity the normal working of the religious body.

The report of the Publicity Theme Commission, of which George W. Coleman, Boston, is president, issued Saturday, contends that every daily paper in the country should maintain an organized religious department in charge of a competent member of its staff to cover local religious news regularly, systematically and attentively. The commission states emphatically that the daily newspapers can be very helpful in spreading and sustaining religious faith, and urges that clergymen, without seeking self-advertisement, should co-operate with the newspapers in the spread of church news.

"For the first time in history," it says, "there has been made a 'scientific nation-wide study' of the relations between the newspapers and the forces of religion.

"The Commission on Publicity sent out long sheets of questions to editors, laymen, and ministers all over the country, and their report tabulates thousands of replies.

The Commission also recommends to the Federal Council of American Churches, the Y. M. C. A. and other Christian organizations that a central publicity bureau be maintained, to which papers and news bureaus may apply day or night for religious information. The object of this is not propaganda, but coöperation.

Fifth Session—Boy's Work.

Rev. Charles W. Gilkey, pastor of Hyde Park Baptist Church, Chicago, Chairman of the Commission, opened the discussion. Mr. Gilkey said that at the outset of the campaign, the practicability of including a specific work for boys in the program of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, met with some questioning, and even serious opposition. Abundant evidence, however, that the inclusion was justified, is now forthcoming. Response had everywhere been awakened. Boys' Work Institutes, held all over the country, had resulted in attendances averaging from 250 in a city like Des Moines to more than 350 in one like Pittsburgh. In the course of its investigations, the Commission had discovered that "the boy" was neither unreligious nor non-religious. Moreover, statistics taken concerning 305 churches in thirty-five cities, revealed the fact that the age of fifteen years was over all others, and that easily, as the age at which males joined the church.

The rest of the session was given over to the hearing of a number of five-minute talks from men actively interested in the problem of the American boy. All the speakers had something interesting to say on various phases of the problem. Dr. Phillips urged that it was the duty of every worker who attempted work with a boy to strive above all else to get the best out of him. Boys were restive—they could never be still; they were acquisitive — they were forever annexing things; they were inquisitive—always wanting to know things, and they were imitative —for good or bad—ever following the example of their elders. To meet and properly, or at least partially, satisfy the boy nature that was so prompted, was the problem for those of the Movement who had laid this particular work upon their hearts.

Mr. Mornay Williams asked what the Christian church intended to do about the boy in the street? He was the survival of the appalling mortality of the slums—the unit, who from one reason or another had refused to succumb to forces which had carried off others. "I know exactly what I'm talking about," said Mr. Williams, "as the head of one of the largest Protestant institutions for boys in this country, through which more than forty thousand have passed. I, at least, ought to know. And I say this—the Christian Church is doing nothing, practically, for this boy of the street. And here, at this Congress, I fling out the challenge."

A pertinent point was made by one of the speakers relating the following story: A boy who had a clever fox-terrier dog, who could do tricks, was one day putting him through his performances when a "grown-up" attempted to get the dog to repeat them to him. He tried, but without success, and the boy, disgusted at his failure, said: "Say, mister, if yer want to get a dog to do stunts and learn tricks, you've gotta know more than the dog?" "It is precisely so with teaching boys," said the delegate, who told the story.

Mass Meeting at Union Square.

Mass meeting for men, Plaza-Union Square. Address, "The Claims of the Christian Religion on the Men of North America," Hon. William Jennings Bryan.

A great crowd gathered, over which the eloquent Nebraskan cast his spell with consummate ease.

"I need not say I am interested in politics, and that I have no intention of reducing my interest in matters of government," said Mr. Bryan. "But I believe that the influence of government on life is small to the influence of religion. Had I been successful in my attempts to obtain high office I would have done what I could to improve the people's condition. But whatever I could have done is insignificant to what each man can do for himself through religion. Much more depends on the ideal which guides a life than the government which directs it. A man's ideals are not a dream. They are the one eminently practical feature of his life.

"Without a definite conception of existence, shaping and molding his life, no one can get very far. And how can any man conceive a plan of existence without seeing back of creation a Creator. Our first duty is to understand God's plan and to live up to it. The sense of personal responsibility to God is the greatest force entering a man's life. Take that sense of responsibility to God away from a man and there is nothing left, except the fear of punishment to keep him from committing wrongdoing. Thus our religion begins with God as a foundation. And the second step in religion is a belief in the Bible as the inspired word of God.

"There is at least one thing which makes me sure that the Christian religion is the most perfect religion, and that is that it is essentially a religion which you can teach to children, and religion not worth teaching to a man is not worth teaching to a child. You can't get a child to believe merely in a Man Christ. The only Christ which a child wants to believe in is a Son of God. A child's God must be infinite in intelligence, power and love. And that is the kind of God for me, too."

Sixth Session—Life in Australia Problem.

Address by John Mitchell, former president of the Coal Miners' Union, on "The Church in Relation to the Industrial Problem." Address by Professor Edward Steiner, Grinnell, Iowa; subject, "The Church in Relation to the Immigrant." In the course of his remarks, Mr. Mitchell said "the church should support labor in its attempt to obtain wages adequate to permit the working classes to live on a scale which is up to American standards. The laboring classes also want the church to help them obtain sufficient leisure for the enjoyment of home life and the fruits of education and culture. More than one hundred American laborers are carried back dead to their homes every day in the year. Labor wants the church's aid in relieving the unsafe conditions in which the laborers live and work. It ought not to be necessary for 150 girls to be burned to death in a factory to secure the enactment of laws for the safety of laborers."

Evangelization.

Rev. John Timothy Stone, D.D., pastor Fourth Presbyterian Church, Chicago, Chairman of the Commission, in presenting the report said that every activity of the Men and Religion Forward Movement related primarily to evangelism. A man may be gained to social service, but if his heart remain alien to Jesus Christ his social service will be superficial. Advertising will not take the place of a flesh and blood touch with the community and the question for every member of that Congress to make his own was this —what does he propose to do when home again, away from the glamour of these great meetings, and how utilize the present resources of his local church? Success will come when Christian men pulled off their coats and went at it. His advice to the delegates was that if each would go right home at the conclusion of that Congress and win a big strong man for Jesus Christ they would go a good way toward solving the problem of evangelizing the people of this land.

Dr. John Balcom Shaw, Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago, said: "We sometimes hear that the reason for the lack of the revival spirit is that the church was too secular, and, perhaps, there is something in the charge—that we, as members of it, do not throb with a great passion for souls, and maybe that is true. But our great, our outstanding lack is that of a live Bible evangelism. Revivals come not by human agencies, nor are men, to any extent, permanently won for Christ by hypnotic personality. The men who win souls are men steeped in the Bible spirit.

Charles Stelzle said: "I believe in evangelism. I have delivered a great many more addresses on evangelism than on social service. But as everybody knows, just now I am emphasizing the latter. And my word in this discussion is this: Let those of you who are immediately concerned with the specifically evangelistic aspect of Christ's kngdom go about it as if you were in earnest—with the whole-heartedness of the New York East Side Socialist. Fling yourselves into the battle with assurance and fervor, and men will begin to believe in your job."

James G. Cannon, Chairman of the Committee of Ninety-seven, suggested that the business men of Christ's kingdom should at once start a plan of what he called religious conversation. Lots of earnest men could not preach to save their lives, but into their stores and offices every day men came affording an opportunity for a man of grit to say a good word for Jesus Christ. He recommended the adoption of this plan to every business member of that Congress.

The Rural Church.

To Henry Wallace, of Des Moines, editor of Wallace's Farm Journal, was allotted the duty of presenting the Rural Church theme. Mr. Wallace gave a masterly resumé of the rural problem, in its almost every aspect. He complained that, as a rule, country pulpits were filled with lads just out of school anxious to ventilate their particular theological views and schools controlled by town misses who were just filling up what time must elapse between a formal engagement to be married and its consummation. He complained that as a rule ministers lacked the power to present the gospel in terms of farm life.

A Visit to the Congo

Secretary Stephen J. Corey will start about May 15, on a brief visit to the mission stations of the Foreign Society on the Congo, Africa. Almost fifteen years the Society has been conducting a growing work in that field, one of the darkest spots in all the world. No representative of the Society has ever visited this field, although repeatedly requested to do so by the missionaries.

Mr. Corey is peculiarly fitted for the important mission. Not only is he in close touch with the workers, but his growing interest in the world-field, his clear insight and uniform good judgment and his wide missionary information, all combine to make him eminently fitted for the task. He will hearten the overworked men and women who stand under the heavy burden of responsibility they are carrying.

The visit will mark a new era, not only on the Congo, but in the life of our churches at home. It will never be forgotten, either by the missionaries or by more than 2,000 native Christians who so faithfully exhibit the Apostolic teaching and spirit in their new life and boundless evangelistic enthusiasm. They will shower upon him their richest benedictions and send back to our people at home a message that will thrill and inspire us for years to come.

Mr. Corey is justly recognized as one of the wisest and most useful missionary leaders among our people and is regarded as an authority in any mission council.

We are sure the friends will follow him on his hard journey with good wishes and earnest prayers for a prosperous and useful trip and a safe return. He will reach America in good time for the National Convention at Louisville October next. His fresh message will stir all hearts.

A. McLean, Pres.
F. M. Rains, Secy.

Why Amundsen Got There

To my mind he had one great advantage over the Scott expedition. His tractive power was dogs. His experience with them in the South proved their effectiveness as my experience did in the North. Captain Scott's equipment includes twenty ponies and thirty dogs, and one or two ice automobiles, giving him with his men four different kinds of tractive power for dragging his sledges. But the number of his dogs is comparatively few. Captain Amundsen lost thirty-six of his, or six more than Captain Scott took. The British seem to have put their main reliance on their ponies and motors, and in this, while I may be mistaken, I feel both on general principles and from a study of Shackelton's experiences, that they may be handicapped.—Rear Admiral Peary in World's Work.

At Mount Vernon

By J. A. Adams

At ten o'clock in the morning an interurban car standing near the Treasury Building in Washington fills up quickly with a company of people who wear an expectant look on their faces. They are going to Mount Vernon, and with every one of them the visit has been a dream of years. The car glides swiftly down the streets, past the Washington Monument, the new Agricultural Building, the government printing plant, and the site where many workmen are laying the foundation for the new printing building which is to cover acres of ground, and to be the greatest plant of the kind in the world. Then there is a dash over the Potomac bridge, and just then the conductor begins to break out in eruptions of information, historical, classical and sometimes romantic. He tells us that the big white house on the hill up the river is where Robert E. Lee lived, and that the marble slabs are in the famous Arlington cemetery where Union soldiers sleep in their "windowless palaces of rest, careless alike of sunshine and storm"—I don't mean that the conductor said all this, for it was that man of amazing eloquence, Colonel Ingersoll, who coined the beautiful phrase.

Next he tells us where Washington crossed a creek, and that was the biggest thing that ever happened to the creek, it probably was so swollen with pride over it that it stayed out of its banks a week. Then we rushed down into Alexandria, where Washington attended church, and where Colonel Ellsworth was killed at the beginning of the Civil War—poor Ellsworth! how soon it was all over with him! It also was to Alexandria that Mrs. Washington brought eggs and butter to town and traded them for a gingham dress, half a pound of snuff and powder for George's hair—or am I mistaken about this?

South View of Mansion,
Mount Vernon, Va.
Home of George Washington.

A mile or so further on and the man in uniform exclaims in ringing tones of eloquence, "We are now entering the old Washington plantation." There were 7,000 acres in it, and the general had firewood to burn. There were great orchards, and many stumps, any one of which might have been the remains of the famous tree which little George did to death with his hatchet.

Arrive at the House.

Fifty minutes after leaving the capital, the car wheels up to a little station, with a restaurant-curio-shop-post-office attachment. We are at Mount Vernon—no, not quite, there is a half dollar per between us and the famous home. We pass large green-houses and gardens surrounded by brick walls, and then we are at the house. The front door is at the back, because that is where the coaches wheeled up and negro drivers landed aristocratic visitors, or where Sambo cracked his whip over the four horses, after the general and "Lady" Washington had stepped into the queer old vehicle. It still stands in the barn, and compared with a present day automobile it looks like the creation of a lunatic in the wild ages, but the man who rode in it got there all the same. I can easily imagine how the dusky driver made the roads rattle when he went dashing away toward Alexandria.

The old knocker is at the door just as it was a century and a quarter ago, and one almost takes off his hat to it when he thinks of the famous men who handled it in past days. But the real front of the house, the great portico looking out upon the river, what a view is there! The Potomac stretching and broadening toward the sea, and on the other side winding between woodlands and fields toward the capital. It is remarkably beautiful, a something which you want to have linger long in memory, so that you can turn your mind back to it and look and look again.

The contents of the house, which has two full stories and attic rooms, are understood to appear about as they did when the curtain went down more than a hundred years ago. How much self-repression my traveling companion had to exercise not to try to buy some of them for antiques I cannot undertake to say, but I think it put a heavy strain upon her. The rooms are not large, nor does the furniture show extravagant expenditure. There is as much simplicity as could be expected of a family so aristocratic as the Washingtons, and so rich, too.

Washington's Sword.

The sword which Washington handed to the Continental Congress when he had subdued the enemy and made the country independent is in a glass case set against a wall of the lower hall. As a sword it is not great, but as a symbol it is one of the most significant things in all the struggle of the human race for freedom. Washington knew when to quit as commander-in-chief, and, as president, when to hand back to the people the power which they had given him or which emergencies had placed in his hands. That was greatness, and the more so in him because he was a born aristocrat for generations back. The man whose ancestors would not join Cromwell's army or cause could easily have slid into a purpose to make himself perpetual. Cromwell himself fell into the temptation. But Washington stood, and that was why Byron said that nature broke the die when it produced the great American.

The spot selected as the final resting place under the direction of Washington's will does not strike a visitor favorably. It is away from the river bank, under a hill, and close to a wild tanglewood of trees and brush. The vault or tomb appears as shown in the picture. Through the iron grating are seen two stone sarcophagi which contain the sacred dust of the great dead; and in the back part of the vault, in another chamber, are the remains of different members of the Washington and Custis families, which were taken from their graves and deposited here. When the iron door to this chamber was locked it is said that the key was thrown into the Potomac river. Near the front stand two or three marble monuments which mark the graves of later Washingtons.

TOMB OF WASHINGTON, MT. VERNON.

About the Cherry Tree.

The stable, which was built in 1737, is in a good state of preservation, and there are a number of outhouses. The old kitchen is detached from the house. It was the last place at the historic homestead which we visited, and here I experienced some alarm. My sightseeing partner reached it in advance, and when I entered she was engaged in earnest conversation with the woman in charge. I feared that she was trying to buy a lot of things for antiques, and as I did not have much money with me, and did not want to have to walk back to the city, especially if I had to carry pots and kettles, the situation seemed critical. But by asking the woman if she could show me the stump of the cherry tree which could not tell a lie, I got her attention distracted, and the spell broken up, and the course of interest turned into another channel. She said that the stump was not there, that the famous episode occurred down in Westmoreland county, where the Washingtons then lived. This helped to clear up what has always seemed peculiar, namely, that a boy who lived less than twenty miles from where Washington now stands could not tell a lie.

Nothing But a Fire-place.

It was Lawrence Washington, George's older brother, who established the home on the Potomac, and named it after Admiral Vernon, under whom he was a pet officer. The brother died young and left the big estate to George. Then he married a rich wife; they had 12 slaves between them, and made money. But I felt sorry for the family when I was in the old kitchen and found that they did not have a cook stove, nothing but an open fireplace, with spits and big iron ovens. And yet I could easily think that they must have lived well when I thought of the deer and other wild game which were brought in from the surrounding forests, of the shad caught in the river, and the canvasback ducks shot in the neighboring marshes. The family did not go hungry because they did not have a gas range, that is certain. The place looks very homelike, and I venture to say that the slaves enjoyed life under Marse George, and when he died he set them all free because he did not believe in slavery and could not trust the man to whom they might be sold. No doubt being owned by George Washington was better than being owned by themselves.

Owner Not Much at Home.

But how much did Washington himself enjoy this beautiful place, with its great fields and forests in the rear, and its long verandah in front, where cooling breezes from the river made the long summer evenings a joy? He was nearly all the time somewhere else, out in the wild woods surveying, or across the mountains with Braddock getting horses shot from under him, and his coat perforated with bullets, or away in the revolutionary struggle, shivering through cold winters and shuddering when he saw his barefooted men marking the snow with blood. Only once during that long eight years of war was he back at Mount Vernon. And then for eight years more he was away as president. For two little years and a half he was permitted to live undisturbed at the home on the Potomac, and then that cold, cruel rain of a December day sounded the death knell.

For a rich man, a quiet man, and a home-loving man, George Washington surely had his full share of privation. He would take no pay for his services in the long war—other men take pay as long as they live, and when Virginia voted him shares in the James River and Potomac canals, which he had planned, he turned them over to a college. He lived for his country and his kind. The thoughtfulness for others expressed in his dying words sets forth his life: "I feel myself going; I thank you for your attention, but I pray you to take no more trouble about me."

A Depressing Atmosphere.

To my surprise the visit to Mount Vernon produced a depressing impression. The place is too tomb-like, the shadow of death too much upon it. With unusual advantages for comfortable, joyous life, it is silent empty, cheerless. The contrast between the beautiful externals and the spirit of gloom which pervades the place is painful. In some old castle or deserted palace of Europe we expect to find the imprint of death rather than life. But on the sunny banks of the Potomac and on a great estate where grass and flowers mingle and birds sing in the trees, we do not like to have every human thing remind us only of the grim reaper and his scythe of time.

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS."

Copyright 1911, George H. Doran Co.

CHAPTER IV.

It was ten o'clock at night when Walter finally went out of the shop and up to his room. He did not turn on the light at once, but went over by his table and sat down.

The temptation he still faced had assumed alluring shapes. In the first place, he was saying to himself, "Bauer's drawings differ only a trifle from my own and I had practically gone as far as he, only one or two points were suggested to me by his diagram of the electrodes resting at an angle on the porcelain plate. The cutting of the teeth in the soft metal was also suggested by him. But I had thought out other points that were essential."

Then, again, Walter kept going over the great advantage it would be to him if this discovery were made by him first. He knew that the commercial value of any real improvement in city lighting was very large. There was money for him in this discovery. And Walter was growing more and more restless over his stewardship and the burdens it involved. He hated the drudgery and the time it took, and of late he began to feel quite certain that the same attitude displayed in other schools was creeping into Burrton, an attitude of contempt for the working student, nothing very pronounced, but enough to make him feel disagreeable and annoyed, for he was a finnicky youth, sensitive to a great degree and with the taste of an aristocrat at heart.

"I don't see that I do Bauer any harm if I go ahead and make a model. I'll do that anyhow," he said out loud at last, as he got up and turned on his light. And then he saw under the edge of his door a note which had been slipped in there.

He went over, picked it up, opened it, and found it was a note from Bauer.

"My Dear Douglas:—Within an hour after leaving the shop tonight I had a telegram calling me home. I do not know how soon I shall be able to return to Burrton, if at all. Will you kindly see if I left any of my apparatus or papers on my table and return them to my locker? I enclose the key with this note. Thank you.

"Felix Bauer."

So Bauer was going to be away indefinitely. He might not come back at all. He had not given any reason for the call to come home, but Walter remembered one remark the German student had made one day which led him to believe that Bauer's home life was unhappy and the relations between his father and mother were unpleasant. Suppose he never came back. Suppose he never finished his investigation of the lamp? Suppose—there was a number of possibilities to suppose. Why, then the field would be open to him and he could go ahead with a clear conscience. But could he? In spite of all sophistry and special pleading with himself Walter knew he had caught the idea of the electrodes from Bauer's drawing, which suggested the secret. How did he know but that Bauer had discovered it as indicated in his own diagram and was making that preliminary to the finished lamp?

There was one honest and plain way out for Walter. He could write to Bauer and frankly tell him that he had seen his drawings and had received from them a hint for the discovery and ask him if he were willing to share with him, Walter, in the result if the lamp proved worth while financially. But here was Walter's weak point. He was proud of his technical knowledge. Already it was conceded by all the students in the electrical engineering department that Douglas of Milton was the star. The instructors had given him special notice. He had already made one or two very valuable and original contributions to the problems that faced the shop every day. But nothing he had so far done would begin to compare with this new arc light. The thought of sharing his discovery with anyone else touched his pride in its most sensitive and personal spot.

He threshed it all over back and forth and when he finally went to bed he was still undecided as to his course. The fact is, he could not escape all the time the standard he had been trained in at home. If Paul and Esther had done nothing else for their children they certainly had done this, they had implanted in their minds a deep and strong feeling that one of the things to be most desired in life is honesty; clean, frank, wholesome honesty, free from cant and hyprocrisy and double dealing. And Walter knew in his heart that what he was going to do was not honest to Bauer, even after he had juggled with his conscience and proved to himself that Bauer had no real rights in the matter. He knew perfectly well that the German student did have rights of prior discovery. No amount of argument or defense of his own discoveries could remove that fact.

Nevertheless, next day in the shop after he had put Bauer's belongings, including the paper with the drawings, into Bauer's locker, Walter found himself working with nervous haste over his model. It went together with wonderful exactness and in spite of his feeling that he was acting the part of a miserable cheat, he was, at least, during a part of the time, in a glow of enthusiasm. For the most part he worked at night, when he was least liable to watching from the other fellows. There were several reasons why he could do this, among them an unusual interest in the school at that time in evening functions which drew most of the shop workers out.

Walter took parts of his model up to his room each night and studied them. At the end of two weeks he had completed the lamp and it remained only to give it an actual test. No word had been received from Bauer, and inquiry from different professors had failed to discover any news from him. It seemed to Walter almost certain that Bauer would not return, and each day of his absence gave Walter less uneasiness, if not actual dulling of the keen edge of his conscience.

The day before he planned to test his lamp at the shop, Walter received another letter from his mother, one part of which annoyed him greatly. His mother wrote chiding him good naturedly for not sending his usual weekly letter. Walter had failed to write home, for the first time since coming to Burrton. He could not account for this failure except on the ground that he was too busy.

But his mother wrote without any knowledge of all this, telling him bits of news that she thought he would most want to know.

"Your father has been asked by the Citizens' Committee, to let his name go on the primaries for senator from the Fifth district. I have my doubts about the wisdom of a newspaper editor going into politics, but your father, while he had some hesitation, has finally agreed to let his name go down. So now we can expect lively times in the Douglas family until after election next fall.

"Helen has two more beaux, one of them ten years older than herself. I am not making fun of this, as you know, for I have tried to teach you all that the love part of life is in some ways the most serious as well as the most happy of all your experiences. Helen has good sense when it comes to a final decision on anything. I am not afraid of her.

"Louis is better than he has been for a long time. His eyes are stronger and his headaches have almost ceased. He seems to enjoy his studies this term and is making progress. We all feel pleased of course. Louis has had an offer from his uncle to go into the store, but your father and I would much prefer to keep him in school if his health will allow. We are ambitious for all of you and want you to have an education and do in the world what you are best fitted to do.

"We want you to come home for Christmas. And from the different bits you have written about your German friend Bauer we have been wondering if he could not come with you. I understand from one of your letters that he is rather a lonesome fellow, without many friends. If he is not going to his own home at Christmas time, give him a good, strong invitation from father and me to come with you. You know we have never been seperated at the holiday season, and it will be my treat to pay your expenses home this time unless you make a new arc light and get it patented and make a lot of money out of it. We are all interested in the light and speak of it almost every day. Your father was saying this morning that our street lights are a disgrace to Milton. There is a citizens' war going on at present over the situation and every number of the News contains letters from angry taxpayers calling the city government to account for the wretched nature of the street lighting. If you should happen to discover an economical and satisfactory city lamp, the people of Milton would be ready now to compel the council to purchase and install it. Of course this all sounds rather like a story, but stranger things have happened in the history of inventions. And if you should happen to be the fortunate discoverer, we would be very proud and happy.

"Don't forget to make the invitation to

(Continued on page 23.)

The Discovery Of Saul

By William E. Barton

When the people of Israel wanted a king, they sought him, and found him hidden among the stuff. That is the time-honored place for a candidate to hide. There is where the people are supposed to hunt for him.

When a young man enters the ministry, he is expected to go, and ought to go, to some very small and humble field, and wait to be promoted.

A theological student once asked his professor, "How are we to find the fields to which the Lord calls us?"

The answer was, "Take the first field that offers itself, and make yourself so conspicuously useful that some larger field will call you by the time you ought to move."

The emphasis of this advice has sometimes been held to be on the word "conspicuously."

At any rate, it is altogether too possible for some really good men to be hidden in obscure places.

I wonder whether, before Saul hid among the stuff, then hinted to two or three discreet brethren that he could be found there if an urgent call was offered him.

Some one appears to have known where to look. If that man were now alive, he could obtain employment. We need a good stuff-searcher. There are Sauls in hiding, and some of them are getting a trifle anxious to be discovered. And I don't wonder.

"Could Not Be Hid."

Several years ago a New York minister preached a sermon from the text, "He could not be hid." He declared that such goodness as was resident in Jesus Christ could not permanently be concealed. He believed that truth once made known to men would be seen to be so inherently desirable that men would never thereafter lose sight of it. He held that the demand for real excellence is so great that the supply has but to be produced, and the world will become a consumer of it. He showed that whatever of good once gets into life becomes a permanent asset of humanity.

There is much to be said in favor of such a doctrine, and the sermon was so well liked that this same minister repeated it later before a great assembly at Chautauqua.

A Famous Sentence.

The sermon contained one sentence which has afforded a test of some aspects of the teaching of the sermon itself. Here is the sentence:

"If you write a better book, or preach a better sermon, or build a better mouse-trap than your neighbor, though you build your house in the woods, the world will make a beaten path to your door."

The sermon in which this sentence occurred was doubtless a better sermon than the average of those preached by the neighbors of Rev. John Paxton on that particular Sunday. Did the world proceed at once to wear a path to the door of his church?

It did not.

Path to Wrong Door.

He continued his able and efficient and successful ministry and did good. But so far as is known, the West Presbyterian Church in New York did not find it necessary to renew the pavement on account of the crowds that came seeking the author of that fine sentence.

They wore a path to Emerson's door.

Emerson was dead by that time.

Probably a thousand orators, great and small, quoted the sentence and attributed it to Emerson.

Comparatively few people read Emerson, but most people like to quote him, and now and then some one who quotes him looks through his essays to see from which one a quotation is made. So it may have been the thousandth orator who quoted it, saying:

"As Emerson has so well said, 'If you write a better book, or preach a better sermon, or build a better mouse-trap than your neighbor, though you build your house in the woods, the world will make a beaten path to your door,'" to whom it occurred to look the matter up. And he searched through the essays of Emerson and could not find it.

Dr. Edward Emerson replied, in answer to questions, that it sounded like his father, but he could not find it in his writings.

Fooled Again.

Then the world made a beaten path to Elbert Hubbard's door. That represents the range of some people's literary imagination—if Emerson did not say it, Elbert Hubbard did. Elbert Hubbard has said a good many things that Emerson never said, nor would have said. But when the world beat a path to Elbert Hubbard's door, and asked him if he wrote that verse, he blushed modestly and admitted that it was his. He said he evolved it out of his "cosmic consciousness." He sometimes gets things in that way.

So we see that Dr. Paxton's fine sentence intended to illustrate the theory that the world will surely discover the author of a really good thing came very near to showing that sometimes it does not happen so. The world sometimes beats two paths, one to the grave of a dead man, and the other to the shop of a skillful advertiser, while the real author, though he live and preach in the heart of a crowded city with a main thoroughfare passing his door, might as well take to the woods so far as the honor due him is concerned.

Advertise!!

In fact, Dr. Paxton was only partly right. If you write a better book than your neighbor, you must put it in the hands of a hustling publisher; and his ability to put it in the list of the six best sellers is by no means proof that it is one of the six best books. If you preach a better sermon than your neighbor you must advertise special music to accompany it, or you will miss some faces you had hoped to see in the congregation. If you build a better mouse-trap than your neighbor, you must buy pages in the advertising section of the magazines to let the world know of your invention, or the mouse-traps will accumulate on your hands, and the mice will multiply in the homes of your customers.

Find Hidden Good Men.

The time has not come, and I suspect it will never come, when the demand for goodness will so far exceed the supply that we can afford to stop pushing it. We cannot trust the world to go in pursuit of hidden goodness. We cannot leave the good to go forward to its destination on the momentum it has gained in the past. Goodness is advertised by its loving friends. And it needs the advertising.

What appears to be needed is a few trail-blazers. The world will follow a path when once it is made, but some one needs to make it.

Let it be known that a certain hitherto unknown young minister is being considered by a prominent church, and the church committees make a beaten path to his door. But meantime grass is growing in some of the paths that ought to be open. There are undiscovered good men in humble places who have earned a promotion. Find them, and help them to places of larger usefulness.

Dr. Pearsons' Sayings

The late Dr. D. K. Pearsons who gave away a fortune of six million dollars and left an estate consisting of a diamond shirt stud and his wearing apparel was almost as famous for his original sayings as his generous deeds. Following are samples of his wisdom:

"Hustle—that is what makes men. It is not pampering them. Take two dogs that are brothers, and put one in a rich man's family, where he has a soft cushion to lie on, and is fed highly seasoned food. That dog grows up a great big lumber-headed dog with a cirrhotic liver. The other dog is given to a poor boy over in Podunk. There are a lot of boys in the family, and every boy gives the dog a kick. That dog grows up a splendid dog, with good muscle and a good eye, and is able to take care of himself. Now bring him alongside of his brother raised in luxury, and he will lick him. That dog raised in Podunk can lick a dozen dogs like his brother. The pampered dog is good for nothing, while the dog that had to fight for an existence is a splendid specimen.

"Just so it is with boys. Put two boys in equally different environments, and one will turn out smart, for he has had to hustle; while the other, if he is fed well and coddled, may be a good-natured fellow, but that is about all."

"I used to deny that I was a philanthropist. I was accustomed to say that I had no benevolence in me. But if philanthropy means loving one's fellow-men, then perhaps I am entitled to the term. But I still maintain that if I had chosen my course with a simple view to selfish pleasure, I could not have chosen better than I did, for these twenty-two years have been years of constant joy. I had a good time making my money, but have had a better time spending it."

"I should like to give a word of advice also to prosperous men. Do not put off your benefactions till you are too old to enjoy them. Do not leave your money to people to quarrel over. Do not shorten your lives by extravagances. Find some good thing which ought to be done, and begin to do it."

A man went to an insurance office to have his life insured the other day. "Do you cycle?" the insurance agent asked. "No," said the man. "Do you motor?" "No, no," said the applicant, laughing. "No." Do you then perhaps, fly?" "I have no dangerous"— But the agent interrupted him curtly. "Sorry, sir," he said, "but we no longer insure pedestrians."—Argonaut.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

Elmira J. Dickinson.

One of the saintly women of our church, Elmira J. Dickinson, entered into life eternal at the beautiful Easter season. Like that other great and good woman, Clara Barton, who was also called to her rest and reward at that time, she had passed her four score years. From a child, she chose the better part; she confessed her faith in her Saviour when she was fourteen years old, and continued steadfastly in his service to the close of her long and honorable life. Invincible courage and invincible modesty were shining characteristics in all her work.

She was a pioneer among the Disciples of Christ in the cause of the higher education of women. She received the degree of Master of Arts from Eureka College in 1869 and served that institution both as teacher and trustee. She was one of that small and choice company of women in our church who first received the anointing of the missionary spirit. While yet a young woman, before there was any agency among us for foreign work, she dedicated her life to the cause of missions. She applied to the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society to send her to India, but they could only send members of the Baptist Church. She then wrote to the Woman's Union Missionary Society, whose jubilee we celebrated last year, asking for work on the foreign field, but it had assumed obligations which absorbed all its income for several years. She was doubtless the first woman volunteer for missions among the Disciples of Christ, and often spoke of her failure to go to the foreign field as the great disappointment of her life.

As this door of service was closed to her, she devoted all her energies to promoting the cause of missions among the women at home. From 1868 to 1874, all the large Protestant churches were organizing Women's Boards of Missions, and she was one of the leaders in starting the work in her own church. She was a schoolmate and lifelong friend of Mrs. C. N. Pearre, and was her faithful fellow worker in organizing the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. She followed the true scriptural order in her work; in July, 1874, she began at her Jerusalem and organized a Woman's Missionary Society in her home church. The following September, at the Illinois State Convention, she called the women of the state together and was the leading spirit in forming the Illinois Woman's Missionary Society, and became its first president. The next month, October, 1874, she went to the National Convention at Cincinnati, and with Mrs. Pearre, helped to launch the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. She was well posted in the missionary movement among the women of other churches, and the literature they issued, and so was firmly equipped to render invaluable assistance in preparing the constitution of the new society.

She was the first organizer and field worker of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and suffered hardships and conquered difficulties in her work, that would have daunted a less steadfast soul. In those early days, women were expected to keep silent in the churches—few, even, had ever lifted their voices in audible prayer—and she endured both censure and ridicule; not only churches, but the doors of Christian homes were closed to this brave pioneer. She received no compensation for her services, and paid her own traveling expenses, as far as she was able. At the National Headquarters, she was held in highest esteem, and was often called in for consultation in the settlement of delicate and perplexing problems.

Her spirit was as humble and self-effacing as it was courageous and steadfast; she claimed nothing for herself, and was ever generous in giving credit to others. When the centennial secretary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions began her four years' campaign, one of her first letters was to this noble woman, asking that one of the centennial mission might be called in her honor. In her reply, Miss Dickinson expressed the utmost appreciation of the request, but said she had never done anything to entitle her to such distinction, and refused to permit her name to be used. This rare combination of strength and humility lent something of unique heroism and singleness of purpose to her character. Happy is the movement with such founders as Mrs. Pearre and Miss Dickinson!—their high courage, their unshaken convictions of the righteousness of their cause, and their willingness to lose themselves in their work, has been a benediction and an inspiration to the hosts of women who have followed them. May we ever hold fast to the high ideals they have bequeathed to us! I. W. H.

Miss Julia C. Lathrop

President Taft has appointed Miss Julia C. Lathrop as head of the newly established Children's Bureau—the first woman to be placed in charge of one of the National Departments of our government. Jane Addams, Julia Lathrop, Mary McDowell, and Dr. Cornelia De Bey are the quartette of unmarried women who have been affectionately described as "Chicago's four maiden aunts," because of their valuable public services. All of them are suffragists.

Miss Lathrop has been a fellow-worker with Jane Addams for many years, and was one of the earliest residents at Hull House. She is amply equipped for her new work; she is a graduate of Vassar College, and a member of its Board of Trustees. She and Mrs. Flower had much to do in establishing the Juvenile Court in Chicago; they defrayed the expense of probation officers and a detention home for some time, and Miss Lathrop was chairman of the Juvenile Court Committee before Cook county assumed the work.

For twelve years she was a member of the Illinois Board of Charities, and rendered efficient service. She visited every county poorhouse in the state, and in each county organized a committee of leading citizens to improve conditions, and turn the light of publicity on abuses. She is vice-president of the Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy, of which Graham Taylor is president. The care of the insane appeals thropy, of which Graham Taylor is pres- for a number of attendants from Illinois Insane Asylum to come to Chicago for a special course in the care of their unfortunate charge. This course was found to be so valuable, that many came from other states to take advantage of it. While her labors have been so great and so varied, she has always been an unpaid worker, as she is financially independent.

Miss Lathrop was the choice of the group of philanthropic workers who have been promoting the establishment of a Children's Bureau, but they were afraid when they presented her name to President Taft that he would not consider it, because she was a woman; to their surprise and pleasure, he welcomed the suggestion, and promptly made the appointment. Miss Lathrop's fine record, and her large experience in general charitable work, as well as in work for children, makes the selection for this responsible position a cause of great rejoicing to all who have the interests of childhood at heart. I. W. H.

A Chivalrous Crusader.

William T. Stead, who went down with the Titanic, had often shown his chivalrous regard for women, but his most remarkable achievement was in raising the age of protection for girls. An interesting account of this is given in the Memoirs of Mrs. Catherine Booth, "the Mother of the Salvation Army."

Mrs. Bramwell Booth learned in her rescue work most distressing facts about crimes against girl children of tender age. She told her husband. He was incredulous, but upon investigation was convinced. The newspapers were in a "conspiracy of silence." The Booths took the facts to Wm. T. Stead, then editor of the Pall Mall Gazette. He, too, was incredulous at first, but consented to investigate, and found that the half had not been told him. The Pall Mall Gazette in 1885 devoted three issues to an exposure of the matter. It raised a great commotion. Profligacy put on the mask of prudery, and denounced Stead for printing such improprieties. The morning after the first special issue appeared, the street in front of the Pall Mall Gazette office was filled with a seething mob of roughly-dressed people from the poor quarters of London. The government sent no police; they would have been glad to see the office wrecked. But the crimes exposed by the paper had been crimes against the children of the poor, and the mob had risen in sympathy with Stead. His office was safer in the midst of that terrible crowd than if it had been surrounded by a regiment of the Guards. As soon as this fact was ascertained, the police appeared as if by magic, and cleared the streets.

Public indignation over the disclosures was intense, and the bill raising the age of protection from 13 years to 16 was put through Parliament with speed. But the government was determined to punish Stead. He had declared that little girls could be bought for $25 or less, and, to prove it, he had bought one, ostensibly for evil purposes, and had handed her over to the Salvation Army instead. The many real criminals whom the investigation had exposed were left undisturbed, but Mr. Stead and Bramwell Booth were prosecuted for abduction, and Mr. Stead was sent to prison for three months. There was a great procession to demand his release, and Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell marched in it, behind two girls in Salvation Army bonnets. She called him "the bravest man in England."

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Auburn church has secured S. R. Lewis, formerly of Harvel, to become its pastor.

A revival meeting is being held at Mulberry Grove by W. O. Livingstone, pastor of Kankakee Church.

A short revival meeting was held at Beech Bluff by the pastor, W. H. Keen, in which there were four additions by confession.

On the last visit of L. B. Pickerill to the church at Walnut Grove, there were five additions, all but one being on confession of faith.

Ipava church, where C. W. Cummings is pastor, made an offering of more than one hundred dollars for foreign missions, which doubled the amount of its apportionment.

Allen T. Shaw, of Macomb Church, delivered the annual address the last Sunday in April to the Odd Fellows and the Daughters of Rebecca. This church is being led by the Fife Brothers Evangelistic Company in a revival meeting.

The wife of Pastor R. L. Cartwright of Greenview, submitted recently to a severe surgical operation in a Jacksonville hospital. The friends of the family will be interested to learn that convalescence was progressing satisfactorily at last report.

A new building is proposed at West Salem and the canvass for funds has already been initiated. It is anticipated by the pastor, G. W. Ford, and by the members of the congregation, that no time will be lost in bringing the enterprise to a speedy consummation.

O. C. Bolman, pastor of Pekin Church, received six additions to the church the first two Sundays in April. All of these were by baptism. Mr. Bolman is now in a meeting at Lily, with Leroy F. Sargent, whom he ordained to the ministry about a month ago.

The revival meeting at Third Church, Danville, where S. S. Jones ministers, is interesting large congregations of people as well as securing a large company of additions. On a recent Sunday there were twenty-eight additions, with a total number of well above fifty. Roy L. Brown is the evangelist.

A. C. Smither, managing editor of The Christian Evangelist, conducted services at First Church, Springfield, in the absence of the pastor, to the delight and profit of the congregation. Mr. Smither's duties in connection with the Board of Publication, do not require all of his Sundays. His ministry on the Lord's day will be a blessing to any church where he may be called.

The revival meeting at Joppa, conducted by Evangelists James Sharratt and daughter, had resulted in twenty-one additions, all but five of these being on profession of faith. It was anticipated the meeting would be concluded about the last of the month and be followed with a revival meeting at Brookport.

W. B. Clemmer is declaring the gospel to an increasing congregation at Rockford, and the church's activities are being constantly improved. At the Easter service a self-denial offering of more than one hundred dollars was received. The campaign for subscriptions on the new church building is advancing, and requires only three thousand dollars more until results are assured.

E. W. Allen, the new pastor of Central Church, Decatur, spoke at a mass meeting for men at Bement, where D. H. Lovejoy is pastor. On the same afternoon, Mrs. Catherine Lindsay of Springfield, addressed a similar meeting for women. The services were held in connection with a union revival meeting, which was concluded on that day, with a sermon by the pastor of the church of the Disciples. This pastor's fraternal relationship with the other ministers of the town was recognized recently by a gift from the Ministerial Association, presented on the event of Mr. Lovejoy's birthday. The congregation of which he is pastor, made an offering of fifty dollars for foreign missions, which was one hundred per cent above its apportionment.

First Church, Decatur, where E. M. Smith preaches, was recently made the recipient of a handsome subscription of ten thousand dollars toward a new church fund, by an individual outside the congregation, whose name is withheld at his own request. It is anticipated that an active campaign to raise an additional twenty-five thousand dollars will be instituted at once, or as soon as committees can be appointed and a plan of campaign prepared. It is proposed that the new church building will occupy the site of the present tabernacle, which is on a piece of ground eighty by one hundred feet. As soon as the requisite amount of subscriptions are in sight, the old building will be torn down to make way for the new one. The church is to be congratulated over this initial subscription, which will undoubtedly furnish an impetus for securing enough to guarantee the successful issue of the building enterprise.

Fourth District Convention.

The Fourth District Convention will be held at Toluca, June 4-5. The C. W. B. M. will hold its sessions in the afternoon and evening of June 4. The following is the program:

Tuesday: Afternoon, June 4.

1:45 Devotions—Led by Mrs. Mary Aljoe, Toluca.
2:00 "The Circle that Holds"—Miss Grace Michael, Pekin.
Open discussion with snap-shots from auxiliaries and circles of the district.
2:30 "Our Campaign for Membership"—Mrs. F. J. Spaulding, Pontiac.
2:40 "The Missionary Training School"—Mrs. Louise Turner, Wenona.
3:00 "The Relation between Junior Supt. and C. W. B. M."—Mrs. J. P. Givens, Lexington.
3:15 "Hidden Answers"—Conducted by State Cor. Secy.
3:45 Reports of Committees and District Secy.

Committee on Watchword and Aim—Mrs. H. H. Jenner, Long Point, (Chairman).

Literature Committee—Miss L. Mabel Snively, Saybrook, (Chairman).

Nominating Committee—Mrs. J. T. Elliff, Pekin, (Chairman).

Tuesday: Evening, June 4.

7:30 Devotions.
7:40 Address—Miss Lura V. Thompson.
8:00 Stereopticon Lecture, "Jacob Kenoly and Negro Work"—Mrs. A. T. Ross, Eureka.

Wednesday: Morning, June 5.

9:00 Praise Service—J. T. Moore, Toluca.
9:15 "Front Rank Churches"—Milo Atkinson, Bloomington.
9:45 General Discussion, led by C. J. Robertson, Heyworth.
10:15 "Front Rank Bible Schools"—C. L. Depew, Jacksonville.
10:45 General Discussion, led by O. McNemar, El Paso.
11:15 Convention Sermon—R. D. Brown, Leroy.
11:45 Appointment of Committees.

Wednesday: Afternoon, June 5.

2:00 Praise Service—C. C. Wisher, Saybrook.
2:15 "The Morning Service"—W. O. Livingstone, Kankakee.
2:30 "State Work"—J. Fred Jones, Field Sec'y., Bloomington.
3:00 Symposium on Christian Union.
(1) "History of Christian Union"—R. B. Doan, Armington.
3:15 (2) "Hindrances to Christian Union"—S. H. Zendt, Bloomington.
3:30 (3) "Union Evangelism"—B. W. Tate, Pontiac.
3:45 (4) "Spirit of Christian Union"—J. P. Givens, Lexington.
4:00 Business Period.

Wednesday: Evening, June 5.

7:30 Praise Service—H. H. Jenner, Long Point.
7:45 "My People"—Geo. Hoagland, Bloomington.
Reports of Committees.
8:00 Address "Not to be Ministered unto but to Minister."—President C. E. Underwood, Eureka.

N. H. Robertson, Stanford, Pres.
L. O. Lehman, Gibson City, Vice-Pres.
O. McNemar, El Paso, Secy.
Mrs. Ethel Johnson, Stanford, Secy. C. W. B. M.

Eureka College

The first part of the student campaign to raise funds for our new gymnasium has come to an end. The amount secured to date is $4,347. This means that during the twenty-five days the students, through their organized effort, raised $3,500. We have met with some severe disappointments in the matter of large gifts; and do not quite know which way to turn in the emergency. But profiting by the experiences of the past four years, we simply move on.

The students have done nobly. If we now can get the friends of the college and the alumni to rally, there isn't any question about the success of the gymnasium proposition. One thing is true, we have no intention of involving ourselves in debt for this purpose. Our pledge reads that the money is due and payable when $25,000 is secured.

H. H. PETERS.

AN EXTRAORDINARY MINISTRY.

The Life and Personality of J. H. Gilliland.

By Edgar Dewitt Jones.

For a quarter of a century J. H. Gilliland lived and labored in Bloomington. He came here a young preacher full of tireless energy. He came consecrated, studious, growing, and such he continued to the last. His career here has never been duplicated by any minister in our communion. I doubt if it has been by anyone, anywhere. For fifteen years, Mr. Gilliland was pastor of the First Church, building the present commodious edifice. Then he organized the Second Church and led them in the building of their handsome structure. Next he organized the Centennial Church and built their beautiful edifice, and at the time of his death, he was leading the Normal Church in a similar enterprise. Throughout such development, Mr. Gilliland's heart was big enough for us all. He rejoiced in the progress of each of these churches. Our joys were his joys. He was our beloved bishop, not of ecclesiastical appointment, but by the common choice of our own hearts. From his great paper of Sunday night, I take the fine sentiment spoken to all four congregations in union meeting assembled:

> "You have one end, you have one Christ, you have one cause, you are one people, you are brethren and sisters in Christ Jesus. Keep the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace and God will bless and prosper you all. This is my prayer for you."

Throughout all these years, besides leading in the building enterprises, Mr. Gilliland was a busy pastor, and a most acceptable preacher. He officiated at many hundreds of weddings and funerals, he preached thousands of sermons, and received into the churches of which he was pastor, about twenty-five hundred people. The high standard he maintained is little short of marvelous. He undertook nothing that he did not do well. He never preached a weak or illy-prepared sermon. He was ever a workman who needed not to be ashamed.

His Strong Mentality.

Mr. Gilliland possessed a strong mentality. He was ever a vigorous thinker, logical and analytical. He was a prodigious reader. He subscribed for and read a long list of the leading periodicals of his own and other denominations, besides publications of a literary, scientific and philosophical and sociological nature. He kept abreast of the times. His paper of a week ago indicates how widely he read, how modern was his view point. Yet withal, how practical and well balanced his ideas and program of Christian work. His magnificent library was a delight to all his book-loving friends. Like their owner, the books that went on those shelves to stay were solid, substantial, worth-while. I knew somewhat Mr. Gilliland's love for books and in a modest way was one with him in some of his appreciations of literature. The day he was stricken, I saw his desk just as he had left it with papers piled as he had placed them and the day after his death, I saw the treasured volumes standing in stately array. The pathos of it all touched my heart.

> "Dead he lay among his books,
> The peace of God was in his looks.
> Ah, his hand will never more
> Turn their storied pages o'er,
> Never more his lips repeat
> Songs of theirs however sweet.
> Let the lifeless body rest,
> He is gone who was its guest,
> Gone as travellers haste to leave
> An inn, nor tarry until eve."

His Power of Heart.

J. H. Gilliland was strong in the affections as well as in intellect. Naturally reserved, at times almost diffident, a chance acquaintance might have thought him cold, and thus misjudged him. His heart was warm, his nature cordial. The company of congenial friends, or better still of his home circle, was needed to bring forth the strong heart power of this man.

It was in his home that he was seen at his best, socially. There he was hospitable, communicative, radiant. I think few public men who have succeeded so signally as J. H. Gilliland have been with their families as much as was he. He disliked to spend a single night elsewhere and never did save when it was absolutely necessary. He loved his wife and daughter, with all the passionate devotion of his strong nature. Beautiful and complete, indeed, was this man's family life.

A Manly Man.

J. H. Gilliland was a manly man. He detested shams. He abhorred can't. He hated hypocrisy. He never attitudinized or strained for effect. His piety was robust and full-blooded but never ostentatious. He lived close to God. In prayer at times, especially upon funeral occasions, he carried the congregation to the very heart of God in petitions of childlike simplicity and tenderness, yet majestic in sentiment and phraseology. Mr. Gilliland ever stood for dignified standards in church work. He loved the great hymns and an order of worship that became the house of God. He seldom, if ever, had time for the light or trivial in Christian work and yet he was not without humor and appreciated real wit.

On Friday night, April 19, Mr. Gilliland was present with us at a service in First Church. His voice was lifted in prayer and he listened with interest to a splendid address by N. S. Haynes. After the meeting was over he chatted and laughed with friends. He seemed in excellent spirits. It was remarked how well he looked, how strong and vigorous. The next day at noon as he was giving final revision to a carefully prepared address on his twenty-five years' experience as a Bloomington pastor, he was suddenly stricken low. For six days, he lingered thus and on Friday evening, the 26th, more suddenly than the first stroke, a second followed and his strong, heroic spirit passed away.

The Funeral.

Sunday, April 28, the day of Mr. Gilliland's funeral, was gloomy and somber. The rain fell most of the time in solemn downpour. It was as though the heavens wept with us in our great loss. Long before the hour for the service, which was 2:30 in the afternoon, First Church was crowded with people. The main auditorium, upstairs and down, Bible School rooms, and vestibule were thronged, many standing throughout the necessarily long service.

The floral offerings were profuse and beautiful. They were piled in fragrant heaps about the pulpit and arranged in orderly array around the platform.

The reading of the great hymn, "Fallen on Zion's battlefield a soldier of renown" opened the service after which a mixed quartette sang "Rock of Ages." Dr. John L. Jackson, pastor of the First Baptist Church read comforting passages from the scriptures and offered prayer. Next a solo, "Come Ye Disconsolate" was sung. The writer then spoke of Mr. Gilliland's life and labors in Bloomington; Milo Atkinson, minister of Centennial Church and Mr. Gilliland's pastor, spoke of him as preacher and pastor. Stephen H. Zendt, pastor of Second Church, spoke of him as a man, and J. Fred Jones, our state secretary, considered Mr. Gilliland's service to the Disciples at large. Dr. N. M. English, of Grace Methodist Church read the resolutions of the Ministerial Association and the service closed with the hymn, "Abide with Me," by the quartette.

Then for an hour the grief-stricken throng pressed slowly and steadily through the vestibule at the main entrance to look for the last time on the well known face and it was nearly six o'clock when the benediction was pronounced at the grave side.

"We lay in dust life's glory dead
And from the ground there blossoms red,
Life that shall endless be."

First Church,
Bloomington, Ill.

Three Governors Praise Suffrage

Higher Moral Standard in Colorado—Idaho's Children Cared For Would Not Repeal Suffrage in Wyoming.

The Governors of Colorado, Wyoming and Idaho contributed their views on votes for women to the recent suffrage issue of the Brooklyn Eagle.

What Has Been Accomplished in Colorado.

Equal suffrage has been a great success in Colorado. It has established a higher standard of morals in political parties and in office holders; it has caused the enactment of many excellent laws of our State; it has revolutionized the old practice of disturbances at the polls, and has made them as respectable places as the retail dry goods stores of our cities. It has caused too many reforms even to mention in a short message.

(Signed) John F. Shafroth.
Governor.

A Success in Idaho.

Woman suffrage has proven successful in Idaho in so many ways that I cannot particularize. Elections are quiet and orderly, and the character of the candidates is scrupulously scanned while tremendous interest is taken by the women through their various organizations in all legislation relating to the welfare of children and the uplift of humanity, and to their demands the legislators always give heed. Through enfranchisement, woman's influence is greatly augmented.

(Signed) James H. Hawley,
Governor.

The Result in Wyoming.

Woman suffrage in Wyoming has been in every respect as successful as man suffrage. It has put equality laws upon the statute books. It has not debased woman socially, morally or politically. She has not neglected her home duties. It has not caused trouble for husbands or children. It has opened the same opportunities for women to make a living that are accorded to men. It is accepted here as a matter of course, and I know of none who would take the right of suffrage from women if it were in his power to do so.

(Signed) Joseph M. Carey,
Governor.

Church Life

The New York State Convention will be held at Keuka Park, June 25 to 28.

Frank Thompson, Pine Bluff, Ark., has accepted a call to the Argenta Church.

The Minges meetings at Pittsburgh, Kans., resulted in 1,046 additions. The party is now in Ellenburg, Wash.

Thomas L. Cooksey is in a meeting at Venus, Tex. His next engagement will be in the Panhandle district.

F. F. Grim is in a meeting at Tularosa, N. M., where there are a few faithful Disciples but no organization.

Thomas H. Popplewell, minister of the Central Church, Arkansas City, Kan., has accepted a call to Abilene, Tex.

A. Homer Jordan, Lorain, O., has accepted a call to the church at Greensburg, Ind., and will begin his work there May 19.

A. Shullenberger, B. L. Smith, Geo. A. Campbell, B. H. Cleaver, and others.

John Clark has accepted the pastorate at Indiana Avenue, South Bend, Ind., which has been without a pastor since last fall. It is expected that a strong work will be built up in that part of the city.

W. H. Pinkerton is to preach the dedicatory sermon for the new church at New London, Mo., which event has been postponed from May 12 to the 19th. The old building was destroyed by fire just a year previously.

A small church of Disciples within fifteen miles of a large eastern university offers an exceptional opportunity for a mature minister to do graduate work. For full particulars address Prof. Philip C. Parsons, 505 University Place, Syracuse, N. Y.

The meeting held by Evangelist Harris at Phoenix, Ariz., resulted in 63 additions, with six men and boys pledged to the ministry and one young woman to the mission field. E. N. Phillips is the pastor and he thinks the success is very remarkable.

Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, Md., delivered the lectures on the Bondurant foundation at the University of Illinois, April 14-16. The president of the university expressed himself as highly appreciative of the lectures. The subject of the course was: "Christian Art."

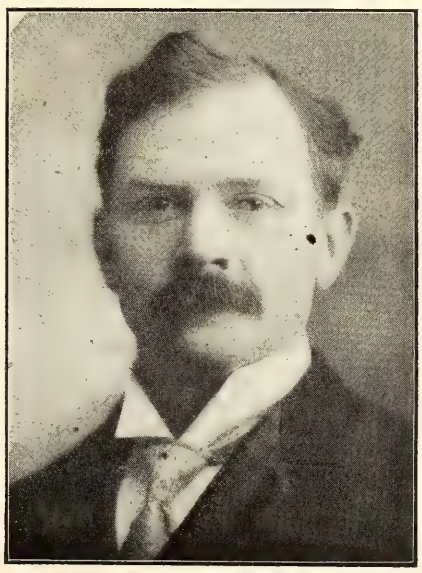
M. S. offering nearly three times as much as last year. A. C. M. S. good, none last year. C. W. B. M. auxilliary on home stretch of $100 jubilee pledge."

The young ladies of Mount Auburn, Ia., Church, where C. I. Fisher is pastor, had full charge of the services recently at the evening service. The music, the taking of the offering and even the sermon were all the contribution of the young women of the church. Miss Alice Wiegan was the one who delivered the address and the unique service was highly appreciated.

C. H. Cole, president of the Springfield Club and one of the active members of the Men's Brotherhood of the South St. Church in Springfield, Mo., was the speaker at a very successful meeting recently when the Brotherhood invited the different men's organizations of the city to a joint meeting. Lewis Luster also spoke on the subject of conservattion. The meeting was a great success.

The Manchu dynasty in China lasted from 1643 until February 12, 1912. On this latter date, Pu Yi, the child ruler of China, abdicated. This date will become famous in history. The yellow dragon has gone with the Manchu rule, and the queue will be seen no more as a mark of Chinese subjection. Yuan Shi Kai, the new president, had his queue cut on the day of his election to the presidency.

Rev. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, who lectured on "Christian Art" at the University of Illinois.



Rev. J. M. Philputt, Central Church, New York City, who is gradually yielding to his people's persuasions to make his pastorate permanent.

Secretary Stephen J. Corey, who will go to Africa on a mission tour.

Wm. Carey Bailey closed his ministry at Holtville, Cal., on May 1, to become an editor of the Pacific Prohibitionist at Los Angeles.

J. M. Bell, pastor at McKinney, Tex., has received a call from the congregation at Quincy, Ill., where Clyde Darsie was pastor before going to Jacksonville.

R. H. Love has accepted a call to Monett, Mo., where he was pastor until two years ago when he accepted the invitation of Memphis, Tex., Church to be their pastor.

Norman Johnson of Pittsburgh, Pa., has accepted the pastorate of Center St. Church, Meadville, Pa., from which place C. M. Iams recently resigned to take the work at Alliance, O.

J. Breckenridge Ellis has moved from Bentonville, Ark., to Plattsburg, Mo., his old home. Mr. Ellis is securing greater recognition as an author and certainly bids fair to attain the very front rank.

The Sixth Missouri District Convention is announced for Clarence, Mo., May 6 to 8. Among the speakers are B. A. Abbott, W.

Prof. and Mrs. Chas. S. Settlemyer have reached Cleveland from Nanking. They are in good health and in good spirits. Professor Settlemyer expects to improve his furlough by taking some special courses in Columbia University. Mrs. Settlemyer will also do some work in Columbia.

F. E. Udell, an elder in Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, and a leader in the work in St. Louis and throughout the brotherhood, passed to rest on April 29. The Christian Century wishes to extend Christian sympathy to the family not unmixed with congratulation for the rich heritage of a noble life.

Claris Yeuell, writing from Delphi, Ind., reports: "In three months our Sunday-school has grown from twenty-five to 100. Organized Juniors. Easter offering, $10. Mrs. Claris Yeuell, superintendent. F. C.

One hundred and twelve years ago there were 100 missionaries in all the world. Now there are 2,258 missionaries and 88,542 native evangelists and helpers. Less than 100 years ago John G. Paton went to the South Sea Islands and found the inhabitants all heathen, with many cannibals among them. Today Christian chapels and Christian men and women are found nearly everywhere among those islands.

J. Mack Mills, evangelist, Fort Collins, Colo., writes that he "would like to hear from communities that desire to be organized in a Disciples' union upon a religious foundation which is broad enough to include every sincere Christian, and narrow enough to exclude all others. He will be glad to serve as many communities as possible (rural preferred), for expenses and free-will offerings. Write him for information."

W. R. Lloyd, writing from Flemingsbrug, Ky., says: "R. W. Abberley helped us in a seventeen days' meeting which has just closed with 16 confessions and 17 by letter. He has done us fine work. He is very effective, and yet free from things that are a hindrance. Mr. Cappa won high praise for his singing and made many friends. Some 115 have been added in the last fourteen months. The Sunday-school is ranking at the top in the state, and last Sunday the Men's Class and the Women's Class led the state."

The draft of the provisional constitution of the Republic of China contains seven articles and fifty-five clauses. The second article reads thus: "There shall be no distinction of race or religion, all being on an equality." Among the liberties guaranteed to the people is this one, "Freedom of religious belief." Heretofore no one could hold office in China unless he worshiped at the shrine of Confucius. If this new constitution is adopted and followed, there will be no religious test in order to hold office.

We have received, though it came too late for us to attend, an invitation to the commencement exercises of Manila Christian College, which on March 30 conferred diplomas on Leon M. Bana, whose graduating essay was entitled "Martin Luther," and Emiliano Uijano, who wrote on "Alexander Campbell." It must delight the hearts of Dr. Lemmon and his colleagues to see the fruits of their labors thus early. And the conquest proceeds in a geometrical ratio when ministers are educated on the ground.

I. R. Lines, formerly pastor at Monroe St., Chicago, but now at Van Wert, Ohio, was tendered a reception by the congregation on April 25, at which the mayor on behalf of the city, a fellow minister speaking for the brother pastors, and a representative of the business men of the city, welcomed the new minister to his charge. In the two months of the present pastorate there have been 60 additions and the Sunday-school has doubled. Mr. Lines is to deliver the sermon to the graduating class of the high school.

Thirty-one years ago Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., assumed a mortgage of $12,000. At different times it was reduced, but it was a slow process and only $2,600 had been paid when M. M. Amunson entered the pastorate. He felt that the church must remove this burden before any real progress could be made. Easter Sunday was set as the day when the church should be free. The day was ideal, and $8,000 was raised in about thirty minutes. Other pledges are coming in and the total of $9,400 is assured.

Two of the most effective temperance documents produced in recent times are special messages from Governor Osborn of Michigan to the legislature. The subject of one is: "To Prohibit Breweries Owning Saloons," and the other, "To Curb the Michigan Bonding Company," which, he says, is owned and controlled by certain brewers of the state, and by having a monopoly of the business of furnishing bonds for saloon-keepers, exercises a sinister influence over the saloon-keepers of the entire state. We hope to hear that both these splendid documents become laws.

"We will hold our annual convention at Cloudcroft, 'the roof-garden of the Southwest,' June 5-12. It is located far up in the mountains at an altitude of almost 9,000 feet. It will be a week of inspiration, of fellowship, of prayer, of planning for the extension of the Master's kingdom. We are glad to announce that I. N. McCash, secretary of the American Society, and J. H. Mohorter, secretary of the National Benevolent Association, will be with us. We are expecting this to be our greatest and best convention."—Frederick F. Grim, corresponding secretary of New Mexico.

D. K. Pearsons, a poor man in Hinsdale, Ill., died a few days ago. He had given away more than six millions of dollars but went to the final reckoning with the blessing of the widow who had cast in two farthings. He gave away his all. Some say that this betokens that we are in the days of our decline like ancient Rome. It may mean that we are getting to be rich, but it would not take much discrimination to differentiate between the largess of the Roman millionaire and the wise philanthropy of Mr. Pearsons. His example will be fruitful of much good and he still speaks.

Hermon P. Williams formerly missionary to the Philippines and now pastor at Albuquerque, N. M., has been carrying on a regular campaign for civic reform in the local church paper which he calls "The Door-Knobber." So vigorous has the work been and so helpful to the cause in general, that the paper has been enlarged and made the calendar for the nine Protestant churches in the town. Mr. Williams remains the editor and the other churches use it for announcements and bulletins. Meanwhile the clean-up campaign is being kept up and with increased effectiveness, no doubt, owing to the enlarged audience.

Chu Chow rejoices in a large, well built new church. It is the gift of Mr. and Mrs. James Tisdale in memory of their brother, Walter Scott Tisdale. W. Remfry Hunt writes full of joy and hope. He says: "I felt the thrill of a new sense of victory when some seventy of the Chinese followed me into the waters of baptism to put on Christ. This is the largest number ever baptized by the China mission at one time. All the evangelists were present and some thirty or more of the converts were from the country churches. Fourteen were soldiers in the Republican army and two were officers. Mrs. Osgood has a splendid woman's class in Chu Chow."

The great meeting in New York which was planned as the climax to the series of meetings that have been held during the past months by the Men and Religion Forward Movement, was a great success. W. T. Stead was to have been one of the speakers, but was, instead, one of the lost on the Titanic. The meeting was called a conservation congress and the idea was to prevent the new enthusiasm from bubbling out and being lost. The meeting was in every way successful and exemplified a large measure of Christian union. It is said that a former student of Hiram College, Harry Arnold, is responsible for the suggestion which led to the campaign. It is well known that Fred B. Smith has been the efficient leader.

President Crossfield of Transylvania University is writing a series of articles for the Evangelist on the "Present Situation—A Crisis," as he calls it. We quote one paragraph which ought to cause the churches no little concern: "During the last five years the Disciples of the United States have had a net increase of over 100,000 members, of 397 congregations, but have sustained a net loss of 620 preachers, 177 of whom were lost during 1911. Our year book shows a very much more alarming decline, revealing a net loss of 1,043 preachers during the last five years, 405 of whom were lost during 1911." What is true of one church is true of every church. The lesson drawn by President Crossfield is obvious: We must enlarge our colleges.

James M. Philputt, pastor of Central Church, New York City, at the urgent and unanimous solicitation of the congregation, has agreed to remain with the church for one year more. A program of action has been adopted for this year looking toward the internal development of the church and also the securing of funds for erecting a larger plant when it shall be needed. There have been many additions recently to the church and the outlook for the future is most hopeful. The Christian Century congratulates the leading church in our greatest city on its success in securing the continuation of Mr. Philputt's services. The Disciples throughout America will rejoice to see a worthy building erected by Central of New York.

This year is the seven hundredth anniversary of the Children's Crusade, one of the most romantic episodes of all history. In 1212, tens of thousands of the boys and girls of France and Germany, following leaders fired by religious frenzy, set forth to wrest the Holy Land from the control of the Moslems. Successive armies of Christian warriors had failed in the attempt, and the failure of the children was even more complete and tragic. Their crusade yielded only a harvest of suffering and death. The children who reached Jerusalem were taken there as slaves. All seemed futile, but the crusading spirit has never died, and through one organization or another, millions of Christian children are now doing a greater work than was dreamed of in 1212.

Willis A. Parker, formerly pastor at Emporia, Kan., and who resigned to enter Harvard University, has been elected professor of philosophy in Pomona College, Claremont, Calif. The Disciples of the coast have been asked to unite with Congregationalists, Episcopalians and Baptists in supporting Pomona College as a non-sectarian but avowerly Christian institution. Three Disciples are upon its board of trustees, but Mr. Parker is the first from the brotherhood to be elected to a place on the faculty. The Christian Century felicitates Mr. Parker on his opportunity to bring our brotherhood up to the standards of Pomona College, clearly the strongest institution of its kind on the coast and one of a group of eight or ten institutions of the first rank in the country.

Secretary Stephen J. Corey will start about May 15 on a brief visit to our mission stations on the Congo, Africa. Almost fifteen years our Foreign Society has been conducting a growing work in that field, one of the darkest spots on all the face of the globe. No representative of the society has ever visited the stations there, although requested to do so by the missionaries again and again. Such a visit is imperative in the plans for new work and for the wisest administration of all that is now in hand. Mr. Corey is peculiarly suited for the important mission. Not only is he in close touch with the workers, but his growing interest in the whole world-field, his clear insight and uniform good judgment, and his wide missionary information, all combine to make him eminently fitted for the task. He will hearten the overworked men and women who stand under the heavy burden of responsibility they are carrying. Accompanying Mr. Corey will be W. R. Holder of Alabama and W. H. Hobgood of Kentucky, two young men newly appointed as missionaries to the Congo. Now if only a couple of young doctors could be found, the hearts of the Bolenge workers would be filled to running over.

Annual report of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, W. F. Rottenburger, pastor: The annual meeting of the church was held on April 12, at which time all the departments made written reports to the congregation. The number of additions reported was seventy-nine, making a resident membership of 743. The budget for the year was $12,000, about one-third of which went to missions and benevolence. C. M. Burkhardt of Coshocton, Ohio, is the state living link. M. D. Adams of Bilaspur, India, has for some time been the living link in the Foreign Society, and Ernest Gordon of Mahoba is supported privately by a family of the church. The Sunday-school is thoroughly graded and is one of the best growing departments of the work. The principle of "the open door" has been followed to which the neighborhood has responded.

The Philathea Class of First Church, Pomona, Cal, where Chas. R. Hudson is pastor, has attracted attention for the originality of its work. Its latest achievement is the Girls' Home which is maintained for the comfort and convenience of working girls in the city. The parsonage, a beautiful ten-room house, has been furnished for the use of the girls. The fact that the pastor owns his own home left the parsonage available and the enterprise has been a success from the first. The Girls Home is not a charitable institution but a place where girls whose parents live in other cities may have the home life of which they would be deprived if they lived in boarding houses. There is also a successful course in domestic science that is maintained. The young women deserve the highest praise for the efficient service they are rendering their neighbors.

Annual report of the West Street Christian Church, Tipton, Indiana, G. I. Hoover, minister, for the year ending April 1, 1912: During the year the church raised through its auxiliary societies, $1,425.95; through the church as such for current expenses, the building fund and for missions, $5,369.93; making a total raised through church and auxiliary societies, less duplications, of $6,174.88. The church has given for the organized mission and benevolent agencies of the brotherhood and interdenominational fellowships, $350.84. It also contributed $245 toward a church building enterprise of a neighboring congregation. The average attendance upon the Sunday-school for the year was 265; average offering, $6.94. There were added to the church: By baptism, 32; otherwise, 26. The minister conducted 24 funerals and officiated at 28 weddings; $1,955 was paid upon the principal of the standing indebtedness of the church.

Seventy-five officers, members and furloughed missionaries of twenty-eight Foreign Mission Boards of the United States and Canada having work in China met in New York, Feb. 29, 1912, at the call of the Committee of Reference and Counsel, to consider the extraordinary situation in China and the consequent duty of the home churches. After a long and interesting conference as to plans for China's evangelization, the meeting adopted an address to the Christian world urging that earnest prayer be made for China at this great crisis. Among other specific requests was that the churches pray "for perfect union among Christians of every name," and that the leaders among the native church might be multiplied and be able to direct the great forces which are now available. The conference urges in the strongest language the needs of the three million starving Chinese whom the famine has brought face to face with death.

Notes on Home Missions

Evidence is becoming convincing that a great offering for American missions will be made in the month of May.

Some churches will not be ready on May 5, but they can use any other Lord's Day for the holy purpose of honoring the Lord with their substance designed for American missions.

April receipts are encouraging. The gain from churches over last year for the same month is $2,454.38; from individuals, $455.20; from annuities; $2,000.00, from bequests, $1,612.29; from collections on the field $515.98; from advertising, $261.65; from miscellaneous, $139.94. Losses reported: from Sunday-schools, $72.14, from Christian Endeavor societies, $11.14, from sale of books, $20.70, leaving a net gain from the above named sources of $7,335.46. Let such increase continue!

Where the Budget plan is in use, let the fresh facts in the last number of the Home Missionary be brought by the minister to the attention of his congregation. The greatest need of the church today is knowledge. The people are perishing for lack of knowledge. Information about the needs of America will produce inflammation of zeal to meet those needs.

Membership of the churches in Wyoming in a population of 153,000; 85 per cent of the inhabitants are unchurched. There are 12,000 Roman Catholics in that state, or nearly 3,000 more than the total number of Protestants. There are fifty important places where no religious work is being done. That state is one-third larger than all New England. Wyoming has 33,320 children of school age. Of that number 1,578 are foreign born. There are five schools to every church in that commonwealth. The state has 13.231 miles of ditches for irrigation. A dense population

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago

will be supported in a few years. How is the time to establish churches there.

The Scandinavian work under the leadership of Olson and Osterhus is opening under favorable auspices. Two thousand dollars has been subscribed in the Twin Cities, already, to further the campaign. The A. C. M. S. asks the help of churches in giving the Gospel to five million Scandinavians in the United States. Minneapolis has a major part of her foreign people from the Scandinavian Penninsula.

The A. C. M. S. is attempting to enlarge its work among foreigners. Our greatest problem is the amalgamation of races. America's types of citizenship will depend upon universal dissemination of the Gospel of Christ.

Send all offerings from individuals, churches and Bible-schools to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

I. N. McCash, Secretary.

The May Offering

Let the campaign for Home Missions be carried on vigorously in each church until every member has been reached. Use the whole month if necessary. The following brief paragraphs from our mail are samples of situations in the mission fields affected by the returns from the May offering.

"I had a meeting with the executive committee of the board this noon. We went over the matter of contract. Although the reduction of the amount of appropriation makes it hard for us, they authorize me to say to you that we will leave it to you to do the very best you can for us. The heavy end of the matter falls on me personally as I have been settling up the accounts with the other fellows and leaving mine for the last. I have had nothing from the state boards now since the February partial payment."

* * *

"Your letter was received April 1. It seemed like some cruel April fool letter but I know that it came out of a sad heart. I wish that I had the money; I would love to aid in lifting a burden from off the hearts of you and Brother McCash. I have delayed so I could write our president and treasurer; I have hardly got my bearings. We would be very glad to be gracious to you and say that we will cancel the contract now, but I do not see how this is possible. If you can carry the burden until June 30, it will enable us to do better and to brace ourselves for the coming hardship. So we will ask that you bear the heavy load till July 1."

* * *

"Our contract gave us all we could raise for state and American missions, and doubled back one thousand dollars, increasing our income over what was raised in the state $1,000. We planned our work and employed men to cover this full amount. Since the cancellation of the contract, we have been compelled to cut expenses. To carry out our previous plans it would take $1,200 more than we have in sight. We sympathize deeply with our greater work and are willing to sacrifice to the extent of our power to relieve the situation. But we have a note to meet within five weeks of nearly a thousand dollars, borrowed on the strength of our original contract with the home board. Besides this debt we are behind with our missionaries, some of them several months. In addition to all this, we are facing almost a financial panic because of the low price of cotton and the continued rains."

* * *

"What does the Home Society expect us to do? We made our contracts for the year on the strength of the one we had with you, supposing that if we lived up to our part of it you would do the same. We have brought men from different parts of the country down here to make great sacrifices for the cause and can we now turn them loose in a wild and sparsely settled country like this with no money and no churches to engage them within 500 to 1,000 miles distant? Our word is good to these men, and we have got to take care of them."

Such is a presentation of the bare facts. The American board must stand by its missionaries. Our help depends on the churches.

Send offerings promptly to

The American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Grant K. Lewis, Secy.

The $25,000 Mark Reached

It is really hard to tell how long the American Christian Missionary Society has been pleading with the Bible-schools to send at least $25,000 for the evangelization of the home land. It has been a good many years, however, and the appeal hitherto has always been in vain. But Tuesday, April 30, proved to be a lucky day, for on that day the long sought goal was reached and passed! Walnut Hills Bible-school, Cincinnati proved to be the school that pushed the amount across the line. This school always sends an offering, but this year it was a little larger than usual because of our great need. Of course equal credit belongs to the 1,847 schools whose offerings preceeded Walnut Hills, and enable us to report the combined total to date in the Bible-school offering for American missions, $25,028.09.

But our task is not done. There are yet six thousand Bible-schools, good, strong and true, whose hearts have not been touched with the appeal of the home-land fields. How we wish we knew the word to write or speak that would bring them as splendidly into line as these other 1848 schools are. We are hoping and praying that these six thousand will give us at least $15,000 additional before our books close for the year.

Get your offerings to us promptly. May is the month for American missions, and if your school has not taken its offering, it should do so this month without fail. Send it plainly marked to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, telling us to credit it for you properly.

We can raise $40,000 and by the grace of Gor and the help of the brethren we will do so.

Robt. M. Hopkins,
American Bible-school Superintendent.

RELIGION IN AMERICAN CITIES

A Survey of Conditions—Proportion of Protestants and of Men and Women.

By the Rev. Charles Stelzle, D. D.

Seventy-five North American cities, with a combined population of 20,000,000 have been "surveyed" during the past winter by the Men and Religion Forward Movement. About 1,000 questions were addressed to the local committees having charge of the surveys in each of the cities, covering—among other things—the following subjects; the population, municipal administration, social influence, industrial life, the saloon, dance halls, crimes and arrests, housing health, political life, social service agencies, public schools, libraries, recreational life, juvenile delinquency, and the general condition among the churches in these cities.

Percentage of Protestants.

Of the churches in these cities, 77.7 per cent are Protestants, 11.3 per cent are Catholic, 4 per cent are Jewish, and 7 per cent consist of other denominations. The Methodist Episcopal Church leads in point of membership. Then come the following churches in order: Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopal, Congregational, Lutheran, Christian and Reformed. The membership in all Protestant churches consists 30.7 per cent of men, 54 per cent of women, 6.2 per cent of boys between the ages of twelve and eighteen, and 9.1 per cent of girls between the ages of twelve and eighteen. It is a striking fact that only 5.1 per cent of the boys in the Sunday-schools in these cities are members of the church, although during the past ten years the number of men and boys uniting with the Protestant churches has increased 2½ per cent, there being a steady gain in this respect from year to year.

Church Attendance.

Sixty-five per cent of those who attend the Sunday morning services in the Protestant churches are women, and the morning attendance at all the churches is 65 per cent of the total attendance of the day. More people united with the church at the age of fourteen than at any other time, and there is a sharp decline in church accession after twenty-one. Forty-one per cent of the churches have organized movements to greet strangers. Forty-eight per cent have missionary committees, and 42 per cent have Mission Study classes. In fully one-third of the churches practically every member contributed regularly to missions, and 42 per cent of all the churches have weekly offerings for missionary purposes. However, 73 per cent of all the contributions of the Protestant churches in these seventy-five cities for the last fiscal year was used for congregational expenses. Seven and four-tenths per cent of the total was used for denominational Home Mission purposes, and 7.7 per cent for denominational Foreign Missions. Of the total contributions of the churches for all purposes, 52.5 per cent were given by the congregations themselves; 9.9 per cent by the Sunday-schools; 18.2 per cent by women's organizations; 1.4 per cent by men's organizations; 3 per cent by the Young People's Societies; and 15 per cent by individuals, presumably in large personal gifts. During the past ten years, five-tenths of one per cent of the men in the churches actually went out from the churches as missionaries, either in the United States or in foreign countries, and two-tenths of one per cent of the men in the churches today intend to become missionaries.

Sunday-school Enrollment.

Of the enrollment in the Sunday-schools, 57.2 per cent are women and girls, and 42.8 per cent men and boys; and of the enrollment in the Bible classes, 62 per cent are boys between the ages of twelve and eighteen, while 38 per cent are men. Of the teachers of Men's Bible classes in the Sunday-schools, 23.7 per cent are clergymen; 36.5 per cent are business men; 11.4 per cent are women; 17.3 per cent are professional men; whereas, the teachers of the boys' classes in the Sunday-schools are 5.3 per cent clergymen; 7.9 per cent professional men; 8.8 per cent male school teachers; 19.4 per cent business men; 19.5 per cent men of other classes; 7.5 per cent women under twenty, and 31.6 per cent women over twenty years of age.

There are more than three times as many saloons as there are churches in these cities, but as the survey includes many Southern cities, which are under prohibition rule, the actual proportion of saloons in most of the cities is very much greater. Of the nearly 25,000 saloons in these cities, 40.6 per cent serve free lunches, 32.9 per cent have games and cards, while 1.3 per cent have bowling alleys in connection; 11.6 per cent have cafes; 9.5 per cent have hotels, 4.6 per cent have club rooms, and 1.9 per cent of the saloons have dance halls in connection.

The First Seven Months.

The first seven months of the current missionary year show receipts amounting to $118,422, a gain of $1,088. The churches, as churches, have given $70,311, a gain of $545. The number of contributing churches is 2,483, a gain of 96. The Sunday-schools show a gain of $526, and the individual gifts run up to $21,985, a gain of $4,743. The total gain in regular receipts is $5,676, a gain in bequests of $1,637, but a loss in annuities of $6,225.

The High Calling

(Continued from page 14.)

Mr. Bauer as hearty as you can. I am anxious to see you, as all of us are.

"Your Loving Mother."

The things which annoyed Walter in this letter were, first of all, his mother's invitation to Bauer. Of course if he did not return to school, that would be the end of it. But if he should return, why, then, under the peculiar conditions that existed it would be more than embarrassing for Walter to bring Bauer home with him. And to add to his annoyance Walter began to feel hard toward the German student, as if Bauer had done him a wrong. It is, of course, true that one of the surest ways to acquire a hatred of anyone is first of all to do him an injustice. Having already wronged Bauer in stealing his ideas, Walter was fast entering on the second stage of his relations to him and beginning to feel hateful toward him.

The other annoyance caused by his mother's letter was due to the fact that in her ignorance of the situation she was all unconsciously strengthening his temptation to complete the light and get it before the public as his own as soon as possible. The street-lighting conditions in Milton were duplicated in hundreds of municipalities all over the country. There was no doubt in Walter's mind that the first really successful economical lamp offered the public would find a quick and remunerative sale. With a growing excitement he began to see the great probabilities before his invention. And all that his mother had written simply intended to push him on to complete his work before Bauer could return and make the necessary discovery for himself.

He was vexed and annoyed to a degree he had never before experienced. And he knew deep down in his heart that it was because he was acting a dishonorable part toward the absent classmate. He began to lose sleep over it, and grew nervous and exceedingly unhappy. On the one hand, his home training had made him sensitive to moral standards. He would not have dared to write to his mother about the affair to ask her advice as to what he ought to do, because he knew without writing what she would say. On the other hand, his ambition goaded him to ignore what it called a technicality, tried to befog the issue by whispering that Bauer could not succeed without putting into the lamp the things which Walter had discovered already himself, and constantly insinuated that even if he had not happened to see Bauer's diagram, Walter would probably have worked it out in a day or two anyhow.

He replied to his mother's letter briefly, saying he was unusually busy and adding that he did not think Bauer could come with him because he had been called home and would not in all likelihood return to Burrton. He said nothing in this letter about the lamp; he could not bring himself to mention it. And he knew when he posted the letter that the tone of it would make his mother ask questions because it was so different from the enthusiastic, jolly letters he had written before.

It was during this week that he fixed on a certain evening to make a practical test of his lamp. He had guarded his secret successfully. Not a soul, including both instructors and students, knew the special work he had been doing. Among the great number of special and changing experiments going on in the shop it had not been difficult to keep his discovery to himself.

He chose a night when a great social event was occurring in hopes that he might have the shop to himself. There were a few enthusiastic specialists who did considerable night work, but on this particular evening they went out early and by nine o'clock he found himself alone. The power which lighted the town of Burrton was the same as that in use at the school and was in operation day and night. The conditions seemed absolutely favorable to a test of his invention, and by ten o'clock Walter had made all connections and brought his electrodes into position.

The only question with him was whether the heat of the arc would melt the soft metal teeth at the right time and with even regularity. He was pale and nervous with the tension of the work, his loss of sleep and his goading of conscience, and when the carbons started to glow with the familiar hiss, he started as if someone had come in, and looked around the shop fearfully.

Then he laughed hysterically and turned again to his machine. His whole attention was now fastened upon it, and with the true inventor's ecstacy he forgot Bauer, forgot his mother, forgot that he was at the center of a great moral tragedy for his own soul, forgot there was a God, and a judgment day and any such thing as conscience or remorse, or injustice.

His whole soul flung itself on that point of dazzling light and the soft metal teeth which he had coupled in a strip to the electrodes. He watched it, fascinated and fearful. He saw the tooth begin to glow to a red, then to a white, heat and then it melted softly away, letting the electrodes fall gently, keeping the points of their position in perfect place while the second tooth slipped down in turn to be transformed into a soft and yielding point.

The lamp worked! It was a practical success! It had stood the test! He did not know how long he had been in the shop or how long he had been watching the mechanism. He switched off the power, and adjusted a part of the scissors-coupling. Then he turned on the current again and with the same feeling of fascination watched the softening and dissolving of the metal tooth.

A noise of a door opening aroused him and he looked up. Someone had come in, and was walking directly toward his bench.

The glare of the lamp blinded him, and his eyes had to become adjusted to the dimness as he turned his back on the lamp. But when the person was ten feet away he recognized in a moment the face of Bauer, as he came walking slowly toward him.

(To be continued.)

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
CENTRAL CHURCH
New York, 142 West 81st St. Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

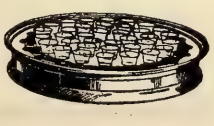
BOWLDEN BELLS FOR CHURCH AND SCHOOL
Sweet Tone Far Sounding Durable
Catalogue Free.
AMERICAN BELL & FOUNDRY CO., NORTHVILLE, MICH.

WE READ and clip for you daily everything printed in the current country and city press of America pertaining to the subject of particular interest to you.
NEWSPAPERS contain many items daily which would inform you exclusively of where you can secure new business, an order or a contract; where a new store has been started, a new firm incorporated or a contract is to be let. A daily press clipping service means more business
FOR YOU. Send Stamp for Booklet
THE CONSOLIDATED PRESS CLIPPING CO.
1109 167 W. Washington St., Chicago, U. S. A.

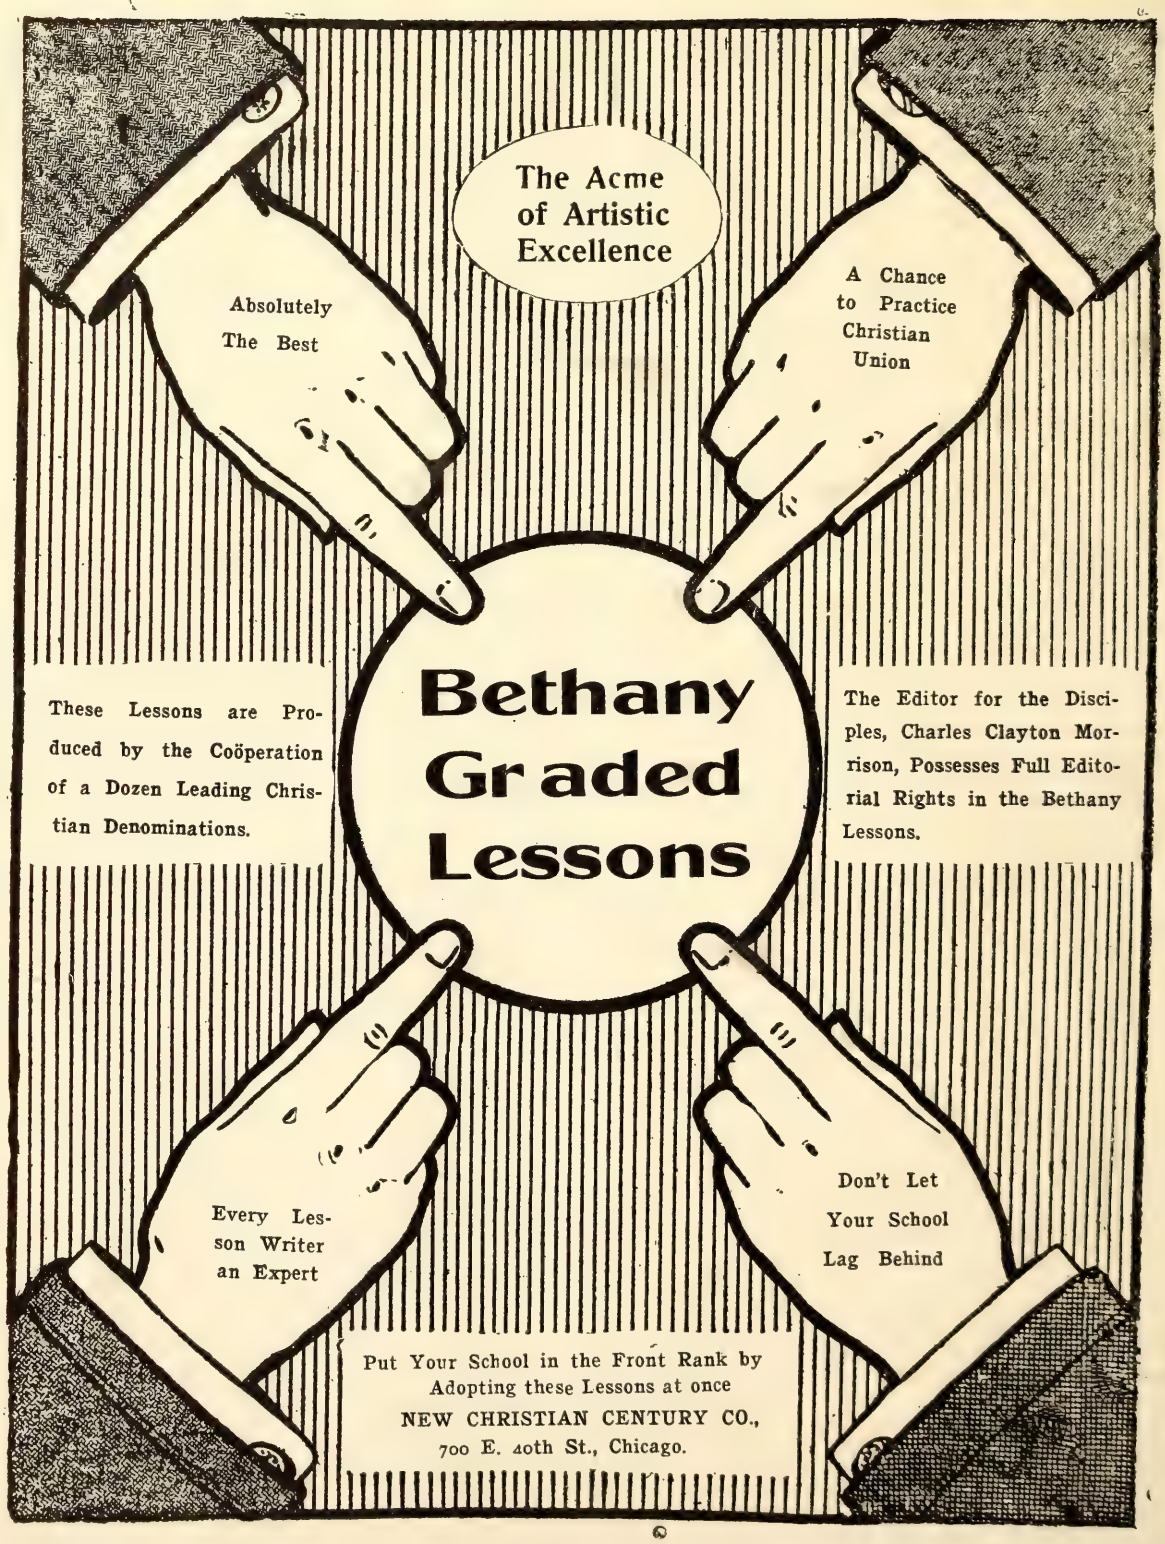
REMEMBER
CHILDREN'S DAY
For Foreign Missions
FIRST SUNDAY IN JUNE
SUPPLIES FREE
THE UNUSED CROSS.

ONE HALF THE WORLD IS BEYOND THE REACH OF ANY MESSENGER OF JESUS CHRIST.
AND I, IF I BE LIFTED UP FROM THE EARTH, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day Supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Bible Schools observing the day in the interest of Heathen Missions.
FREE SUPPLIES
1st. Coin Pocket Missionary Collectors. These are a great improvement on the missionary boxes formerly used. Attractive, convenient, suitable for old or young.
2d. Darkness and Light. The new Children's Day exercise by P. H. Duncan. Filled with beautiful songs, exercises, and recitations. Good for older pupils as well as little folks. Adapted to any school.
ORDER AT ONCE. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance. Write to
STEPHEN J. COREY,
Box 884. Cincinnati, Ohio.



THOMAS INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE
OUR SPECIAL SELF-COLLECTING Cushioned Tray has no equal. NOISELESS, DUST PROOF, INTERLOCKING. Best for pew or altar communion. Uses short, shallow cup, glass or aluminum (indestructible) no tipping of head. Saves ONE-FOURTH cost other services. Over 12,000 churches use. Send for catalog and "Special Introductory Offer." Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 120 Lima, Ohio



The Acme of Artistic Excellence
Absolutely The Best
A Chance to Practice Christian Union
Bethany Graded Lessons
These Lessons are Produced by the Coöperation of a Dozen Leading Christian Denominations.
The Editor for the Disciples, Charles Clayton Morrison, Possesses Full Editorial Rights in the Bethany Lessons.
Every Lesson Writer an Expert
Don't Let Your School Lag Behind
Put Your School in the Front Rank by Adopting these Lessons at once
NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.,
700 E. 40th St., Chicago.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX May 16, 1912 Number 20

The Price of Progress
An Editorial by Ellis B. Barnes

Recollections of Dr. D. K. Pearsons
By William E. Barton

Christ's Next of Kin
By G. Campbell Morgan

CHICAGO

Topics of the Time

An undertaker on the steamer Mackay-Bennett, the ship which went to the scene of the Titanic disaster and picked up the bodies of 306 of its victims, describes the gruesome work as follows:

"One of the first bodies picked up was that of a little baby two years old. She had flaxen hair and a round face like a doll, and she was floating at our port side. The boys who picked her up said she seemed to be looking up to them appealingly. If nobody can claim her the ship's crew will chip in and pay for her burial.

"The burial services of those committed again to the sea, by Canon Hines of All Saints Cathedral, were impressive. I shall never forget the scene. There were icebergs sullenly drifting all about, a lead sky, and dusk just creeping on us. Canon Hines read the simple service over each body in turn and, as every one was committed, the full crew of nearly 100, all on deck with bowed and uncovered heads, the officers, on the aft deck, sang 'Jesus Lover of My Soul,' the flag fluttered at half peak astern, and over all was a hush.

"In this manner we committed twenty-four bodies on Saturday and fifteen on Monday and seventy-seven on Wednesday. It was gruesome business."

The white population of foreign birth in Chicago, according to the census reports, is 781,217. This is a gain of 195,797 over the number of foreign-born in this city in 1900. Germany leads in the list of foreign nations whose people have made the Windy City their home, a total of 181,987 coming from "the Fatherland." Austria is next in line with 130,201, while there are 122,035 Russians, 63,035 Swedes, 65,922 Irish and 45,111 Italians.

New York is one of the great music-loving cities of the world. More than $500,000 was spent in the concert-rooms of the city during the season which has just closed. The orchestral concerts brought in $250,000; choral concerts, $50,000; chamber music concerts, $25,000; miscellaneous concerts, $125,000; song recitals, $28,000; piano recitals, $20,000; violin recitals, $12,000; mixed concerts, $10,000. In addition to these affairs, there were numerous concerts given which were not attended by the music reviewers, and which brought in a sum approximating $100,000.

Boston is going to put an end to drunken carousing on the part of men and women who are fond of the life where the lights are very bright. The Boston Blue Laws, regarding the sale of liquor to women, are to be enforced strictly hereafter, in accordance with a decision of the license commission, which hopes thereby to improve the moral life of the city. The new regulations provide that no women are to be allowed in any part of saloons or cafes, except the dining rooms; no men, accompanied by women, are to be served with liquor on Sunday, and private dining rooms are forbidden. The board also announces its intention to order the segregation of men and women in drinking places.

One reason why the police of Paris do not capture dangerous criminals as quickly as do the officers of the law of some other countries lies in the fact that their pay is much too low. The chief inspector, Colmard, receives $840 a year and has reached the highest rate in the service. Sergt. Fleury has $600 a year. After him comes Inspector Rohr, who arrested the bloody Carony, for which day's work he got $1.50. Inspector Leroy has $1.34 a day and Inspectors Sevetre and Huet, who, after watching for seven consecutive nights, arrested Raymond la Science, another murderer, do not receive quite $1.25 a day. Inspector Naessens, who arrested one of the automobile gang, Paul Doebel, gets the same amount.

The taking of the biennial school census was begun in Chicago last week under the direction of Superintendent W. L. Bodine of the department of compulsory education. Four hundred and fifty enumerators were set to work, there being also one supervisor for each ward. A complete census will be taken of all the minor population and will show the name, address, age and nativity of each child and the nativity of the parents; various sociological statistics; number of illiterate persons between 12 and 21 years old; number of children between 14 and 16 years old who are working; number of children between the ages of 14 and 16 years old who are neither working nor attending school; the number of deaf, dumb, blind, crippled and epileptic children of school age; causes of illiteracy, and complete count of babies under 4 years old. The census is being taken under the ward and precinct plan. All official enumerators have badges and credentials to show their authority if it is questioned. They have headquarters in a public school building in each ward.

Partly as a result of lessons gained from the Titanic disaster all branches of the military services have decided to go in more strongly for swimming. Instructions are being issued by the War Department for regular swimming lessons to be given to all recruits, beginning May 1. Swimming has been required of all enlisted men of the navy and marine corps, but hereafter the regulation drills and exercises will provide for regular swimming by every officer and man at sea. While soldiers have no duty at sea, it has been decided as advisable that they be taught to swim in case of accident while traveling on ship or for military purposes in getting across streams in field action.

The branch in Liverpool of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union has decided that seamen and firemen of every ship leaving Liverpool shall insist on the right of inspection of lifeboats by representatives of the union. The union has decided also to demand an increase of the wages of seamen to $22.50 and in that of firemen to $25 a month.

Attorney General Wickersham has appointed Stanley W. Finch chief of the bureau of investigation of the Department of Justice, a special commissioner to suppress the white slave traffic. Finch will begin a vigorous campaign in every state in the union for the extermination of the vice. About 600 special officers will be employed in this active campaign.

A Boston company will shortly start a large branch of its business in Helsingborg, Sweden, where it will manufacture many specialties for the shoe industry in this country and Russia. The raw materials used will be chiefly Swedish.

The Presbyterian Board is celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary this year. The income of the society during the year 1837 was $44,000. This year the receipts have been $1,950,000.

About People

—Lawrence Y. Sherman, former speaker of the Illinois house, and lieutenant-governor, expended $9,077.25, or $1.50 more than he received in contributions, in the campaign which resulted in his selection at the Illinois primaries as republican candidate for the United States Senate. Mr. Sherman defeated Senator Shelby M. Cullom.

—James Bryce, British ambassador to this country, is on his way to New Zealand. The ambassador will study at first hand the political and sociological conditions of a part of the British empire he has never before personally visited. He will be away about three months, leaving the embassy at Washington under charge of Alfred Mitchell Innes, the counselor.

—William Travers Jerome, former district attorney of New York, has been designated by Attorney-General Carmody of New York to assist the state and the New York district attorney's office in opposing the latest application of Harry K. Thaw, for his release from the Matteawan state hospital for the criminal insane. Mr. Thaw is evidently of the opinion by this time that pistols are "bad medicine" and generally do the most damage to the user.

—The Pope is not in such poor health as to cause worry according to those who have recently seen him. A writer from Rome says: "I had the privilege of an interview with him on Friday, April 12, in which he looked remarkably well, with a strong voice and brisk gait, much better, indeed, than when I was presented to him two months ago. All reports about his illness or impending dissolution should be received with the greatest caution, and are probably without foundation."

—Homer Davenport, one of America's most famous cartoonists passed away in New York last week at the age of 45 years. Mr. Davenport was born in Oregon and started life in a San Francisco newspaper office drawing pictures and cartoons. He soon went to New York and was for years in the employ of the Hearst papers. He roamed all over the world and everywhere he gathered about him animal friends. These finally were installed in what has become known as the Homer Davenport Farms at Morris Plains, one of the greatest private "zoos" in the world. Mr. Davenport's forte was political cartoons. He was broad-minded and liberal-spirited with a talent for detecting the counterfeit. This quality was the cause of much grief to politicians. His salary has for years been the largest received by any newspaper cartoonist in America. His last drawing was on the Titanic disaster.

—Sir John Charles Bigham, Lord Mersey, will head the English court of inquiry into the Titanic disaster. He is the son of a Liverpool merchant, was admitted to the bar in 1870. He was appointed a judge in 1897, and at the same time was knighted.

—Mrs. Isidor Straus who refused to leave her husband and went down with the Titanic will remain long fixed in the minds of everybody as a heroine of heroines. The names of the women who were placed in the life boats by a self-denying man would have already been forgotten, but Mrs. Straus's words to her husband before the officer who wanted her to step into a boat, "We've been together all these years; where you go, I go," will live forever.

—James M. Taylor is planning an evangelistic campaign to the islands of St. Thomas, Saba Nevis, Dominica, Trinidad, and on to South America. He asks prayers for the journey and work.

The Christian Century

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The Price of Progress

AS A GENERAL PROPOSITION EVERY sane man will affirm his belief in progressive measures. On the progress of the race the orator and the statesman delight to dwell. The youth who will soon settle some of the problem of the universe in a graduation address will impress upon his generation the paramount duty of joining with progressive forces. It would seem as if the world were planning to advance with every rising sun.

The fact is that the world is planning for no such thing: its plans are to hinder advancement. The people who believe in progress are few, they always have been, and always will be. They can easily be counted in every community and present a striking contrast to the contented.

The creed of the average man is that what was good enough for his father is good enough for him, that no changes are desired if they carry with them any demands. If progress could be had without cost, then all would be progressives. But most men are not willing to bear the burdens that new conditions impose.

* * *

A candidate for governor in one of our states said in one of his speeches: "I am in favor of all proper progress." None but a politician of many battles could have evolved from his "cosmic" consciousness the happy thought of using that word "proper." It saved him, no doubt, from many a complication, though it involved his friends in endless debate. For with the injection of that modifier into the campaign, the issue was shifted from progress to "proper" progress. The same astute politician was known to remark on another occasion, when an important measure was enduring the agonies of debate, "If the measure is right I am for it; if it is wrong I am opposed to it."

So say we all; but our caution like the worthy candidate's is not so much in demand as are our powers of illumination. He believed in the law of gravitation and the wetness of water, subject to the action of the Calithumpian party. And strange to say he poses as an apostle of progress. He is an excellent type of what a progressive is not—an echo, a mirror, a photograph, a rubber stamp. But, for all, there are those who actually believe that the world will stand still when he dies.

* * *

The progress of a village is as heart-rending in a small way as the overturning of China is in a large way; the story of the upward struggle is told in the rip of the ploughshare as truly as in the convulsions of history. In every village the battle begins when the city fathers pass an ordinance prohibiting cows from pasturing on the roadsides. Communities have been worked up to a state of civil war over such a measure. The officials were guillotined verbally at every fireside, while on the dry goods boxes indignant tax payers denounced them and their ancestors in language which we shudder to recall. The liberties of the people were being invaded by a set of blood-thirsty villians who were seeking public vengeance for private broils.

It took time for the influential citizen to become adjusted to that progressive measure, but once forced to submit he joined the progressives, affirming loud and long that he had advocated the same measure years before only to have himself jeered at as a well meaning but visionary citizen. All of which may be found recorded in the proceedings of the Annanias Club. All progress from cow-pasturage to Supreme Courts may be written with the same setting. If one is disposed to think this is fiction-mongering let him go out in his quiet community some fine morning, and take a hand in the fly "swatting" movement, try to stir up an interest in cleaner streets, or take a prominent part in the work of a humane society which has had courage enough to arrest an influential savage for beating or overdriving a horse, and if he does not retire to the seclusion of his family a sadder and a wiser man it will be because his community joins hard to the garden of Eden. Progress is poetry in the pulpit or on the lecture platform, but a tragedy in real life. It is never a rainbow, but always a struggle.

* * *

The world owes nothing to its crowds, and everything to its stubborn minorities. And what is true in material progress is even more sadly true in the world of religion. The heretic has often been the prophet, sent to his doom by a majority vote. Those who burned him, though they knew it not, threw their own errors into the flames and carried away his truth. Most of the heresies of the world have proved to be revolutions prematurely born. Not all heresies bear the marks of truth, but all truth bore at some time the mark of heresy. Heresies are the product of the growing mind, an assay for truth, a blind groping for the unknown, the discovery of realities of which generations long had dreamed. These are the forces that have saved Christianity from decay.

The world may properly be divided into two classes—progressives and non-progressives; those who rock and those who row the boat. Those who rock are many; those who row are few. It would seem that the majority must have been at the oar if progress were possible at all, but the voice of history affirms the fact that the few are always the leaders, the rowers. The phenomenon of history is that those who rock have asserted that their work has kept the keel even, and without their efforts progress would not have been possible.

The man at the oar has made the world his debter. The bend of his back, the pain of his labor, the anguish of his determination have all been written red on the pages of universal history. So when we hear the fine story of the world's progress let us not forget the blood line; its deepest color may be found on a green hill far away without a city wall.

ELLIS B. BARNES.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Some News Ways of Fighting the Saloon

The old-time method of the church in fighting the saloon has been that of preaching and passing resolutions with occasional attempts at securing temperance pledges. In addition, in some communities, the federated church has fought the saloon in local politics. These methods still have their use, but some new and clever things are being suggested by the leaders of the Men and Religion Movement. They would have the church estimate the economic cost of the saloon in the community and publish the figures.

Perhaps few of us realize to what extent the saloon is a drain on our resources. This estimate of cost would include the cost of the liquor, the rent, license fees, salaries paid bar-tenders, as well as the profit accruing from the business. The cost would include those wards of the state who had gone to prison or to public institutions through the saloon. The total cost would make a footing that would certainly engage the eye of the wary business man. He would see that his occasional protest against economic waste in over-churched communities was but a small-minded quibble over a trifle as compared with the flood of money being dumped into the drunk-factories.

Another very effective way of fighting the saloon is to take over its social service features. There should be other public comfort stations in the community than the saloon. There should be other neighborhood meeting places. Some churches might offer the labor unions free use of their lecture rooms for a meeting place to take the place of the saloon. The church might furnish more open-house occasions for the community. The Men's Club especially has a function in making men at home in other places than the saloon. The saloon as a drinking resort pure and simple would soon perish. It is because Satan has clothed himself in the garments of light and affected the good works of the saints, that he is able to make the saloon his most effective agency in the downfall of men.

The Ten Hour Day for Women

The ten hour day for women is spreading in different states. It was thrown out in New York, but in Illinois it still withstands efforts to declare it unconstitutional. The ten hour day can be defended for men from a scientific standpoint and therefore with much greater force for women. We all live through repair of the physical wastes by rest and food. It requires time for those changes. Excessive fatigue is an unusual degree of poisoning from bodily wastes. The ten hour period is sufficient in which to bring out of the ordinary human being the maximum of his producing capacity. A longer day is borrowing on future resources for which one pays compound interest.

The state has claimed police powers to regulate the hours of labor of women that the motherhood of this and other generations may not be depleted of its vital force. England after half a century of factory labor has been alarmed by a remarkable decline in the physical standards of the nation. America has only within a generation seen large numbers of the women enrolled in productive industry. If we are not to suffer a national decline in physical standards, this reform in hours of labor must go on.

What Can the Church Do for the Immigrant?

The churches have come to be pretty well informed about the immigrant problem through the home mission literature. They have come to recognize in this annual invasion of a million people, one of the most significant of our American problems. Perhaps they have not been brought to realize, however, that they have any further duty than to be informed about the facts and to contribute to home missions.

There are many other things for the churches to do that live in the sections where the immigrants are numerous. The church can investigate living conditions among these foreigners. They often live worse in this country than in their own land because ignorance of the language handicaps them in hunting better conditions. In many cases, their labor is exploited by bosses. This is made impossible when they are taught the nature of labor contracts in this country and shown the possibility of striking out independently to find work.

Among nearly all the immigrants is found a very great desire to learn the language. These immigrants will go almost anwyhere to study, even into churches other than their own. The teaching of English to foreigners has been greatly simplified and the Y. M. C. A. now has a set of lessons by the use of which any American without the use of a word of a foreign language can teach any kind of an immigrant our language. Sometimes a small fee can be secured to put the school on a more dignified basis in the eyes of the immigrant, but this fee should always be low.

In connection with the teaching of English, the sentences can be so chosen as to set forth American ideals and even religious principles. The church by initiating this work in a community may often bring the school authorities to see the advisability of doing something for these people. There is where the burden really should rest in the proper division of labor to-day.

Paying Wages By Check

Many firms in the cities have adopted the custom of paying their wages by check. The result of this is that the workers must find a place to cash the check and since they are never off duty at banking hours, they go to the only place open of evenings, the saloon. The cashing of a check is a favor which must be appreciated by patronage. Hence the recipient of the check must tarry for some drinks. Thus the saloon-keeper gets at the family income before the wife does.

The churches which have a social conscience can serve their cause and that of humanity by sending resolutions to those employers who follow this practice and calling their attention to the evil. In the long run, the patronage of the saloons is against the best interests of the employer, and he will usually yield to persuasion and adopt a system of paying cash for wages which is not so favorable to the saloon interests.

Henry George's Single Tax Theory

All but hopeless stand-patters see in the present economic situation many elements of injustice. There are various kinds of remedies proposed. Among these is to be found the Single-tax theory of Henry George. That this point of view did not perish with the founder of the doctrine is manifest in the election of a Single-tax mayor in Seattle and in the vote accorded in that city on a referendum proposing to establish the Single-tax in Seattle. In China many of the constructive statesmen of this period are singe-taxers.

Henry George called attention to a peculiarity of social development in that progress and poverty seemed to go together. This country in pioneer days had to struggle for a living but everybody had work. With all of our machinery in modern times making the manufacture of commodities so cheap, there is direr poverty at the bottom of the social scale than in pioneer days. Mr. George explained this on the ground of the exploitation of land values. The unearned increment of land had built up great fortunes for men who had not produced them. The remedy proposed by Henry George was a tax levied on land but not on improvements. The advantage of this plan would be to abolish an army of tax-gatherers, since the assessment of land value is a very simple matter. The abolishment of the property tax would do away with a great deal of false returns in assessment and make for honesty among the people. The tax upon the land would make it unprofitable to hold land awaiting future accretions of value but would compel the owner to use it for the economic good of society or dispose of it.

This plan of taxation in a modified form is now in operation in New Zealand, that pioneer land of social reform to which we are turning now for guidance in so many of our perplexing problems. Economists attack the doctrine of Henry George which denies the Malthusian limitation of population. Mr. George insists that with every mouth are born two hands and that for every twenty women there are born twenty-one men, and that the thicker these live the more the division increases the efficiency of their labor, thus offsetting the law of diminishing returns on the land.

—The industrial situation at Muscatine, Iowa, presents problems of national extent and importance. A report on them has been issued by the special committee appointed by the Federal Commission of the Churches of Christ in America.

—The Ohio Constitutional Convention proposes giving to the general assembly of the state, power to regulate the hours of labor and fix the minimum wage.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Censure for Senator John Sharp Williams

Some of the church papers are severely criticizing Senator Williams for his parody upon the Apostles' creed recently read in the senate. The parody expressing the senator's faith in ex-president Roosevelt, was not in itself a brilliant performance; it was really a far-fetched production. We would not say that it was either witty or wise. His views could have been much better stated had he not attempted to give them such a background for a setting. The following from the Living Church (Episcopalian) expresses the sentiof most right feeling people.

It is probably not too much to say that the entire Christian sentiment of this country was shocked beyond measure last week at the blasphemous parody upon the Apostles' Creed which was perpetrated in the senate by John Sharp Williams, senator from Mississippi. It would seem incredible that any politician, even of the lowest order, should suppose that Christian sentiment and the deepest beliefs of Christian people concerning God and the incarnate life, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the Son of God, can be insulted in this vile manner without bringing upon himself the contempt of at least a large section of his own constituents. Senator Williams has offended against Christian sensibilities in a way that few men in public life, in a Christian nation, have ventured to do, and that no gentleman and no Christian could possibly do without following it up with the most abject apology and prayer for forgiveness when, finally, he should come to his senses.

We believe that we do not misunderstand the quality of the people of Mississippi when we express the belief that they expect each of their senators to conduct himself as a gentleman and at least to respect the Christian sentiment of his constituents, whether he may count himself personally to be a Christian or not. In the blasphemy of his utterance last week, Senator Williams conspicuously failed in both these regards. We shall hope that from every county of his own state, from its newspapers, its public bodies, its private citizens, and, when next it shall be in session, its legislature, there will be poured upon him an unstinted measure of urgent demand—Apologize or Resign! In this demand the American people as a whole will wish to join.

In the meantime Senator Williams has, at one fell swoop, trodden upon and thrown away the sympathetic respect of the American people which had been rather freely accorded him before. Until last week he was one of the most respected of public men.

The Clergy and the Cigarette

Old practices die hard. This is why the sinner is so in love with his sin. It has rooted itself in the depths of his nature. We are all such confirmed creatures of habit that to change it is to make us anew. This is why Jesus said, "Ye must be born again." He would make us over. Henry Ward Beecher preached often on the subject of "Reconstructed Manhood." He knew the difficulty of doing much in the interest of new wine in old bottles. So it would seem that the vice of cigarette smoking among the clergy comes in for its share of criticism by a discriminating writer in the Living Church (Episcopalian). Concerning the attitude of Episcopal clergymen toward this and other reforms, this writer says:

Twenty-five merchants and manufacturers of Joliet, Illinois, have signed an agreement to prevent their employees from smoking cigarettes, and promise larger wages to abstainers. Perhaps some of our cigarette-smoking clergy can give a reason for this action. When one considers the number of states where the manufacture and sale of those ill-smelling and poisonous instruments of paresis are wholly forbidden by law, their use by men of leading in any walk of life seems more than questionable. What a pity it is that our clergy, as a class, should almost always lag behind in moral reforms! As in slavery days, so now in the war against the saloon, and even in this sane and scientific crusade against tobacco, they see Protestant ministers of every sort leading the way, and themselves live and stroll and smoke in the remote rear, two or three generations behind the times! Too bad!

Is the Missionary Idea Changing?

Under this caption the Watchman (Baptist), has the following editorial. Whether or not the missionary is ceasing to be evangelistic, it is certain that he is becoming interested in the idea of social regeneration. We hope he will never forget his duty as an evangelist. The gospel must be preached to every creature. It is still God's power unto salvation. Preaching, teaching, healing, inspiring, are all parts of the gospel program. There need be no fear that the personal message will ever be neglected on the foreign field. We give the editorial in full:

The investigation of foreign mission fields and methods seems to be a favorite service with many persons. A company of people representing the International Bible Students' Association has just returned from one of these tours of observation, and among other things it reports that evangelical preaching in the Far East has about ceased, and that efforts are now devoted to education and medical healing; that public schools, on the lines of American schools, without religious instruction and conducted by the government, are more needed and will give better results than the collegiate schools which missionary societies seek to establish; that there is in the East as in the West a growing tendency toward no religion at all; that Far East people are confused by competition and opposition between Christian mission boards; that the East is remarkably open-minded in its willingness to accept the religion of the West, provided it can be shown to be better; and that talk about converting the world, or the East part of it so-called, is ridiculous, and to nobody more certainly so than to missionaries themselves. That modern methods are adopted by missionary workers, growing out of their experience and a better understanding of the people among whom they labor, is true. It would not be creditable either to the heathen or to the missionaries if it were not so. But to accept all that these investigators report as a fair account of the case would hardly be possible. This summary of their report, which is given out by the Church News Association, was shown to the secretaries of some of the largest Foreign Missionary Societies, and their comment is that the societies have not at all lessened their emphasis upon gospel preaching and personal acceptance of Christ merely because they extend education and medical work; that in many fields abroad competition has wholly passed; and that missionaries do not for a moment entertain the idea that the world cannot be evangelized. A very appropriate and sensible suggestion is made by the secretaries, which might be observed with profit by all investigators of missionary fields, to the effect that they should carefully try to know just what it is that missionaries and societies that send them out are trying to do, and what the practical results of their work are before they criticise or condemn them.

Methodists Mourn Their Losses

The first reports from the quadrennial conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Minneapolis are discouraging. According to the "Bishops' Address," signed by eighteen in this and six in foreign countries, which was read by Bishop Earl Cranston of Washington, D. C., we learn that in the last year "the church has made a net gain of but 55,000, which is less than 2 per cent, as the outcome of the year's activities and the outlay of many millions of dollars. The statistical paradox glares us out of countenance. It shames and humiliates us."

The report avers that by a fair calculation not less than 500,000 members disappeared from the church rolls by the recklessness of the "dropping" process; and that the distinctive doctrines are not being emphasized as they once were, or are discredited for the time by a gain-saying world drunk with vain philosophies and sated with gluttonous indulgences.

The report inquires, "Where is the evidence that science has ever regenerated one soul, or that culture has taken envy, malice, pride, jealousy or greed out of any heart?"

The practice of calling evangelists to the aid of pastors for special revival services was condemned, the former practice of having the pastor carry on his own evangelistic services being preferred.

Possessing an official press the Methodist leaders are very sensitive to a discussion of their church policies or societies. Most of us would regard these Methodist papers as mild to the point of insipidity in this respect, but the Bishops seem to think otherwise.

Referring to the discussions in the church publications the report said:

"We understand the church maintains a press for the advocacy of her doctrines and the defense of her policy when assailed, not as a free forum for the vagaries of writers who measure all problems by their own dooryards, or to officially sanction the promoters of disaffection. While we would not restrain dignified and legitimate discussion, proposed amendments or reforms, we deprecate the admission of ill-considered and intemperate criticisms of our policy or church agencies."

—The churches of the United States now have 40,000 ministers and native helpers in foreign mission fields, and last year the sum of $12,000,000 was contributed to support the work.

—In the United States there are 220,000 churches with 45,000,000 members and adherents. These churches are served by 170,000 ministers.

—West Park Church, N. Y. City, has an endowment of $500,000 and Brick Presbyterian Church an endowment of $450,000. Seven other Presbyterian Churches in that city have endowments ranging from $170,000 to $360,000.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

Promise for the Life That Now Is

The bias given to Christian thought by persecution still appears in our language of song and prayer and in the attitude of many Christians toward political activity and philosophical reflection. We are sometimes asked to use in worship words that would be suitable if we were living in the days of Nero and knew that at any moment we might be called upon to answer with our lives for the faith we held. We have much to learn of the language of those who believe that this is God's world, that all life belongs to God, and that for the Christian the old distinction between the sacred and the secular does not hold.

"The earth," wrote Mazzini, "is of God; it cannot be accursed. Life, like the God from whom it springs, is one and everlasting; it cannot be broken into fragments, or divided into periods of a character radically opposed. There is no antagonism between matter and spirit. Matter gives form to thought; symbols to the idea; means of communication between being and being. The body, given by God as the earthly tenement of the individual, and the means of communication between His life and the external world, is not the seat of evil or temptation. Evil and temptation, wherever they do exist, exist in the Ego; the body is the instrument which translates good or evil into action, according to our free choice. The dualism between the temporal and spiritual power is an immoral conception, without any basis in the nature of things."

We are in love with the world. It is a beautiful home for the children of God. Of course the world has its tragedies. Sorrow is the lot of all. Some seem to have more than their share of pain and misfortune. The freedom we enjoy was purchased with the blood of martyrs and there must be martyrs that it may be maintained and extended. But all this is no reason why we should refuse to see the good that is before our eyes. It is foolish to dwell so intently upon what we cannot have, that we cannot take delight in the blessings at hand. And since we delight in the world, let us give to our appreciation of its beauty the sanction of religion. God wills that we should understand the material and the spiritual realms of which we are a part. It is our privilege to rejoice in the triumphs of science and in the bold ventures of the philosopher. The state is our friend and we serve God by serving it.

"All things work together for good." The world, then, is not against the good man, it is for him. Things we have been accustomed to classify as hindrances to the spiritual life are in reality helps. Difficulties are reminders of the greater strength we may have if we only use the means. Opposition, if it does not irritate us and spoil our temper, invites us to live in a larger world than that of prudent selfishness. Pain reveals the greatness and goodness of God. The joy we have in this world must be won in the conflict with pain and doubt and fear. The world of the Christian is very different from that of the sensuous and self-indulgent. The values of the latter are too uncertain. To the former belong the eternal values. Its joys, therefore, are deep and abiding.

Without in the least minimizing man's obligation and achievements, we may find quietness and rest in the belief that this world is God's and that he is working out in it his own gracious purposes. He takes notice of us and honors our labors by accepting us as co-workers. By exalting God in human affairs we exalt man. The humblest worker has a value far beyond that which can be felt by those who had no experience of the divine grace. We are in need of the rest that such faith gives. Our joy in life is but a suggestion of what it might be. We have a feeling that this world is a beautiful home and that it is for our use but we know not yet how to use it as we ought.

The living Christ is our companion. Wherever there are true hearts we may find him. He is present where there is human need. In the crowded quarters of the city he sustains and cheers the friends of the children and of all who are exploited. He is in the country places to refine and spiritualize. The work of the Christian physician in Africa and China is his work and he is there to bless it. He is near when good and evil contend for the mastery in the same heart. Here then is the great promise for the life that now is: We can become better and we can help the world to become better. And this transforms the world immediately for our experience. [Midweek Service, May 22. Rom. 8:28-39.] S. J.

Doctor Sweeney's Illustration.

On Our Readers' Opinions page appears a statement by Dr. Z. T. Sweeney which he asks us to publish as his final contribution to a discussion in which he has been a prominent participant. The Christian Century differs radically with Doctor Sweeney on the subject matter of this discussion but finds much satisfaction in publishing his articles because he boldly accepts the logic of the legalistic system which he espouses.

Most writers who adopt the legalistic premises refuse to accept and abide by their implications. Doctor Sweeney is conscientiously consistent. He believes that Christ left a fixed code of laws, upon obedience to which salvation is promised. One of these laws prescribes the immersion in water of a penitent believer as a condition of pardon and of membership in the Church of Christ. Two outstanding texts of scripture are used in support of this position.

One of these is the socalled great commission: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved;" the other is John 3:5: "Except a man be born of water and of the spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." In the former text Doctor Sweeney regards the word "baptized" as synonymous with "immersed." The promise of salvation is therefore held out to those, and to those only, who have been immersed. In the latter text "born of water" refers to immersion. And Doctor Sweeney accepts the full meaning of the substitution which makes Jesus say plainly, "Except a man be immersed in water and born of the spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." The full force of the word "cannot" is accepted by Doctor Sweeney. He therefore is compelled to regard the Church of Christ as limited to immersed believers. There are none entitled to be called members of the Church of Christ save those who have been immersed. Congregational, Presbyterian, Episcopalian and other churches are not churches of Christ and none who belong to these churches are members of the Church of Christ save the small minority who have been immersed. Over against Dr. Sweeney's position The Christian Century affirms:

That Congregational, Episcopalian, Presbyterian and other evangelical churches are churches of Christ.

That their members are Christians, members of the Church of Christ.

That they have been baptized.

That Jesus did not affirm that immersion in water was a condition of entrance into his kingdom.

That he did not command his followers to immerse in water nor promise salvation to those who were thus immersed.*

That the subject of immersion in water never, so far as the New Testament record shows, entered into the consciousness of Jesus as a matter of legislation.

---

* It should be said for the benefit of any reader of this article who may not be familiar with the position of The Christian Century, that we believe in the practice of immersion only in the administration of baptism, and so teach, but on other grounds than a legislative command of Jesus.

And, fundamentally, that Jesus left no such code of legislation as is assumed in Dr. Sweeney's premises.

This last affirmation brings us to Dr. Sweeney's illustration of the father, the three sons and the new hat. With varying details this is the stock illustration of legalism. In direct terms The Christian Century is compelled to characterize it as misleading, non-biblical and contrary to the most essential thing that Jesus Christ was endeavoring to teach mankind.

1. The illustration is misleading.

The third son who reasons, contrary to the explicit words of the command, that his father "will not be particular about the field I work in, so I work," is presumably meant to illustrate the attitude of Presbyterians and others who have not been immersed. But it is the poles away from their attitude. It is a thoroughly sectarian and impudent thing for Baptists and Disciples to assert that Presbyterians are either unintelligent or unconscientious in their treatment of baptism. Presbyterians do not reason after the fashion of the third son any more than Baptists do. They studiously and scrupulously inquire just what the will of Christ is. They exhibit no less loyalty to their Master than do Baptists and Disciples. It is inconceivable that Presbyterians could hear their Lord command them to work in a particular field and then "run off" to work in some other field. It is inconceivable that they could hear their Lord plainly command them to be immersed in water and thereupon presumptuously offer a substitute like sprinkling or pouring. The third son's attitude and reasoning is not in any degree analogous to the attitude of those Christians who practice affusion. They deny straight out that their Lord commanded them to be immersed. He commanded them to be baptized, they admit, but baptism is, to them, an incomparably greater thing than any physical act, whether immersion or sprinkling or pouring.

2. The illustration is non-biblical.

It describes the father as having "gone away" leaving behind him a rule, or command, or code of commands. There is absolutely no analogue to this conception in the New Testament. The parables of Jesus in which the King "goes away" on a journey are not used to illustrate so fundamental and essential an aspect of the spiritual order as is Doctor Sweeney's illustration. When the new Testament deals with this most fundamental reality it teaches that the Father is near at hand, that our cry, "Abba, Father," is not only responded to but actually prompted by the Father's Spirit. God is not an absentee God. Christ is not an absentee Saviour. He has not left us a "commission" under which to work. He is with us even to the end of the world, teaching us new truth, opening our eyes to new duties, formulating new sanctions and imparting to us his own personal power. No illustration of the fundamental reality of the Christian life that takes God away and leaves in his place a commandment or a book of commandments can be made to tally with the plain and dominant teaching of holy scripture.

But the illustration is also non-biblical because it states this vital, spiritual, personal relationship between God and man in terms of a contract. This, to be sure, is a biblical conception in so far as it is an Old Testament conception, but it is non-biblical for those who find God's final revelation to the New Testament. The one thesis that most of the epistolary portion of the New Testament sets itself to make clear is that we are not under law but under grace. The religion of law was crucified on Calvary. Even such a venerable and worthy law as the ten commandments was nailed to Christ's cross.

The New Testament does not offer to give mankind a new law, it offers to take mankind right into the heart of the eternal Law-maker, so that the divine reasons for making law may become immediate motives of conduct.

There is no salvation in law-keeping, says the New Testament; salvation is in knowing the Law-maker. This only is life eternal—to know Thee!

No illustration of the fundamental reality of the Christian life that makes a contractual or legalistic category central can throw any light upon the religion taught in the New Testament.

3. The illustration contradicts Jesus Christ's essential revelation.

The essential thing that Jesus came to tell mankind was that God judges now, and always has judged, and always will judge, in the court of equity, by the law of justice, and by no other law.

The conception of God as judging in two courts—a law court and a court of equity—strikes at the root of the Christian revelation. The notion that there is some law code of which the sinner may take "advantage," or some court of equity to which he may flee when caught in the toils of divine law, is so repugnant to Christ's revelation of the divine character as to warrant us in calling it abominable.

There is no feature of our Christian gospel which demands of us such instant and brave defense as Christ's revelation of God. It is much more important than to defend the divinity of Christ. What we put into our doctrine of the divinity of Christ will depend upon how well we have grasped Christ's disclosure of his Father. And the great thing that Jesus did for us in respect of our faith in God was to make Him personal to us, a living, present Companion, judging us inwardly, by truth and equity, and not by technical law.

Judaism shut God up in a court of law. It bound Him down with an elaborate code of statutes. Christ flung these laws away and brought mankind face to face with the Father. There is no disloyalty to Christ so fundamental as to teach men that they are hedged about now with divine laws which God may disregard at some future judgment day.

There are no such laws. God has given no arbitrary command which may be set aside in a higher court.

There are no "uncovenanted mercies." When Christ's heart broke on Calvary it spilled out upon mankind all the mercies of the eternal Father. God's mercies have all been "covenanted."

If we may argue that God will "do right" by a soul at the last day we may be sure he is "doing right" with that soul now. The law by which each soul will be judged at an assumed "grand assize" is the law by which it is judged now. If at the judgment day God will overlook an alleged command to be immersed, we may be sure beyond the faintest peradventure of doubt, that he has decreed no such command. A Christian God cannot disregard his own law—neither can a Christian God make a law which he ought to disregard.

If God were indeed such a God as Dr. Sweeney's illustration implies, and if he judged us men after our poor, fumbling, human fashion, in two courts—one a court of "law," the other a court of "equity"—and we were able thus to choose by which way we should approach him, we say in all reverence and deliberation, that we should disregard his "law", and rest our case upon justice.

And further, if we were able to select the church to which we should attach ourselves, and could thus choose between the fellowship of those who were saved by keeping God's law and those who were being saved by God's grace, we should promptly elect to go with the latter, not only because we should prefer their society, but because Christ himself declared that these blunderers would go into the kingdom ahead of those who were already perfect.

It may seem to some readers that we are dealing rather more gravely with Dr. Sweeney's illustration than its apparently innocuous aspect justifies. But its implications are anything but innocuous. There are many souls whose fraternal impulses and ideals are inhibited by the specious and plausible sound of such illustrations. Pictures like this are stamped upon all the coins of legalism that circulate among immersionist bodies. It is absurd to talk about Christian unity so long as such a conception is entertained. Even frank Christian fraternity of an interdenominational sort is impossible where Disciples or Baptists hold the pharisaic position that Presbyterians and Methodists are not the subjects of God's explicit covenant because, forsooth, they have not been immersed.

That position must be abandoned, or the plea for Christian unity must be abandoned.

Better Inside Than Outside

A little periodical calling itself the Insurgent is at hand. It is published in Los Gatos, Calif., by Rev. Robert Whitaker, a Baptist pastor whose church has recently adopted what among Baptists is called "open membership" and among Disciples the practice of Christian union. The contents of the miniature magazine are for the most part excellent. The editor writes wholesomely and lucidly on themes of progressive Christianity. Unlike many periodicals with similar names, it seems reverent, gracious and consciously evangelical.

In this particular number the leading contributed article is written by Rev. H. J. Loken, pastor First Christian Church of Berkeley, Calif. Mr. Loken's theme is "Yeast." He develops Christ's figure about the leaven hidden in the measure of meal. The Kingdom of God comes by permeating human society with the spirit of Christ, he says. Likewise, Christian unity will come "when there shall be such an outpouring of the Holy Ghost as to obliterate our denominational distinctions, when men shall love their brethren more than their creeds, and when men shall fear more the consequences of withholding fellowship from a true Christian than the anathema of ecclesiastical councils and popes."

We like the inside of this periodical better than the outside. In politics it may be well enough for men to call themselves "insurgents" but not in religion. True religion is not insurgent, it is coöperant. It is not negative, destructive, but positive and constructive. Jesus was an insurgent, but only incidentally. No spiritual cause is likely to get very far toward its consummation whose slogans are negative. The Insurgent describes itself on its cover as "opposed to nothing that is good, afraid of nothing that is true." But there is no "yeast" in that form of statement. It contains no dynamic. Instead there is a vague taunt implied in it.

Progressive men cannot afford to cultivate the "insurgent" temper. Those men who glory in being "heretics" have their reward. What the cause of spiritual religion needs today is that it shall be so stated that its great constructive ideals shall be clearly grasped. Much dogmatic debris must be cleared away, to be sure. But the enterprise is not one merely of clearing away debris; it is building the great temple of God. Its titles and watchwords, therefore, should all consistently suggest this constructive character.

Above all, the souls of those who work in this spiritual building should be free from the narrowness of negation, from the pseudo-virtue of insurgency, from the illiberal consciousness of liberalism. If others call them heretics it hurts, but it does not harm. But if they appropriate the title and conceive their enterprise in terms of their divergence from others rather than their coöperation with others, that harms the cause and blights their usefulness. They will attract some attention from the passers by, but they will add nothing to the strength and glory of the house. The heretics who have made history are not the heretics who have flaunted their heresy. They have been men of profound religious passion. And the deepest note in religious passion is not insurgency; it is loyalty. The true progressive never lets his sense of opposition to existing forms and creeds dominate his mind. He is not an opponent of others' faith, but a defender of the faith. His attitude is essentially constructive.

The modern forward movement for a spiritual religion and the practice of Christian union is not a movement of insurgency but of loyalty.

Take our opinion for what it is worth, Brother Whitaker. The name of your magazine suggests irresponsibility, impatience, lack of sympathy, lack of a constructive purpose. But what you put inside of it is interesting and vital Christian teaching.

Instruction In An Important Virtue

The following letter was sent to Managing Editor A. C. Smither, of the Christian Evangelist, with the request that it be published. It would seem that a mere elementary sense of justice would prompt the immediate correction of Mr. Smither's erroneous statement. Neither the letter nor any correction has yet appeared. Every reader of The Christian Century knows how flatly contradictory of Mr. Morrison's position Mr. Smither's report is. But it seems to be a part of our mission to instruct the succession of editors of our St. Louis contemporary, one at a time, in the important virtue of listening carefully to what is said and reading carefully what is written before presuming to represent the utterances of another.

Dear Brother Smither: In your article entitled "On the Wing," published in your last week's issue you assume to state the thesis of my paper read at the Kansas City Congress in the following words:

> He claimed that when the Brush Run Church, under the leadership of the Campbells, adopted the practice of Christian baptism, that they 'lapsed back that far into sectarianism,' in other words, that the practice exclusively of that baptism obeyed and taught by our Lord and his apostles is sectarianism.

Concerning this summary of my paper I ask permission to say to your readers three things:

1. That in order to fairly represent my statement you should have used the word "immersion" where the words "Christian baptism" occur.
2. That to represent me as saying that obedience to the precept and teaching "of our Lord and his apostles is sectarianism," is to charge me with what is worse than immorality.
3. That even with these amendments granted, your statement is the exact opposite of the truth. I "claimed" no such thing as you assert. My paper itself gives no hint to justify your statement, but contains plain statements to the contrary. In my closing five minutes following the discussion I distinctly said that I regarded the adoption of the exclusive practice of immersion by the Brush Run church as a forward step in the practice of Christian unity. I am quite sure you were present at the time and heard this statement. That you could formulate and cause to be published the above sentences suggests a willingness on your part to do injustice in a form I am most reluctant to impute to you. Very truly yours,

May 3, 1912. CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

Editorial Table Talk

A New Religion

Some people sometimes think we need a new religion, particularly when they observe what a pitiful failure has been made of the old by many of its best friends. But we are still in favor of the old, and shall continue our efforts to have it given a fair chance. It has not done as much for the world as it could have done if those who have spent so much time criticising had spent more time demonstrating its virtues. Our Christianity has survived our noblest attempts to kill it. We kill off the best men it produces, sometimes on one ground and sometimes on another, but always in the interest of genuine Christianity. However, as long as we have the old with us, it is only fair to do the best we can with it, in spite of its loving friends, and allow it to do the best it can for us.

But a new religion has been born at Cornell University, in the Dutch Kitchen, and is known as the "Robert Ingersoll Club" "to study, investigate, and criticize the existing religions and creeds of today, with a view of reconstructing religious thought and setting it on a basis of fact and truth, instead of needless faith and traditional superstition." The number of the new elect is twelve; C. N. Whitman, a sophomore, is chairman, and R. C. A. Delacozette, a junior, is secretary.

It is fitting that such a group should undertake this new crusade. The juniors and sophomores in most of our colleges believe themselves fully competent to reform the world anew. We are surprised that the program of this cult is so restricted. Why not reconstruct the history of the world, give added luster to the solar system, dissolve the deadly iceberg and the tyrannies of the world at one stroke? Why not swat the fly from the lakes to the gulf and muzzle the pestilential microbe? It would be well for the religious task to be undertaken before breakfast, and the remaining tasks finished by sundown on the same day. All problems demanding immediate solution should now be sent to Cornell.

Full Weight in Food Packages

It is deeply regretted by the major portion of the American public that Dr. Wiley is retiring from federal service. He has fought the battles of pure food and has improved conditions for the public more than most of us are aware. One of his parting services was to call attention to another means of defrauding the public other than adulteration. That is through the short weight package.

In recent years there has been a decided movement to buy groceries in original packages. The practice doubtless has much to commend it, in that foodstuffs are kept in more cleanly condition through this means. It has doubtless raised prices in all the goods thus put up, but the small difference the public has been willing to pay. However, in recent years there has been a decided movement on the part of purveyors of well-known brands to reduce the size of the package or the weight of the contents. This has not been noticed by the purchasers of the various kinds of breakfast foods, but through short weights added dividends have been declared by several large concerns. A certain well-known brand of rolled oats had 32 ounces in a package two years ago. Today, it has twenty-two ounces. Many other like instances can be demonstrated. Bottles of olives and pickles have been sold with high bottoms, which have rivalled the propensities of the bottom of the strawberry box in their upward trend.

We have no federal law compelling weights to be printed on packages. Such a law is greatly needed. Some manufacturers who realize that honesty in the long run is the better policy, have organized into American Specialties Manufacturer's Association. The members of this organization have been working with other citizens for the passage of a law compelling a true statement of the contents of each package of foodstuffs.

When Doctors Disagree

That age-long maxim about the doctors has no reference to the medical profession. It belongs wholly to the theologians. The medical doctors cannot afford to disagree. Their conferences are held behind closed doors; the family is not admitted; no minority report is brought in. Whatever differences there may have been in diagnosis and treatment are forgotten when once the room of the patient is entered. A compromise is agreed upon—anything, so long as no differences are spread before the anxious household.

But the disagreements which would be death to the medical profession are the life of the theological. If disagreements among the medical fraternity were acknowledged and advertised, all confidence in the doctors would be destroyed. But among the ministers confidence is increased because of the differences. So it is only the doctors of divinity who can afford to differ. In the one case the patient dies while the differences are being adjusted; in the other the patients seem to multiply with the disagreements.

Among the Disciples differences have been capitalized. To one well-known journal a scrap is as good as a gilt-edged bond. It carries a chip on its shoulder and rejoices when one is found bold enough to knock it off. So successful has this policy been that another paper seems to be following its ignoble example.

Even among our Presbyterian brethren the ease with which a heresy scare can be started is proof positive that though they and we may doctrinally differ, we are yet one in maintaining the unity of the race, if not the unity of the spirit. One of their editors wrote an appreciative editorial on the work of the late William Newton Clarke, a great teacher and prophet. Another editor sees the "sowing of tares," and does violence to the article. Quotations are garbled, statements of fact suppressed, and the usual tricks resorted to, so well-known to those who read sectarian literature. Knowing full well the meaning of all such performances, we sympathize with our Presbyterian brethren, and hope their patience will be equal to the strain. There is no question as to the wisdom of the journal which accorded a worthy tribute to a great teacher. As for its critic, let us hope for the best.

Chicago's Newspaper Troubles

With all the difficulties of religious journalism it is having an easier time just now than the Chicago secular press. The daily papers are in the thrall of a pressmen's strike. Their issues are gotten out laboriously by reporters and managers acting as pressmen, and the papers are distributed in a limited zone only and under the immediate guard of police. The newsboys cry but one paper, the Daily Socialist, a sheet that was just about to yield up the ghost two days before the strike was called. Now with its extemporized morning edition it is announcing a circulation larger than that of any of the great dailies in normal times. The loyalty of the newsboys to the union is phenomenal. Ask one of them for a Tribune, for instance, and he will say, "I don't handle no scab paper."

What are the merits of the strike is hard to say. The issue seems complicated beyond an outsider's understanding . The trouble began in the Hearst offices. Mr. Hearst was supported by the other publishers to whose association he belongs. The two ironical aspects of the situation are that Mr. Hearst should be having trouble with labor unions whom he professes to love so ardently, and that the other publishers should be compelled to support Mr. Hearst whom they detest so heartily! Meantime Chicago people are amazed that they can get along so well without the bales of newspaper reading they are accustomed to devour.

An Evangelist on Evangelism

The Christian Century has dealt very frankly with the unwholesome effects of present day evangelism. We believe much of it is a departure from the ideals of our fathers as well as from New Testament ideals. If any readers remain unconvinced that there is something decidedly wrong with this evangelism let them read an article by Rev. J. V. Coombs, himself an evangelist, which appeared in the Christian Standard of last week. He says that evangelists are learning that there is something wrong with their work from the fact that their business is falling off. He wrote to ten of his fellow-laborers and nine of them admitted that calls from the churches are fewer than five years ago. One wrote, "I had ten calls five years ago where I have one now."

Five years ago, says Mr. Coombs, many evangelists were engaged from six months to a year in advance, with stipulated contracts for compensation. Now the fifty Disciple evangelists take what they can get and are not burdened with calls. The churches and pastors show distrust of evangelists, especially of the evangelistic "troupes" or "teams" as they call themselves. "Out of our eight thousand churches you can count on the fingers of your hands all the strong congregations that have called the evangelistic team this year. Some of our best teams have gone to small towns or lost time."

Mr. Coombs refers to Dr. Morrison's analysis of religious conditions in Springfield, Ill., two and a half years after the "Billy" Sunday meeting there. Not one of the local pastors favored another such meeting but all admitted spiritual stagnation in the community. Mr. Coombs blames the evangelists for "exaggeration, misrepresentation and coloring" in making their reports. He quotes a telegram to one of the papers which read: "Fifty-six took their stand yesterday with us." The pastor of that church wrote Mr. Coombs that there were only six accessions in the entire meeting and only four of them by confession. "Three hundred and fifty-nine took their stand yesterday," was another report. Its sole basis was the fact that the evangelist had asked all who would stand with him for truth and righteousness to rise, and all, of course, arose!

Other data are given. These are sufficient to indicate the character of the indictment brought by this widely esteemed preacher against what seems to him a relapse from the true method of Christian propaganda. It is probably his close relation with Disciple evangelists that prompts him to favorably discriminate them from evangelists of other denominations. The Christian Century goes the full length and says deliberately that the typical revivalism of today is weakening Christianity more than any other single influence.

—The new manager of the Christian Evangelist belittles the Disciples' Congress held in Kansas City in April. He reports that there were only forty-seven ministers present! The enrollment committee reported that only that number paid their dues of one dollar each. A member of the committee reports that there were quite certainly over 200 present. The most obvious characteristic of the Congress program was its representativeness. Men of so-called progressive and conservative types were in about equal number. Older men outnumbered younger men. Yet Mr. Smither charges that the program was constructed in the interest of what he calls a "Mutual Admiration Society" of younger men. The Disciples will be slow to believe that Rev. C. M. Chilton, president of the American Christian Missionary Society, and such representative pastors as Rev. T. W. Grafton, Rev. L. J. Marshall and Rev. Levi Marshall, together with Dean C. M. Sharpe of Missouri Bible College, would be partisan-minded in the preparation of the Congress program. A paper that claims so much for itself as does our St. Louis contemporary should study to be truer to facts and less bristling with censoriousness than it has been of late.

—Rev. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, has been invited to deliver three lectures to the students of Yale University, during the next session, on the Disciples of Christ. He will speak on their origin, their history and their message. Dr. Ainslie's gracious and broad minded ministry on behalf of Christian unity is meeting with generous response wherever he goes.

The Martyr

"So he died for his faith. That is fine;
More than most of us do.
But, say, can you add to that line
That he lived for it, too?

In his death he bore witness at last
As a martyr to truth.
Did his life do the same in the past,
From the days of his youth?

It is easy to die. Men have died
For a wish or a whim,
For bravado, or passion, or pride.
Was it harder for him?

But to live—every day to live out
All the truth that he dreamt,
While his friends met his conduct with doubt,
And the world with contempt—

Was it thus that he plodded ahead,
Never turning aside?
Then, we'll talk of the life that he lived;
Never mind how he died."

—Ernest Crosby.

Personal Memories of Dr. D. K. Pearsons

By William E. Barton

I am not of those who sorrow that Dr. Pearsons did not live to round out a full century. I am glad he died young at 92. It is better for him to have died while life still had joys, rather than that the growing loneliness which he felt should have come to overwhelm him and sadden his spirit hopelessly. He made a brave fight for life. He wanted to live to be a hundred. When I saw him on the Sunday before he died, he laughed aloud at the thought of being very sick, and said, "Next Saturday, remember, next Saturday, I shall write you a letter telling you that I am entirely well." But when I saw him again two days later, he was far less confident. He was looking into the face of death. It had no attractions for him; neither had it terrors. He faced it with a desire for life, but a willingness to go.

Dr. Pearson's Brusqueness.

Many stories have been told of Dr. Pearson's brusqueness. He was brusque; sometimes needlessly so; and yet that brusqueness often heralded an excellent purpose. It seems to me that Dr. Pearsons' largest contribution to the educational life of his generation may not have been the money that he gave, but the emphasis which he laid upon honesty. Dr. Pearsons set himself privately to investigate the business methods of all colleges that made application to him for help. When the president of an institution, which used its endowment to pay current expenses made his plea for assistance, Dr. Pearsons was accustomed to turn to him and tell him that he was a thief, that he and his whole board of trustees ought to be in jail; that to borrow from endowment funds to pay current expenses was stealing, pure and simple. One college president who came to him with high hopes and who was met with this kind of verbal tornado, listened in silence and then rising to go, said: "Dr. Pearsons, I am very much surprised. I expected at least that I should meet a gentleman." Dr. Pearsons answered, "Never more mistaken in your life, sir; never more mistaken in your life!"

Repaying a Robbed Peter.

But the college president who met this kind of reception was accustomed to go back home, call his board of trustees together, make good the impaired funds, and return to the doctor after a year or two, and ask for a contribution, and Dr. Pearsons never failed to know of the effort that had been made in the meantime. He demanded of colleges to which he gave money that they should show a record of careful handling of the moneys already received. He believed himself that he did more good by what he called "compelling the colleges to be honest" than he did by the money which he gave to them. Nothing short of absolute fear of his uncompromising invective has made these institutions as careful as they now are. The small college is under tremendous stress. Its president is absent in the field a large part of the time collecting money for daily bread. There is strong temptation to pay bills out of any money that may be at hand. To Dr. Pearsons more than to any one man belongs the credit of compelling colleges to stop robbing Peter to pay Paul; and I do not know that he ever could have done it, but for the very harsh and utterly uncompromising way in which he called "a spade a spade."

But under this rough chestnut-burr exterior, Dr. Pearsons preserved a warm and tender heart. He had within him elements of smothered gentleness. I think it not too much to say that he was ashamed of his own better nature and tried to conceal from the world his more tender manifestations of heart and life.

An Old Puritan.

Dr. Pearsons has furnished a fine example to the rich men of our country. I would not advise that it be followed literally. Every man in choosing such a method, must work out his details for himself. If ever I become a millionaire, I shall spend a little more for clothing than Dr. Pearsons did, and possibly drive a faster horse. He rigidly refused to spend money for food he could not digest, or clothing that he could not wear; or for luxuries which would shorten his life and diminish his usefulness. He called himself an old Puritan; and nothing pleased him better than to have someone fling that title at him as a term of reproach. Puritanism, in these days, is one of the greatest of our fears, and one of the least of our dangers. Dr. Pearsons carried out consistently the plan which he made for himself, and was happy in the doing of it. He expressed himself as having gotten far more out of the giving away of his money than in the earning of it. He used to tell a rather homely story about the woman who frequently made the trip from Portland to Boston on the boat, and who always ate doughnuts before making the journey because she had tested various kinds of food and found that doughnuts were the only food that "tasted just as good coming up as going down." He was accustomed to say that most business men had gotten only half the fun they might get out of life, because they never had tasted of the good money could give when it "was coming up." He believed he owed a duty to the educators of his day, and to the young people who were growing up about him.

Interesting Church History.

Dr. Pearsons was an unostentatious Christian. His early influences were Congregational. He was converted in a Methodist revival meeting while he was in the Academy in Vermont. He joined what was called "The Class" of probationers, and expected to unite with the church, but before the others with whom he was associated had completed their church membership, he went to medical school at Dartmouth. During the years when he and Mrs. Pearsons were living in the city of Chicago, and before they moved to their suburban home in Hinsdale, they attended the First Presbyterian Church, and she was a member and he an active and sympathetic worshiper. But not being wholly in sympathy with some of the teachings of this church, he did not become an active member. The last quarter century of his life, the period in which his philanthropic work had been done, he had lived in Hinsdale and been a constant attendant at the First Congregational Church. He was one of the most interested and sympathetic listeners; a friend of the pastor, and a man of reverent spirit.

A Sensible Man.

He was no advocate of novelties in religion. Authors of new books frequently sent him copies and he cared for those that walked in the old paths. I picked up a new book on his table one time and said that I would like to read it, but he answered that it was a bad book, and he would not lend it to anyone, and he threw it into the open fire. He kept the Sabbath with Puritan simplicity. He treated the Bible with constant reverence. He never gave money to schools that were not distinctively Christian in their spirit and purpose. He believed with all his heart that the supreme thing in education is Christian character. He was not in favor of admitting men to membership in college faculties unless they were men of approved righteous character.

Best Thing in the World.

He maintained that next to the best thing in the world is to get rich and have fun in giving away one's money; but that the very best thing in the world is to preach the gospel. He had his own very definite ideas as to how the gospel ought to be preached. He thought ministers should cultivate the vocal organs until they were able to produce a clear tone, sufficient in volume, and pleasant enough in quality to reach and move their entire congregation. Then he believed a minister should have ideas and know what he wanted to say, and say it without any tomfoolery; and behind it all, he believed that a minister should be a man whose life illustrated the spirit of his preaching. If he was this kind of a man and could deliver a message in this way, Dr. Pearsons thought he was doing the largest service to mankind that anyone could perform.

Trusted His Instincts.

One thing more should be said about Dr. Pearsons. He never ceased to trust his instincts. Most of us when we grow old enough to reason trust to what we think are our powers of reasoning. Dr. Pearsons preserved a firm faith in his own intuitions. He read character almost at a glance. He had a way of looking a man straight in the eyes, as if to bore into the very secrets of his heart; and after a long, silent, penetrating look, he sometimes burst forth in a swift and stern denunciation; and at other times in a hearty laugh of unaffected good fellowship and approval. I cannot say that he was always right in his character reading, but he was far oftener right than wrong. Only the pure in heart or the perfectly brazen could endure that penetrating look from his eyes. I know men who were his friends for years who never felt quite comfortable under that steel, cold look; but there are others who came to see a glint of kindness, a lurking love of fun, and a simple and unaffected candor in that look, the knowledge of which caused it to lose all terror and to beam a radiant goodwill.

Partisans Paid the Freight.

But though Dr. Pearsons trusted the judgment of some of his friends, two things ought to be said. First, he accepted suggestions only within very definite limits, and then with the possibility always present that he would bluntly refuse any advice whatever. And the other is that no adviser of Dr. Pearsons was ever in the slightest danger of receiving a penny of personal profit from it. He greatly enjoyed the book which Dr. Williams wrote about him, but I doubt if he ever bought a single copy of it to give away. Whatever he did, he did for institutions. His personal friends never received from him for themselves so much as a postage stamp.

"Haid her off! Haid her off!" yelled the driver.

The negro jumped about the road and waved his arms. The cow proceeded calmly on her way.

"Haid her off! Haid her off, nigger!" yelled the driver.

"Ise a-tryin' ter!" replied the negro.

"Speak to her! Speak to her and she'll stop!"

"Good mawnin', cow—good mawnin'!" said the negro, politely.—Saturday Evening Post.

"The Dodger"

By Harriet Crawford

"I look for that kid to be smashed into thin pulp one of these fine days," remarked a man standing on the street corner.

"Naw," replied the tall policeman. "Can't touch him! He's greased. Everything slides off. Look a' there, will ye!"

And they did look, holding their breath. So did the crowds along Second avenue near 23d street. A heavy motor truck carelessly speeding, and a street car approaching at right angles threatened collision. Yet between these two darted a small hatless boy. Right upon him whirled a taxi cab, which he apparently had not noticed. Quick as a flash, he turned, only to meet a heavy dray, its two powerful horses ready to trample him under feet. Yet past them all he slid, his face dusty and perspiring, but gleaming with the light of achievement. The drivers of each of their vehicles, grasping their brakes, turned first frightened, then angry glances upon the grinning little street urchin, who called back:

"Don't get excited, misters—never hit me!"

"Look a' here, youngster!" called out the policeman, "if you do that again, I'll arrest you! Understand?"

But the youngster only grinned the more, and ran on.

The big senior, from the medical college down on First avenue, came swinging along the street. He, too, had stood holding his breath, watching the performance. He had watched the same boy on other similar occasions, and with gleaming eyes, for the spirits of the two were akin. There was nothing the big fellow enjoyed so much as a race with danger, and many a time he said to himself, throwing back his head and striding along: "I'll soon be ready. Come on, then, disease and pestilence for the race, and if I mistake not, I'll always be the winner."

And because of this kinship in spirit, the two had become good friends—the big fellow and the little street lad.

"I saw that, Jimmie! Great, too, but really, you must be more careful! You'll be caught one of these days, and there wouldn't be much left to you."

"G'lang, never fear for me!" replied the little urchin. "I kin dodge everything. Lots of fun, too, mister!"

"Yes, it is!" And they both laughed together.

"Are you sure you can dodge everything, Jimmie?"

"Yep, unless it's the thro' express er a streak of lightning—never tried them."

"Well, there are some things I'm trying to dodge every day, and sometimes it's mighty hard to keep from getting hit, and I'm thinking that maybe it's the same way with you, Jimmie!"

"What do you mean, mister—what kind of things?" And the little boy looked up eagerly.

"Well, you think about it, and the next time we meet, see if you can tell me what they are."

So while Jimmie is thinking, let me tell you a little about him.

His father was of New York's brave firemen and lost his life in his noble work when Jimmie was only a baby.

The mother moved with her three small children to Second avenue, where rents were cheaper. She could tell you how nothing would please the baby more than to be lifted to the window, and how his little body would quiver with excitement, and he would scream with delight when the long elevated went dashing, crashing past.

She could tell you, too, how one day, when he could barely walk, he was suddenly missing, and after search, was found down several flights of stairways, out on the sidewalk standing perfectly enthralled by the roar and the din of the big city. But the mother had to work all day and little Jimmie was left to look after himself most of the time, so his hours were spent on the streets, where he grew to be known as the fastest runner, and was nicknamed "The Dodger" because he was always running into danger, yet always escaping.

Whenever he became the happy possessor of a nickel, it did not go for candy or for marbles, but it gave him a ride on the pell-mell elevated or the roaring subways.

"Lots of fun," Jimmie would say, "like being shot out'er cannon—wish't tho' it didn't have to stop!"

"What are you going to be, my boy, when you are a man?" his big friend, the student, had asked him one day.

"Dunno, mister! Driver of a big, long, lightning express—er Capin of one of those big gun-ships—one of them what anchored in the Hudson! Gee, but it'd be fun to set them big cannons a-booming—boom—boom!"

Several days had passed since that last conversation about the things to dodge. Jimmie still kept up his fun, and still kept thinking, wondering what his big friend had meant. At length, he resolved to find out, so he waited at the corner till the medico came along.

"Say, mister! What were them things you axed if I could dodge? Isn't anything worth mentioning that I can't dodge!"

"Are you sure, Jimmie?"

The little fellow looked up inquiringly.

"What about curse-words and mad-words and dirty-words and lie-words? They're pretty dangerous and knock a fellow down and kill him off, too, as sure as do the trucks and the automobiles. Do you keep out of their way?"

Jimmie looked very thoughtful for several moments. Then he said:

"By Jiminy! Niver thought of sich as hurting a feller, and niver tried to get out'er their way. But I guess you're right, and I'll try to dodge them, too, mister!"

"Shake hands on that, little pal! We'll play that game together!" said the big fellow.

The little brown palm rested for a moment in the strong grasp, then the big senior swung off into his street.

Jimmie stood and watched the broad shoulders dip into the crowd until they disappeared.

"Gee! Take more to knock him down than a little feller like me—but I'm game—I told him I'd try, so I guess I'll have to, now!"

Tom and Jack were learning how to smoke; on the sly, of course; for their mothers objected. They were older than Jimmie quite a little. Perhaps that was why he admired them and often followed them around.

"Come on, kid—learn, too—lots of fun. Can't be a man unless you know how to smoke!"

"Naw; better not—better dodge it!" said Jimmie, turning away.

"What is that crazy loon talking about! Dodging what?" and they walked on, each with a cigarette between his teeth.

A day or two later, Jimmie was standing near to a fruit stand. The owner had just stepped into a grocery to get change when Bob and Dick came along.

"Here's our chance—help yourselves," whispered Bob, as the two grabbed an apple apiece and ran up the street munching. Jimmie came up to them.

"What's up, kiddo! Don't ye care any more for the taste of apples?"

"No—not this way. I'm a-dodging 'em!"

"Who of you made that big noise out in the hallway?' asked the teacher a few days later.

Several of the guilty ones denied. "Did you, Jimmie?" she asked.

It was very easy to say "no," but Jimmie thought he heard some one say, "Dodge it!" so he answered:

"Yes'm, I was one."

Two or three weeks had passed. One day, as the senior, at the medical, was leaving the building, there awaited for him at the door a lad.

"I'm Jimmie's brother!" he said. "He's hurt and wants you. Can you come with me?"

Quickly and silently they passed on together along the street, and up into the room where Jimmie lay upon his little bed. The mother kneeled, sobbing by his side, and wished she had not left her little boy alone so much out in the streets.

His body was badly crushed, but the little face was unharmed. A smile crept over his lips and a faint light, for a moment, into his fast dimming eyes. He tried to stretch out one hand.

"Couldn't dodge it this time!" he whispered. "But I've been trying mighty hard to dodge them other things ye told me about. Hold my hand, won't you, mister, for it's getting dark! I can see it a-comin', but I can't see to dodge it.

Hints to Young Reporters

A charming young widow is any woman whose husband is dead, says Lippincott's.

Oysters are always playfully referred to as succulent bivalves.

The victims of a railroad accident are invariably hurled into eternity.

At a fashionable dinner the wine always flows like water.

Always refer to the sun familiarly as Old Sol.

When an outdoor event is postponed by rain, never miss the opportunity of blaming it on Jupiter Pluvius.

Remember that the man who falls from a high building always strikes terra firma with a dull, sickening thud.

Just before the execution a condemned murderer always eats a hearty breakfast of ham and eggs.

In writing up the dog show, don't fail to mention that society is going to the bowwows.

No description of a horse show is complete without several allusions to beauty and the beast.

Never fail to record the fact that the social outcast who commits suicide showed traces of former beauty and refinement.

In describing a fire, use the word "holocaust" and "conflagration" as often as possible. This enables the copy reader to earn his salary.

Never lose sight of the fact that all men from the south and west are prominent citizens, especially when engaged in the pleasant pastimes of lynching and tarring and feathering.

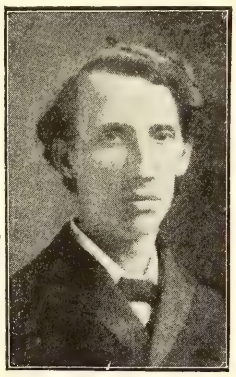
BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

Christ's Next of Kin

Scripture Lesson: Philippians 1:12-30.

"Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother." Matt. 12:50.

In order to an accurate appreciation of the meaning and value of these wonderful words of Jesus, we must carefully consider the circumstances in which they were uttered. The story is told in a brief paragraph, of which these are the final words.



G. Campbell Morgan.

Christ was giving himself without stint, without reserve, to the thronging, pressing multitudes; they followed him from place to place, came with their criticisms and with their agonies; and with patient courtesy he replied to their criticisms, and with infinite compassion he relieved their agonies. He was so busy that he had not time to eat, was so perpetually occupied that he had no time for rest. That news was conveyed to his mother and to his brethren after the flesh, who evidently were in very close association with Mary, and shared her anxiety and concern for Jesus. His mother heard, and she said, and they said, "He is beside himself," he is losing his reason. In consequence of this conviction, they started on a journey to reach him, in all probability from Nazareth to Capernaum. When they arrived, they found that he was in a house, surrounded by a crowd of people.

He Knew Why.

The word was passed to him that his mother and brethren were without, seeking to speak to him. He knew why they had come. His mother had come, full of anxiety for him. She did not understand him. That is revealed in the gospels from beginning to end. She loved him with a great mother love; she knew the infinite and appalling mystery of his being; but she never understood him. When he began his ministry, she sought to hurry him to some demonstration of power, and he had to say to her, "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." Because she loved him, she would have persuaded him to take care of himself.

Knowing this, Jesus said, "Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?" and pointing to the little group of disciples, exclaimed, "Behold, my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother."

This word was not a slight cast upon the natural love of Mary for him. He was not speaking slightingly of the mother-love that had come after him to stop him injuring himself. It was rather a revelation of the fact that there is a closer affinity than that of natural relationship. His word was a declaration that those next of kin to him are such as share his spiritual conceptions and compulsions.

Let us then consider two matters: first, our Lord's teaching in these words concerning the essential nature of that kinship with him which all those of us who are truly his disciples share; and, secondly, the particular privileges of kinship which he here described.

Nature of the Kinship.

First, then, as to the teaching of this declaration concerning the essential nature of our kinship with Jesus. May I ask you to observe negatively that our kinship with Jesus is not that of our humanity; neither is it that of his divinity. I think, perhaps, these things need to be carefully considered and most earnestly stated, for our investigation during recent years, our pressing nearer to the fact of Christ, have resulted in real values but they have also created grave perils. We have come to a new apprehension of the actuality of the humanity of our Lord. If there are any great artists in the world today, they will not paint Christ as the great artists of the middle ages painted him. We have escaped from those conceptions of our Lord which put him at distance from the ordinary things of everyday life. The music of the declaration that he was a carpenter, is understood as it never has been understood. Whereas, I believe there is great value in this rediscovery of the human Christ, I feel that there is peril in the use we may make of the discovery. I hear people perpetually speaking of the Lord Jesus as though he were entirely, absolutely of their own humanity; or speaking of their own humanity as though it were entirely part and parcel of the humanity of Jesus. That is not the case.

Great Distance.

No man can come to anything like a careful study of the human Jesus without discovering the infinite distance between him and ourselves. In all the things that demonstrate his nearness we find the supreme evidence of his distance. If you tell me that he was a man tempted, and therefore of our humanity, I agree. But his attitude under temptation, and his victory over temptation demonstrate the fact that in his human life he was infinitely removed from any other man. If you suggest that he was a man who lived upon the principle of trust and faith, I perfectly agree; but in that very activity of trust I find him at infinite distance from myself. His trust never faltered, never wavered; mine has been faltering and wavering all my life. It is when you press upon me the fact of his humanity, and I come most perfectly to an apprehension of the truth, that he was human, that I am most startled, ashamed, driven back, defeated by the vision of his perfection.

A New Race.

The teaching of the New Testament is that he was not merely of our humanity; but that he was the second Man, the last Adam, the founder of an entirely new race. As the first race was created in the economy of God by the in-breathing of the spirit of God to dust, the new race is to be created of that very humanity by a new birth of the spirit of God. I go back to the Genesis story, and there I see a living creature of the dust, enswathed in Deity, and by that enswathing, in-breathing, created man; differentiated by infinite gulfs from all the creation that lies beneath him. In process of time, out of that human nature, fallen and degraded, in an awe-inspiring mystery the Holy Spirit took of the seed of the woman and made a new Man, the first of a new race, all the members of the succeeding race, to be of fallen humanity but remade, reborn, recreated by the activity of the Holy Spirit. The first Man of the new race was in an infinite mystery of the old race, but separated from it by the mystery of his birth. I am not kin of Jesus by virtue of my humanity. That humanity is of the race fallen, and Jesus is the head of a new race.

His Divine Nature.

Neither is our kinship that of his divine nature; I am not one with him in essential spiritual life, for my spiritual life is created; his spirit life is uncreated; his spirit life is of the very life of God, absolutely without beginning. He was in himself, in a mystery that has for two millenniums defied the analysis and explanation of the schoolmen and theologians, and which will defy them to the end of time, the very logos of God, with God, of God, very God from everlasting. To speak of that in man which may be of the divine nature, that in which he is in the image and the likeness of God, as being kin with the essential mystery of the Deity of Christ, is to show there is no true comprehension of the Christ of the New Testament.

Thus, the statement of Christ becomes illuminative and remarkable, for he reveals what kinship with himself really is, in its deepest and profoundest. Not here does he tell the mystery of its genesis; here, rather, does he reveal the marvel of its expression. What is the expression of our kinship, what is the actuality of it, the nature of it? "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother." He is next of kin to me, that soul who does my Father's will!

The Will of God.

Kinship with Christ consists in the doing of the will of God; the doing of the will of God, interpreted in the light of his immediate actions, those very actions which his mother had come to hinder; and the doing of the will of God as interpreted in the light of his perpetual attitudes.

The will of God chosen; the will of God inquired after in communion, and consequently known; the will of God done in the actual activity of life. That is the story of Jesus, the whole story, including the stoop from the height to the depth, including the whole mystery of incarnation and the process of the incarnate life and the ultimate darkness of the cross. Everything is there.

What We Are to Him.

Now we turn to what seems to me to be the peculiar and remarkable emphasis and value of this declaration concerning the privileges which he suggested. Let us hear the words again, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother." That declaration emphasizes what we are to him, rather than what he is to us.

In that is the exceeding wonder and glory of my text. It does not declare that if I do the will of God, Jesus will be brother to me. That is true, but that is not what he said.

There he stood, lonely, criticised, misunderstood, and he declared that those blundering, frail souls who nevertheless had chosen the will of God, and who were seeking to know it, and to do it, were by that attitude coming into such affinity with him that they were to him brother, sister, mother.

That is the highest, holiest privilege of doing the will of God. Oh, the privileges of doing the will of God! What are they? The perfecting of my own personality presently? The realization of all that is profoundest in my own being by and by? These are privileges; but this is highest; oh, that I may say it reverently and yet say it as our Lord said it on this occasion, when he was being misunderstood by everyone—the highest privilege of doing the will of God is that I can minister to the heart of Christ.

Suggestive Words.

Everyone sees that the words are suggestive, beautifully, exquisitely poetical, chosen by the Master of words and thoughts in order to convey to human hearts that are touched by these human affections, great spiritual truths of the possibilities of the influence exerted upon himself by the men who do it.

Did you struggle all last week my brother, my sister, to do the will of God in difficult circumstances, in places of temptation, with sorrow wringing your heart, and problems pressing upon your spirit; did you steer straight for the goal so far as you were able; was the passion of your heart to do his will? Then you were brother, sister, mother, to Jesus.

What do these words suggest? Now you must use your own faculty of imagination and interpretation. Imagination and interpretation never succeed save as they are love-inspired. You must begin with human love. What is a brother? "A brother is born for adversity." Yes, that is it! Those two boys live together; they are often terribly rude to each other; yes, they are brothers; but wait till one of them has been hit by sorrow, by sin, then you will discover that the other is his brother! "A brother is born for adversity." I love the Hebrew word there. A brother is born for a tight place! "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother." God help us to see this thing. The words of Jesus only can touch to heavenly music chords that are already in our hearts. Is Jesus ever in a difficulty? Yes, in London he is in difficulty, in a tight place. Men are still buffeting him, bruising him, crucifying him. Will you be his brother, standing up for him, helping to bear his burden? I would like to be. We may be, if we will do the will of God.

A Sister.

Not his brother only; his sister. Sometimes I think I could speak better of this. I never had a brother, but I had a sister. When I was getting this sermon ready, I was greatly impressed to notice that there is no tender reference to a sister in the Old Testament, except, perhaps, the references to Rebekah and to Miriam. When I come into the New Testament, every reference to a sister is thrilling with tenderness. You are quite welcome to charge me with imagination—I believe in imagination—but I wondered why this was. Among other things, I noticed a story which said, "a certain woman named Martha received him into her house. And she had a sister called Mary." That is how Mary was known, as Martha's sister. John, in writing of them, put it the other way, "Mary and her sister Martha"; yet even he, in the course of a few sentences, was saying, "Martha and her sister. Mary was a sister. When Jesus said, "My sister," I wonder whether he was not thinking about Mary. If the courage that stands by you when you are in a tight place is the peculiar quality of a brother, what is the peculiar quality of a sister? That you confide in her because she understands. There have been hours in the lives of many men when they had some confidence, tragic confidence; they could not tell father or mother, but they told their sisters. When, presently, the priests seemed to be winning, and Judas was plotting, Mary made her way to Jesus and violated all the economies by pourning costly nard upon his feet. What did it mean? She knew his secret. She was doing it to his burying. I would like to be able to hear his secret. I would like to have some little part in the reception of his confidence in the hour when he needs someone to tell his secret to. Is it possible? Yes, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my sister."

Greatest Word of All.

We come to the last word, and it is the greatest word of all—mother. What does mother stand for? There is but one answer: If brother is a synonym for courage, and sister for confidence, mother is the synonym for comfort. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." Comfort; the heart of Christ comforted! Yes; said Paul, "To you it hath been granted in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer in his behalf." We can comfort the heart of the Lord.

How shall I comfort him, the sorrowful one, for he is still sorrowful in the presence of the world's sin and agony and sorrow, how can I comfort him? By doing the will of God. Every life conformed to the divine will, conditioned within it, devoted to it, busy about the divine will, ministers comfort to his sacred heart.

"Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother."

Where the Figures End.

Notice that the figures end there. He did not say the same is my father. He never spoke of any in that relation to him, other than God. When at twelve years of age, his mother came to Jerusalem looking for him, having missed him from the company, she said, "Thy father and I sought thee sorrowing." He answered her, "How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house." That inquiry was a revelation of his recognition of the fact that God alone was his Father. The figures made use of in my text were all on the human level. We can never be to him in the place of his Father.

The final word of the message is this: He made the assertion of my text not only with regard to those disciples who were there, but as a proclamation, and he introduced it with the greatest of all the words of the New Testament, in some senses, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father."

If my name had been written there, I would have thought some other man had borne my name and that it did not mean me; but "whosoever" includes me, includes you. That is my appeal tonight. For Christ's sake, because he needs brothers, and sisters, and mothers, for courage, for confidence, for comfort; seek, and do the will of God.

Just What He Wanted

A young minister settled over a small country parish was instructed by his parishioners to secure a piano for their use, according to the Cincinnati Commercial-Tribune. He did so, telling the dealer to charge the bill for rental to the secretary of the parish. When the bill amounted to $25, the society being unable to pay it, as well as the salary of the pastor, the music dealer dunned the minister for the money, telling him that he assumed the responsibility. The latter replied that he never assumed the responsibility of another, having all he could do to pay his own bills, whereupon the dealer threatened to sue him.

A short time after our friend received a letter from a New York collection agency, to which, as well as several following, he paid no attention until the following short but definite letter came:

"Dear Sir: Unless you remit at once we shall publish you all over the country as a delinquent debtor."

To which he replied:

"Gentlemen: Ever since I entered the ministry I have been struggling for the title of D. D. Go ahead."

Planting a Tree

He who plants a tree
  Plants a hope;
Rootlets up through fibers blindly grope;
Leaves unfold into horizon free,
  So man's life must climb
  From the clods of time
  Unto heavens sublime.
Canst thou prophesy, thou little tree,
What the glory of thy boughs shall be?

He who plants a tree
  Plants a joy;
Plants a comfort that will never cloy;
Every day a fresh reality,
  Beautiful and strong,
  To whose shelter throng
  Creatures blithe with song.
If thou couldst but know, thou happy tree,
Of the bliss that shall inhabit thee!

He who plants a tree,
  He plants peace.
Under its green curtain jargons cease;
Leaf and zephyr murmur soothingly;
  Shadows soft with sleep
  Down tired eyelids creep,
  Balm of slumber deep.
Never hast thou dreamed, thou blessed tree,
Of the benediction thou shalt be.

He who plants a tree,
  He plants youth;
Vigor won for centuries, in sooth;
Life of time, that hints eternity.
  Boughs their strength uprear,
  New shoots every year
  On old growths appear.
Thou shalt teach the ages, sturdy tree,
Youth of soul is immortality.

He who plants a tree,
  He plants love;
Tents of coolness spreading out above
Wayfarers he may not live to see;
  Gifts that grow are best;
  Hands that bless are blest.
  Plant!—Life does the rest!
Heaven and earth help him who plants a tree,
And his work its own reward shall be.

LUCY LARCOM.

Of Timely Application

During a local election in a German town only one man appeared at the nomination desk.

"Whom do you nominate?" inquired the official.

"Myself," was the answer.

"Do you accept the nomination?"

"Well, no."

"Then we must try again. Whom do you nominate?"

"Myself."

"You accept the nomination?"

"No."

A subdued "Donnerwetter!" escaped the lips of the perplexed official, but he went on:

"For the third time, whom do you nominate?"

"Myself," came the invariable suply.

"Do you accept the nomination?"

The man rose with a smile of satisfaction spreading over his face, and he answered proudly:

"Having been three times solicited by my fellow-citizens to accept the nomination, I can no longer decline to accede to their wishes."—The Commoner.

Howell: "Does he take things philosophically?"

Powel: "Yes; but he doesn't part with them philosophically."—Woman's Home Companion.

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS."

Copyright 1911, George H. Doran Co.

CHAPTER V

Walter's mind worked with what he afterward described to himself as an unquestioning obedience to a first impulse, at the center of which was an instantaneous fear of discovery. Before Bauer had taken another step nearer him he had turned, switched off the power from the lamp, and snatched up a hammer from his bench.

With one blow he smashed the electrodes and then, as if made frantic over the act, he struck at the mechanism until it was a heap of bent and twisted wires and metal. It lay on his bench in a tangled mass and he stooped over it and began to sweep it off into the refuse box. Bauer had not yet said a word. Only with the first blow of the hammer he had ejaculated "Ach!" As Walter was flinging bits of the lamp into a box the German student came up and stood near, looking at Walter in astonishment.

"What is the matter?"

Walter simply muttered some unintelligable thing. He was, to tell the truth, tremendously excited, disturbed, overwhelmed by Bauer's return at this particular time.

"I've—I've been experimenting and have failed," he finally managed to say, stammering out the words with great difficulty. He was terrified to think Bauer might read in his face the whole story.

But Felix Bauer was one of the most simple-hearted and unsuspicious souls that ever lived. If he had not been, some of the things that are going to be true in this story could never have happened. He looked at Walter and then at the broken mechanism and simply said: "I am sorry you have failed. But it is nothing by the side of dishonor."

And then for the first time Walter looked openly and squarely into Bauer's face and saw tragedy there. The incandescent light over the bench was not a strong one. But Bauer was close to him and Walter quickly saw that he was not thinking of what Walter had done, was not going to ask him any questions about it, because some other thing was gripping him, some other thing so strong and insistent and sorrowful that it took possession of him and dominated him. Walter's action had already passed out of his mind as simply an incident connected with some disappointing experiment, and he was looking at Walter with an appeal in his great, sad eyes which smote Walter like a blow in the dark.

He felt almost faint and instinctively he sat down. Bauer had gone over to his own desk and stood leaning against it.

"I ought not to come in here and annoy you at this time," he said in his slow, almost stammering manner, "but I—you see, somehow I felt so lonely, so afraid, when I got off the train tonight, that I could not help the desire to see you, and they told me you must be in the shop. Heine says in the Lorelei, you know, 'Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten, das Ich so traurig bin?' But I do know why I am so sad. It is disgrace which has befallen me, such deep disgrace to my home, my father———"

He stopped and looked at Walter timidly as if not quite sure how his confidence might be received. Walter sat with his head bowed, and smitten into silence. He did not know what to say, but Bauer probably took his silence for quiet sympathy, being of that nature himself and mistaking Walter's attitude for earnest attention.

"My father—you will understand what it means—has deserted my mother, and she has run away, the home destroyed is to be, and the disgrace—Oh, it is greater, more than I can endure, I said as I was obliged to come back for my things. It is more than I can bear alone, and you are so strong, so principled."

Walter cowered in his chair, appalled at the thing that was happening to him. Here was a soul in desperate need who had come to fling himself on him for companionship and courage, and he with his own soul stained with deception for the love of fame and money! He would have cried out; he wanted to, but Bauer went on, now he had broken over his natural reserve. He eagerly awaited Walter's sympathy, and his spirit hungered for light in his darkness.

"Yes, you see, I don't know anyone here, and your action about the story telling in your room—I heard of that—I counted it a brave thing to do. And, oh, I am so hungry for a friend! I need one; do you think you could be a friend to me, do you, Douglas? Friend to a disgraced family? It is asking a great deal, but I feel the dark, the dark—it is so heavy for me———"

Bauer, looking at Walter in his almost animal-like appeal, saw at last that there was something he did not understand in Walter's attitude. Walter's mind was not confused by the strange situation, it was clear and vibrating with feeling. But it was a long time before he could speak. How could he tell Bauer the truth now? Why not let him remain in ignorance of the purpose to steal his ideas? Nothing had been done so far to really wrong him. The lamp was destroyed. Walter would not make another, and the basis of a possible friendship, such as Bauer needed, could be established without any explanation or foolish confession.

But somehow Walter could not rest with that suggestion. He felt that if Bauer had his friendship it must rest on truth and a frank outspoken revelation of the character of the soul he was appealing to for help.

It was very still in the big shop when Walter finally looked up and said to Bauer:

"I am not worthy of your friendship. I am not what you think I am."

"Not worthy? Not———" Bauer looked at him in amazement.

"No, not worthy. Look." Walter spoke fast now as if afraid he might fail in courage. "Open your locker! Here! here is the key! You left it with me."

He thrust the key at Bauer, and Bauer turned around, and under the pressure of Walter's look and voice opened his locker and stood in front of it holding on to the door.

"There! That paper! Your plan, your drawing of the lamp! Open it. Let me show———"

Bauer obeyed mechanically. Walter got up and stood by Bauer's table. Bauer slowly unfolded the paper. His look showed he had almost forgotten it.

"There! See! You were on the right track! The soft metal teeth coupled to the electrode! Don't you see?" Bauer's face began to glow for the first time that evening, for he, too, like Walter, had the inventor's sensitive hunger. "You left the paper here the night you were called home. I saw it and copied it before I put it back. I made the model and it works. That is it there," and Walter pointed to the stuff on the table and in the refuse box. "Do you understand? I stole your plans. I was going to get out the lamp without telling you if you had not come back. And I am the person you want for a friend. Am I worthy? Do you understand now?

A dull red began to creep up into the German student's face. He was still holding the locker door with one hand. His eye traveled from the diagram to Walter and then back again. Walter stood very erect, his head thrown back almost defiantly now that he had made his confession, and he was absolutely in the dark as to the effect of it on Bauer. He would and could not blame him for being angry. And he was angry for a moment. But only a moment. Then his great brown eyes softened and he said in a quiet, gentle way that moved Walter more than any burst of passion could have done:

"I am not a judge for you. While on the way home I suddenly thought out the secret of the metal teeth. See! I have it here." He took out of his pocket a paper and opening spread it out on Walter's desk. Walter saw in a second's glance that Bauer had discovered the working basis for the successful light. "And I was going to work on the plan when I came back. But all my trouble drove it away. I lost my ambition. And I understand what you did. I might have done the same. But still, Douglas, do you know, I don't care. I—I am hungry for a friend just like you. What you have said does not change anything. What difference does that make? That is not trouble, not for me."

Walter looked at him a moment and then in the reaction which was really the taking off of the strain of weeks, he put his head between his hands and sobbed. Bauer did not venture to say anything. When Walter could control himself he reached out his hand. Bauer took it, and in that grasp the two young men understood each other for life. I think each gave as much as he took. The sacred compact they sealed in the big empty shop that night was made with few words, but it was never disturbed nor broken in after years.

And each one of them realized something of the depth and joy of real friendship. Do you? Does anybody? Our human friendships, when they are real and permanent, are the finest and richest possessions of our lives. Pity we treat them so lightly and measure them so tamely.

(Continued on page 22.)

Our Readers' Opinions

No Great "Rush" is Probable

Editors The Christian Century:

There is no ground whatever for expecting a great "rush" to such of our congregations as have lately opened their doors to receive all Christians. Church homes are there in abundance, so that any ordinary desire can be sufficiently satisfied. Other things being equal, people usually hold to their old affiliations. Besides, many are no longer, perhaps never again will be, interested in theories concerning the validity of this or that form or practice, and, if occasion require, such as more convenient location, or similar church association, they can readily pursue their Christian life and effort in some other communion.

But, there is something deeper in this contention than an anticipated "rush." It has an educational value. It is a preparatory step to something beyond the immediate result. Men are feeling condemned for the waste seen on all sides in propagating the Master's work. They feel that something ought to be done to stop this waste and overlapping of Christian effort. Even from officers come expressions of desire for relief from needless local burdens and suggestions that the preachers get together and arrange some plan for relief and let the people adjust themselves to it. However, more easily said than done. Now, this contention is educating and preparing people for this very thing; and it is reaching farther than the Disciples, though none, probably, need it more than we.

Upon the mission field there has been a comity arrangement, in order to avoid confusion of the foreign mind and to prevent waste of funds and energy. But the migration of members is now forcing consideration of further arrangements for these members, lest they be altogether lost to the cause, or the comity arrangements be nullified and later work be hindered. Recent movements, among them the canvass of the needs of the West by several home secretaries, are looking toward a similar arrangement upon the home field, in order that the gospel may be preached to all this region with the least expenditure of money and labor. This agitation should do much among the Disciples toward furthering this effort.

Moreover, all over our land are towns and villages with several struggling congregations where one strong one would do much better work. The people usually work and neighbor well together in all good efforts, but cannot tolerate each other's names on the same church roll. If this discussion will help in removing such prejudice and unbrotherly feeling, prepare the people in such places to get together and form a strong church, and present a united front for righteousness and against every form of sin, it will be far better than a grand rush. What church houses could be built in destitute places, and how many preachers freed to tell the gospel story! It would partially solve the problem of scarcity of preachers. It would make more men feel like taking up the work of the ministry. Recently, a preacher—not Disciple—said with disgust, that he was sent to labor for several years where he was not needed save to keep up denominational representation. He felt that he had wasted this much of life. Such things keep many out of the Master's work.

After all, God is the final arbiter, and our acceptance with Him is not likely to depend upon how successfully we have kept some of his children out of our fellowship, but upon how well we have lived in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus.

Sterling, Ill. CHAS. A. STEVENS.

Dr. Sweeney's Final Word.

Editors Christian Century: I ask for a brief space in your paper to set forth in my own way my position concerning the unimmersed. I use an old illustration that has done pulpit service on more than one occasion. A father having three sons leaves home in the morning after commanding them to go into a certain field and plow all day. He strengthens his command by promising a new hat to the one who obeys him, and threatens with punishment the one who disobeys him. The eldest son goes into the field designated by his father and works as commanded. The second son runs off and goes fishing. The third goes into another field and works, saying, "What my father desires is that I shall work. He will not be particular about the field I work in, so I work."

On the return of the father he learns all the facts. By every principle of honor he is bound to give the first boy a hat. By the same principles he is bound to punish the second. What is he to do with the third? He is not bound by the contract to give him a hat, nor is he bound to punish him as a wilfully disobedient son. If I were the father I would take into the account all circumstances, and do right by him. But no one has a right to speak for the father but the father. In the final judgment I hold that God will do exactly right by all who strove to obey him but failed through other causes than wilful disobedience. In human jurisprudence we have both law and equity. If a man wishes to take advantage of the law he must conform to the law. If for good reasons he does not and cannot conform to the law, he may plead equity. He can only do this before the judge. I believe all people who strive to obey Jesus Christ have an equity in salvation. I believe all who strictly conform to the conditions of salvation have it by covenant right.

As a minister of the gospel I promise salvation and church membership to all who conform to the conditions of the gospel. I am not authorized to apply equity. No one is but God.

I love these good people, and fellowship them as far as they conform to the divine commands. If they have the spirit of Christ I extend spiritual fellowship to them. If they practice the commands of Christ, I extend them practical fellowship; but if they fail to conform to the divine forms of the gospel, I try to teach them the way of the Lord more perfectly, and if I fail I refuse to alter those forms to suit their condition and trust them into the hands of Him who will judge righteous judgment. Now this has been for a century the position of all the churches of Christ without exception. In the last issue of The Century [This article was written some weeks ago.] there appear the names of five or six gentlemen who seem greatly shocked that I do not recognize all these good people as members of the body of Christ. There is not a man among them that will do it, not one of them. I submit it as self-evident that no one has a right to bar any member of Christ's body from any fellowship in the church. These gentlemen can talk big in The Century but they sing exceedingly small when an unimmersed man presents himself for admission to their local congregation. My views may not be quite so broad as theirs but I live up to mine. I should be ashamed to ever shut the door in the face of a man who is as much a member of Christ's body as myself. I call on my critics to have the courage of their convictions and come out boldly and take these people into full fellowship in the congregation. Gentlemen, don't let your "commercial interests" prevent you from being true to your convictions! Try it and we will see what will happen. Finally,

New York City. Z. T. SWEENEY.

[See Editorial on page 6—Editors.]

An Urgent Duty

Editors the Christian Century: I have for a long time wanted to suggest that some effort be made to get better reports into the daily papers of our conventions, congresses, etc. We get miserably inadequate representation. The only thing that happened at Portland, according to the several dailies I read, was that Mr. Long defended Mr. Hines. The news of the Kansas City Congress got as far as St. Louis where it was reported there had been a "dispute" between "church delegates" and that J. H. Harrison (this in Brother G's own city) was in controversy with Charles Clayton Morrison.

The Catholics have organized a press association of their own to furnish 250 articles, stories, etc., weekly to the daily press, about Catholic work. Perhaps something may be done for the Protestants by the Men and Religion Forward Movement. Some years ago the Methodists complained to Mr. Melville E. Stone, of the Ascsociated Press and they got more space and more accurate reports. But these bodies help the newspaper men. We take our chances, and you know what we get. PAUL MOORE.

Eustis, Fla.

Opposition Not to be Feared

Editors The Christian Century: Not long ago San Diego, California, passed an ordinance prohibiting speaking on the streets in certain sections of the city. Immediately all the I. W. W's. wanted to speak in the restricted section.

Every man that mounted a soap box was arrested until the San Diego jail was full. Others took their place till a detachment was sent to Santa Ana filling the jail there. Then a car load was sent to Riverside filling the jail at that place. Then a patrol was established at the county line to turn back the bands coming to the rescue of "free speech" in San Diego. Seventy invaders were sent by officers and vigilantes and turned back with sore heads and halting steps. Their story, oft repeated, lost nothing in the telling, and now a thousand men are on their way to San Deigo, each man determined to mount a soap box and vindicate the cause of "free speech." The governor has been obliged to take a hand, having recently sent his personal representative, Harris Weinstock, to investigate the situation.

Is there not a lesson for the Disciples in this story?

Every minister and every church that is castigated by the reactionary press and thrown over the fence out of the brotherhood pasture for taking scriptural ground concerning the Christianity of other churches and our relation to them will cause the unmuzzling of other churches and other preachers. OSCAR SWEENEY.

Oceanside, Cal.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

A Day for Rest and Worship

Our Sunday-school lesson for last Sunday was "The Use of the Sabbath," and the minds of many were turned to the study of this old, yet ever new subject. Most teachers, doubtless, brought out two conceptions that would imperil its highest usefulness—one, placing it on a par with the great fundamental laws of justice, truth and holiness, and throwing around it arbitrary restrictions as the Jews and Puritans did—the other, erasing every safeguard to the day, even those in our civil statutes, and thus robbing society altogether of a day of rest, in the true sense of the word.

The Sabbath Was Made For Man.

The week of seven days may be traced to the dawn of human history, and it seems probable that wherever work existed, the rest day also existed. Assyriologists claim that in the Chaldean and Babylonian inscriptions evidences of a weekly rest day are found. We know the day has been observed for ages by Jews, Christians, Mohammedans, and some pagan nations. This wide observance of the day indicates that it has a natural basis in the constitution of man.

Inquiries instituted by a commission of the British Parliament in 1832, the testimony of 641 physicians in London in a petition to parliament in 1853, and of a great number of medical societies, physiologists, political economists, and managers of industrial establishments, go to prove that in the case of men engaged in ordinary bodily or mental labor, the rest of night does not fully restore the waste of strength during the day, and that to maintain a condition of vigor, a supplementary rest of about one day in seven is needed. This view is confirmed by the experience of France during the Revolution when a rest day of one in ten was substituted for the weekly day; this was found insufficient, and they returned to the old method. An appeal to the experience of every laborer in the land would doubtless swell the overwhelming opinion in favor of the necessity of this periodic rest day. They know,

"That the heavy burden, the bewildering care,
Of those who toil and earn their daily bread,"

must be laid aside at recurring intervals, or both body and brain would sink under the strain.

Americans should be more emphatic than any other nation in this approval of a regular rest day; they are a composite of many races—the energy and tenacity of the Anglo-Saxon is mingled with Celtic intensity and vivacity; whether it be this, or ozone in our atmosphere, or the tremendous pace at which life moves in our land, we know not—but certainly life is a rush and a race with us, and every one who keeps up with the procession at all, only does so by keeping himself keyed up to concert pitch. We would not complain of it—no one would wish existence to move at a snail's pace. What does Tennyson say,

"'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
More life, and fuller, that we want!"

And even though our nerves do give way under the stress of it, why, it is far better to wear out, than to rest out! But it is better still to take intelligent care of our minds and bodies, and even though we are on the crest of the high tide of the life abundant of our day, to make them last as long as they can, and render the best service possible.

As a nation, we seem now to be awake to the necessity of recreation; everybody must have his vacation, from the cook in the kitchen to the minister in the pulpit. This awakening to the need of a holiday should make us appreciate all the more the weekly rest day as a means toward physical and mental health.

What is Rest?

The Jewish idea of rest, and later the Puritanical idea, seemed to be as nearly total cessation from work as possible. But is not that a false idea of it? Some types and some races may find a certain sweetness in doing nothing, but to a restless, high-strung people like the American utter idleness is torture. A truer definition of rest would be change of employment. If one has been sitting at a desk all week, wise rest for him would be exercise of the body in motion. A trip to the woods, a walk in the fields, would be far more beneficial than sitting on his porch, reading the Sunday paper. But neither cessation of work, nor change of work can give perfect rest. You may lock up your shops and your offices, and either do nothing or engage in some congenial recreation, and still fail to find rest. How few lock up their cares in their places of business, and leave them behind on Saturday night! The spectre care stalks home with you, often weighs like a nightmare on your breast at night, and sits by your side in the day.

A Day of Rest, Plus a Day of Worship.

So, to leave the spiritual significance out of the Sabbath would be to rob it of the true secret of rest; it would be like the play of Hamlet, with the character of Hamlet left out. When God first instituted the Sabbath, we are told that he sanctified it—it is a day of rest, plus a day of spiritual activity. The only real rest for the care worn soul is to draw nigh to Him, who careth for all his children, and thus learn to cast all your care on Him. Thus, only, is your rest made perfect—for there is no such thing as complete rest of body, with a mind anxious and troubled with many things.

And how much nobler is the Christian Lord's day than the Jewish Sabbath!—a day of liberty, with not a single "Thou shalt not" again it—a perpetual memorial of the Lord Jesus Christ and his glorious resurrection! If we did nothing but meet together for the breaking of bread and prayers, how sacred the loving remembrance that is thus brought up!

Meaning of Communion.

I never realized the meaning and vitality of that ordinance until a few years ago, when I was staying in a village where there was no preacher for the little church, and no one qualified to speak so as to edify the worshippers; so, after Sunday-school, we met to observe the Lord's Supper, and with song and prayer and reading of the Scriptures, we held fellowship one with the other in the celebration of the memorial feast. And what a feast it was!—looking back to the Lord who died for us, looking up to the Lord who lives for us, looking forward to the Lord who will come again! And through it all examining ourselves, lest we eat that heavenly feast unworthily. Is it not enough to quiet our troubled hearts, and strengthen our feeble hands—even though we may lack a man of God to open the scriptures to us, as our good ministers do all over the land every first day of the week? If we are thus in the spirit on the Lord's Day, we shall not need to be told, thou shalt not go on a Sunday excursion, thou shalt not go to Sunday base ball, or Sunday theatres, or any other place of doubtful propriety; on the day when we have partaken of heavenly things in Christ Jesus, we are not in tune for the jostling, the clamor, the disquiet of such things.

So, while I would accent the necessity of rest for mind and body in this busy day and busy nation of ours, I would accent still more the rest of heart that comes from communion with holy things—the loving remembrance that on this day our Lord rose from the dead, and on this day we strive to draw near him in the memorial feast be instituted and to grow more like him in preparation for the time when we shall see him face to face in the heavenly feast above.

I. W. H.

Woman's Doings

—Miss Claudia Lyon, daughter of Col. Cecil Lyon, republican national committeeman for Texas, will name the new dreadnaught Texas, which will be launched May 13, at Newport News, Va. The vessel, which will be the largest battleship afloat, was built by the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Company.

—A memorial to Mrs. Mary A. Bickerdyke is to be erected at Savannah, Tenn. Mrs. Bickerdyke (Mother Bickerdyke, as she was called) first became prominent at the battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh. It was her work at Savannah, Tenn., after the battle of Shiloh that gained for her the popular title of the Brigadier Commanding Hospitals.

—Women with fortunes are often generous givers. Mrs. Russell Sage has given an additional $65,000 to Princeton University to go toward the completion of Holder Hall. The whole of Holder Hall, including Holder Tower, is the gift of Mrs. Sage. The section for which the additional gift is to be used is the university dining halls. Mrs. J. K. Paine has given $38,000 to Harvard to establish the John Knowles Paine fellowship in music; Mrs. Caroline M. Barnard has given $24,000, and Mrs. C. R. Sanger many books and pamphlets from the library of the late Prof. Charles Robert Sanger.

—Miss Hosanna Maligian, of Brockton, Mass., is believed to be the youngest physician in Massachusetts. She is only twenty years old, and has been practicing three months.

—Mrs. E. C. Carter, who was lost on the Titanic, was a daughter of Thomas Hughes, author of "Tom Brown's School Days."

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Robert W. Moore, pastor of White Hall church, will deliver the memorial address for the G. A. R. in his home town.

Evangelist Roy L. Brown's meeting at Third Church, Danville, had resulted in more than eighty additions in slightly more than one week's time.

E. L. Lewis, of Zearing, Iowa, will succeed Sheeler Campbell as pastor of Girard Church. It is understood his ministry there will begin at an early date.

Franklin church pastorate has been accepted by J. E. Teaney of Iowa. The new ministry has already been inaugurated, and with excellent promise of success.

Windsor church has invested in a property to be used as a parsonage. The church here is reported to be in good condition under the ministry of E. U. Smith.

The Macomb meeting, led by Fife Brothers, evangelists, opened auspiciously. There were ten additions the first Sunday, with exceptionally large congregations. The minister is Allen T. Shaw.

W. B. Oliver has become pastor of Cuba church, left pastorless some time ago by the removal of A. I. Zeller, to Petersburg. The minister and his wife have been cordially received by the congregation.

Hoopeston church, of which Andrew Scott recently became pastor, had ten additions to its membership during last month, with increasing Sunday congregations and other departments of the church showing an improvement.

The church at Chicago Heights brought their offering for American missions up to $90. They expect to make it $100. Last year they gave $20. There were 280 in the Sunday-school. E. D. Salkeld is the efficient pastor.

W. H. Waggoner of Eureka lectured recently at Virginia in a missionary institute lasting for a week. His lectures, illustrated with stereopticon views, maps, charts and curios, were said to be most instructive and profitable.

Quincy church, where Clyde Darsie formerly ministered, has called J. M. Bell of McKinney, Texas. It is understood the call has been accepted, and that in a short time the new pastor will assume his duties with the congregation.

The new church at Virden, costing $30,000, will be dedicated Sunday, May 19. The pastor, A. M. Hale, will be assisted by E. L. Powell of Louisville, Ky., as dedicator. The church is making generous plans for the consecration of its fine, new structure.

R. D. Brown, pastor of Leroy church, was reported recently to have met with a painful accident. He was driving a fractious horse which, becoming frightened, threw him from the carriage badly bruising him about the face and body. It is understood that no serious consequences will result, but that the injury sustained was painful and incapacitated the preacher for a number of days.

The resignation of Robert A. Sickles from from Illiopolis church is announced. Mr. Sickles has been pastor of this church for more than three years, and has done a notable work. It is not learned what his plans for the future are, but unquestionably he will be in demand for another good pastorate after the first of July. A strong man will also be wanted to succeed him in the Illiopolis pastorate.

The corner stone of the new Normal church was laid with appropriate exercises, Sunday, May 5. This is the church building begun by J. H. Gilliland, and whose sudden taking away leaves the uncompleted structure to other hands for completion. The structure will cost approximately $30,000. Among those appearing on the program are the following ministers: E. A. Gilliland, J. Fred Jones, E. D. Jones, and Milo Atkinson. Among the contents of the corner stone box was a copper plate inscribed "To the honor of J. H. Gilliland and wife", and a photograph of the deceased pastor.

Englewood church, Chicago, has begun to build a Sunday-school addition to their church home, to cost about $17,000. The new building will provide a balcony divided into class-rooms; the space underneath to be similarly divided. Seating capacity of building, including the class-rooms, is estimated at 750, and will be arranged to open into the church auditorium when needed. The basement will be provided with kitchen and dining room conveniences. The gymnasium will be of standard dimensions and provide shower baths, dressing rooms, lockers, etc. The plans are prepared with a view of a new structure for the church auditorium when it may be necessary to build larger.

E. E. Hartley's church at Flanagan is furnishing an interesting division for its Boy Scouts. Instead of a mere purposeless content, it has elected to work off surplus energy in campaigns of real profit. Accepting the dictum of physicians and scientists that flies are carriers of disease, a reward of one dollar is being offered each week for the boy killing the largest number of flies and submitting his victims to account. The fight on flies is beginning while the number is yet insignificant, and with the understanding that killing one fly early in the season spares the community from a multitude of its progeny. Later in the season prizes will be offered for the most expert and thorough cleaning of yards. The business men and doctors of the community are furnishing the prizes. This is a commendable piece of work for the advancement of health and civic cleanliness, and for the higher culture of the boys whose hands are put to worth-while tasks. Civic and personal pride will be enhanced by it.

Secretary's Letter.

The new church at Brownstown was dedicated May 5 by the pastor, F. O. Fannon. It is a splendid modern building in every way, and will add very much to the power of the church in that community.

Over most of Illinois the weather conditions for the May offering were fairly good and we hope the returns will be gratifying. Follow it up for a week or two to be sure to get all the offerings and pledges in, then remit promptly to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, O. Make the offerings at least equal to your previous home and state offerings combined, for this is a joint offering. If the returns will justify it we will not call for the November offering. Keep this in mind.

We are just in receipt of a check for $150 from a lady to be placed in our permanent fund as a memorial to her good mother. The principal will be held sacred and only the interest will be used in the work of state missions forever. This is a most excellent way to perpetuably honor the memory of a loved one. Our people ought more and more to take this method of erecting monuments that will not crumble but will go on preaching the gospel of our Lord.

The district conventions are close at hand, the Third district comes first at Dallas City May 14-16. After that they come as follows:

June 4-6, Fourth district, Toluca.
June 5-7, Fifth district, Illiopolis.
June 11-13, First district, Walnut.
June 18-20, Sixth district, De Land.
June 19-21, Seventh district, Olney.
June 25-27, Eighth district, Elkville.

All these conventions ought to be largely attended by preachers, church officers, business men, and all who can go. The programs are all carefully arranged, practical and helpful.

The Southern Ministerial Institute will be held at Fairfield May 14-16, and its program promises a rich feast. S. S. Lappin is on for two addresses. Go early and stay late.

At the regular meeting of the state board May 7 three new members of the board of directors were elected: E. A. Gilliland to fill out the unexpired term of J. H. Gilliland, deceased; E. M. Smith of Decatur in the place of J. W. Kilborn, who has accepted a call to Pennsylvania; and H. H. Peters of Eureka in the place of W. F. Turner, who has gone to North Yakama, Wash. There have been five changes on the board this year, two by death and three removals from the state.

L. E. Chase of New Bedford has accepted a call to Palmyra, June 1.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.
W. D. Deweese, Office Secy.-Treas.
Bloomington, Ill.

—Miss Jane Addams, whose book A New Conscience and an Ancient Evil is published this week, has been making a good deal of talk because of her vaudeville debut. Appearing at the Majestic Theatre in Chicago between the regular acts on the bill, she spoke for eight minutes on the woman suffrage question. The Chicago Record-Herald in commenting upon the event says: "Judging from the welcome accorded Miss Addams when her 'turn' was announced and from the applause she received upon its conclusion, she would have been welcome for many more minutes than eight." When Miss Addams was interviewed after her appearance she said that while the footlights bothered her she did not in the least suffer from stage fright.

Church Life

O. E. Hamilton recently closed a meeting at Hennesy, Okla., with 101 additions.

E. E. Mack has resigned at Atlantic, Iowa, and has taken up the work at Cherokee.

A. Homer Jordan has resigned his ministry at Lorain, O. About 150 have been added in two and a half years and a debt of $4,700 provided for.

B. H. Bruner has resigned the church at Highland Ave., Cleveland, O., and Wm. Hennessy has succeeded him.

David Lyon has resigned his ministry for the Central Avenue Church, Topeka, Kan., to take effect immediately.

The Roy L. Brown Evengelistic Co., held a meeting recently at Danville, Ill., with 102 additions in fifteen days.

W. H. Brown, Martinsville, Ind., has accepted a call to Brooklyn, Ind., and is already located in his new field.

Crayton S. Brooks is assiting H. E. Stafford in a meeting at Massillon, O. There have been sixty additions so far.

O. Alvin Smith, as evangelist, and Allen M. Freeman, as song evangelist, will hold a meeting at Richardson, Texas, on July 7.

Lynchburg, Ohio, is building a $4,000 addition to their building to accommodate the needs of the growing Sunday-school. C. E. Elmore is the minister.

E. A. Newby delivered his farewell sermon in the Fairview Church, Wichita, Kan., on Sunday, May 5. J. A. Crain, of Tonkawa, Okla., will succeed him.

Wilhite and Shaul are in a meeting with J. O. Rose's church, Warsaw, Ind., with twenty-three added to date and fine prospects for a great meeting.

The First Christian Church at Richmond, Ky., where E. B. Barnes ministers, has let the contract for a new $40,000 building. Work is to be begun at once.

The state secretary of Ohio reports that over 22 "volunteer meetings" have been held in the state recently for the purpose of building up the work in the weak points.

A. McLean has been giving a series of missionary addresses at Cotner University, Bethany, Neb. He has also held several conferences with the volunteer band.

E. L. Frazier has just closed his second year at St. Petersburg, Fla. Seventy-two have been added to the church and a new houses of worship built and parsonage fitted up.

A. R. Harper began his labors with the church at Mount Pleasant, Mich., on April 21. This church has been without a minister for nearly two years. Five confessions April 28.

I. S. Chenoweth leaves the 169th Street Church, New York City, to become pastor of the First Church, Philadelphia, succeeding L. E. Sellers, who goes back into the evangelistic field.

A. D. Skaggs recently constituted a church at Mabton, Ore., with fifty-three members. One good sister donated an acre in town on which to build a house of worship and parsonage.

C. R. Moore has accepted a call to minister for the congregation at Anaheim, Cal. A. B. Markle, the regular minister, who is seventy-one years old, has retired from the ministry and settled at Anaheim.

Finis Idleman, pastor of Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, was in attendance on the New York conservation congress. C. S. Medbury occupied the pulpit of the central church for the morning sermon.

G. W. Coffman, who has been engaged in missionary work in India, will be home the last of June and will be ready to take up pastoral work with some live church. Address R. F. D. 1, Box 114, Sebeka, Minn.

W. J. Clarke, Adult Bible-class superintendent of the Woodland Church, Lexington, Ky., is doing the preaching in a meeting with his home church. The Brotherhood Class is in charge of the services.

The church in Evanston, Ohio, where A. M. Harvout is minister gave $40 per capita for missions last year, constituting the best record of any church in the state of Ohio and certainly one of the best in the whole brotherhood.

Mrs. Orsie A. Udell, wife of F. E. Udell, who died April 29, was buried in St. Louis, May 5, four days after her husband was laid to rest. Mrs. Udell was a devoted Christian and the loving companion of her husband for fifty-three years.

"The New Mexico-West Texas convention and encampment will be held at Cloudcroft, 'The Roof-Garden of the Southwest,' June 5-12. I. N. McCash, J. H. Mohorter and Randolph Cook will be with us." So writes Secretary F. F. Grim.

The Presbyterians last year gave for Home Missions the sum of $1,800,000. We know what the offering for Home Missions among the Disciples was, but it would not look good by the side of that figure, so we refrain from recording it.

The Ohio State Convention will meet at Canton on May 20, with some prominent speakers and a very interesting program to attract the delegates. "Service, is the watchword of the convention and service the purpose of the program."

The Edison, Neb., meeting led by S. R. McClure and son had a brilliant close. There were thirty-five added the last week, making eighty-two in all. Sixteen men came at the last service. These evangelists are now in a meeting at Arapahoe, Neb.

The new $25,000 church at San Dimas, Calif., is rapidly approaching completion. Meanwhile the congregation meets in a hall. W. E. Spicer baptized three young Japanese recently, the fruits of the teaching of one of his members who conducts a class for Japanese at his home.

S. G. Buckner was the chairman of the local committee of fifty who had charge of the Men and Religion campaign in Ashtabula, O., which was held May 5-8. John Ray Ewers of Pittsburg, was the expert speaker on Social service and Yutaka Minakuchi spoke on missions.

It is reported that while a Dr. Pierson was preaching recently in California on divine healing and insisting that faith and the laying on of hands would be sufficient treatment for all physical ills, he dropped dead in the pulpit and the physicians have not determined the nature of the disease.

R. W. Abberley held a seventeen-days' meeting at Flemmingsburg, Ky., which has just closed with sixteen confessions and seventeen added by letter and statement. Mr. Abberley has won highest commendations. This makes about 115 additions to the church in the last fourteen months.

Robert Whiston is assisting E. M. Flinn at Klamath Falls, Oregon. Twenty have been added the first two weeks. This is the fourth meeting that this evangelist has held for Mr. Flinn. Amity and Lebanon, Ore., follow this effort. Mr. Whiston held meetings in both these fields three years ago. He will return to Bethany Nebr., about the middle of July.

Dr. C. McCollum reports from Vigan, P. I.: Within the last week three young women and three young men have been baptized. Four of these were members of my English Bible-class and two are members of the Ilocano Bible-class. Land has been purchased for the mission and plans are being made for the erection of a good building for dormitory and school purposes."

Mothers' Day was observed last Sunday in Central Church, New York City. The pastor, Dr. Philputt, spoke at the morning service on "Mary, the Ideal Mother." Every mother attending the Sunday-school session received a white carnation. This church will put special emphasis on its music for the coming year. A quartet of trained voices has been carefully selected under the leadership of Mr. De Loss Smith .

According to figures reported, 555,894 men studied the Bible in organized classes or clubs last year. In the world's Sunday-school classes 28,011,199 men, women, boys and girls are enrolled. Last year the Oxford Press alone issued 640,000 copies of the Bible. One church on foreign soil placed an order for 20,000 New Testaments and sold them all before order could be filled.

The magnitude of the task of the church in America appears from a recent report to the effect that there are more than 48,000,000 adults in the United States without any church affiliation whatever. There are more churchless people in America than there are in Japan and the Philippines. And the worst of it is that they are sophisticated to such a degree that it not an easy matter to get them even to consider the matter.

Edward B. Bagby, for the past four years minister of the First Christian Church, Fort Smith, Ark., has resigned to go to the Twenty-fifth St. Church, Baltimore, Md. During his pastorate there have been 322 additions to the church and $31.000 raised for all purposes. A debt of $8,500 was paid on the First Church property, a new pipe-organ installed, and the Echols Memorial Church built and a preacher employed.

The Ohio disciples are planning to open a work in Middletown where we have been without an organization hitherto. The pastor of the United Presbyterian Church has written to say that the town is not overchurched and that he thinks at least 150 people would respond to the invitation to help the Disciples get established and he urges the State board to make the move. Middletown is a place of 13.000 inhabitants.

Seventy-seven have been added to the membership of the Central Church, Lampasas, Tex., since March 17. Directly and indirectly this is a result of the co-operative meeting in which the four Protestant churches of the city participate. The church has been greatly strengthened by these additions, as many of them were men. A Brotherhood is now being organized, and a strong Bible-school built up. Ernest J. Bradley is the able leader.

Many of the churches are beginning to realize the possibility of good in making Easter a day for decision. More did so this year than ever before. Even the churches which do not plan to grow by means of special evangelistic efforts as well as those who have a yearly meeting as a part of the program, find that the anniversary of the resurrection is the psychological moment for seeking to commit men and especially young people to definite alignment for Jesus Christ.

W. Remfry Hunt says Chuchow City is ripe for the best evangelism. The liberals are all ardent Republicans and are urging reforms. Dr. Osgood hopes to organize a modern school system in the schools of the town. The strong young men are turning to Christ. Brother Hunt utilizes their classical writings and aims to win them by a sympathetic catholic method. In spare time, mostly after nightfall, Mr. Hunt is finishing the story of our veteran story-teller evangelist, Shikwei Bias.

Winamac, Ind., May 5.—Assisted Minister E. Miller dedicate best church building in Pulaski County. Seven thousand needed to pay all debts. This was given. Then we raised three thousand dollars surplus for purchase of parsonage and equipment of basement for library and gymnasium. Seventeen additions to-day. Continue three days in short meeting following dedication. For Brother Fillmore at Indianapolis, there were sixty additions from most desirable families of Hillside community."—Geo. L. Snively.

J. B. Holmes went to Pendelton, Oregon, last November to try to save the building to the church, which was in danger of being lost and which few had any idea of being able to save. There was a heavy debt on the property and this, after a dedication in which it had been announced that the full amount had been raised. By the help of three missionary societies, the State Board, the C. W. B. M., and the Church Extension Society, a way was found to provide for the $22,000 of debt and everything is now prosperous, and the outlook is encouraging.

Governor Eberhart and his private secretary, Ralph W. Wheelock, representing the state, and Alderman Selover, president of the council, representing the city, were the principal speakers at a banquet given by the Bible-class of Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Minn., at the West Hotel last night. J. G. Slayter, pastor, was master of the ceremonies. The governor spoke on the varied and many opportunities of the young men of this age to make their way in life. Alderman Selover outlined the plan of the city government in Minneapolis, and J. L. McCaull spoke on the "Necessity of Efficiency."

J. M. Lowe has returned from California where he assisted Paul E. Wright at Santa Anna in a meeting with sixty additions as the result of the four weeks' effort. The location of the Santa Anna church is the best in the city and their work is very prosperous. Mr. Lowe visited the Southern California Ministerial Association at Los Angeles and enjoyed the fellowship of the brethren assembled there. He also stopped by El Paso and preached for P. J. Rice in El Paso, Texas. Mr. Lowe hopes to visit the southwest again soon. The month of June is open with him.

Edna Pauline Dale is living with Mrs. W. R. Hunt in Shanghai during the revolution. Miss Dale is one of our consecrated workers in one of the hardest fields in China. W. R. Hunt says the new China is full of glad surprises. He writes full of joy and hope. He has been preaching and distributing literature to the armies of the Republican government in Auhwei, where famine, pestilence, flood and war have devastated the once fair regions of waving corn and rich lands of grain. Mr. Hunt pleads for men of the largest culture and with a passion to save men to come to China and to give themselves definitely to the evangelistic field.

"O. L. Lyon, head of the English Department in Texas Christian University, closed a two-weeks' meeting with us last night with thirty-five additions; fifteen confessions. All but one of the twenty-eight were adults. The church was relieved of financial embarrassment and a wholesome revival is evident among the membership. Prof. Lyon held the meeting under a heavy physical strain, teaching seven classes a day in the University and then riding seven miles to Riverside, then back again to his classes in the morning. The Riverside Church is just two and one-half miles from the heart of Fort Worth. The future for this church looks bright. Yours in Christ."—S. W. Hutton, pastor.

B. S. Ferrall, pastor at Buffalo, N. Y., writes: "Our short meeting of seventeen days with Wright and Saxton closed recently with seventy-three added. Mostly by primary obedience. Wright is a speaker of power and his song leader one of the best I ever heard. There were twenty-three men and young men among the converts. One of the rare privileges of the campaign was that of taking the confession of five young men from the Chinese department of our school. There was an addition at the big reception tendered the new members last night at which a pretty baptismal certificate, a copy of the New Testament and a box of duplex offering envelopes were presented to the converts."

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

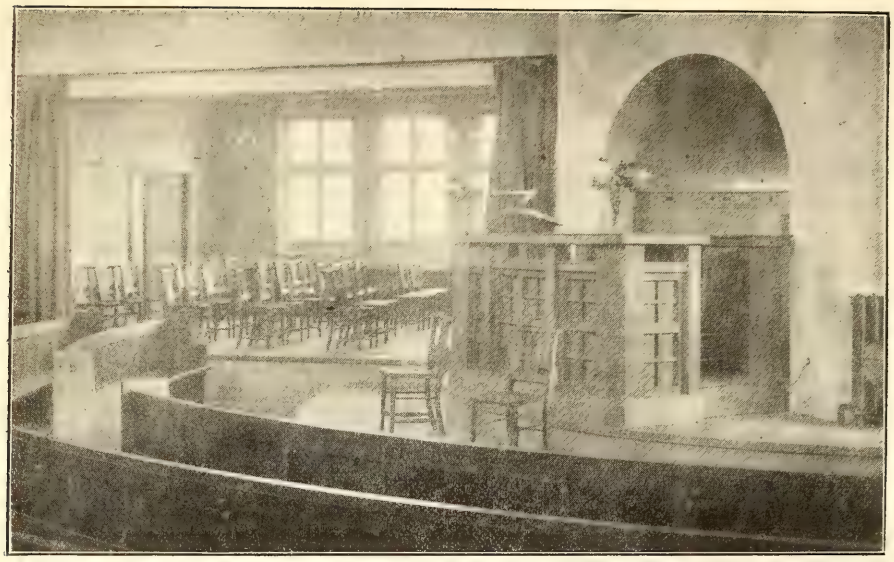
Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS
The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago



Interior View of New Hornsey Church, London, Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, Pastor

Mr. Charles Traxler.

Dr. Arthur Homes, of the University of Pennsylvania, was the chief speaker at the triennial convention of the C. W. B. M. of New York City district held May 14, at 169th Street church. Dr. Holmes also spoke at the Disciples' Missionary Union banquet in the evening.

"Love Stories of Missionaries" was the subject of a novel and interesting service at the Oceanside, Calif., church one recent Sunday. Mrs. Oscar Sweeney, wife of the pastor, presided. Four young women, two of whom were school teachers, told the love stories of Adoniram Judson, Robert Moffat, David Livingston, and Dr. Macklin. The fact that one of the young ladies expects to go as a missionary to Africa added to the interest of the occasion.

A special meeting, conducted by Evangelist H. F. Lutz, at the Borough Park Church, Brooklyn, closed April 28. During the meeting thirty-four united with the church by statement. Fred S. Nichols, who has served this church since last September, has closed his work. Mr. Nichols was studying in Union Seminary while attending to pastoral duties. He will probably return to Illinois where his former pastorate at Table Grove was exceptionally successful.

Bernard Gruenstein of Selma, Ala., evidently is not slowing up on his work because he has resigned his pastorate. He writes that he has just raised $500 cash for the relief of survivors and sufferers in the flooded areas of the Mississippi Valley, to be disbursed by the American Red Cross Society. He raised this amount in two weeks. Mr. Bernstein also writes that he is at the head of a Graded Union Movement for Selma, having been made chairman of a special committee to project such a union among the eight Sunday-schools of the town if found urgent and practicable.

Mrs. B. C. Hagerman, wife of President Hagerman, of the Campbell-Hagerman College, died in Chicago, May 3. Interment was had in Bethany, West Virginia, on the following Sunday. Mrs. Hagerman was the granddaughter of Alexander Campbell and one of the links uniting this generation with the fathers of the movement. Being one of the first if not the first woman to graduate from Bethany College, Mrs. Hagerman continued to advance the cause of education by her association with her husband in the work of the college which bore the family name. Mrs. Hagerman is survived by her husband and mother and daughter. Memorial services were held at Lexington, Ky., at the hour of the funeral in Bethany, I. J. Spencer, a life-long friend, having charge of the exercises.

The Bolengi missionaries report 65 baptisms on March 25, which brings the local church membership to 1,000 besides about as many more in the other churches which have grown out of the direct effort of the mother church. Lonkoko, the "first fruits" of the mission, was baptized in the fall of 1902 about nine and a half years ago, when the work grew steadily though slowly from the first. When Mr. Faris retired from the field and Dr. Dye took charge, in the spring of 1904, the membership was still under 100, though there were eight evangelists supported by the native church. It is a great joy to the workers and the home churches to note the marvellous growth. One feature of the services last March was the baptizing of converts by the native elders, which is the first time baptism has been administered by any but a white man. One of the elders supports his own evangelist. The Ba-Loi, a tribe of slave raiders has been entered and some converts from them were baptized on this occasion.

The churches of the state of Washington are considering the establishment of an institution of learning at Spokane. The nearest institution of the kind to them is the one in Bethany, Nebraska, Cotner University. It is felt that there is a need for a denominational college or university and that it is possible to build it in Spokane. Of course there is little danger of getting too many schools if they are built on the right basis. The ideal small college ought not to have much over 400 or 500 students in it and that means that it will take a great many of them to accommodate the increasing throng of American youth who will seek the advantages that are to be obtained there. But the fact still stares us in the face that the Disciples have no institution of real university standing, though there are three or four colleges which are receiving deserved recognition. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the brethren in Washington will be able to secure really adequate financial support before the institution is launched.

A great meeting of the Brotherhoods of Disciples of Christ in Greater Pittsburgh was held last Sunday at the First Church, North Side. Three hundred and forty-nine men were present. John Ray Ewers presided. The special music was furnished by the Belmar Male Quartet and the male quartet of the First Church, North Side. Dr. George W. Gerwig, secretary of the Pittsburgh public schools, read the Scripture lesson and Jesse C. Crawford, a member of Central Church, led the great assembly in prayer. E. E. Elliott spoke on the work of the National Brotherhood in a most telling manner. He spoke as a business man to business men. Prof. W. C. Payne gave an introduction and outline of a great speech on "The Elements of Organized Work in the Church." Owing to the limited time given to Professor Payne it was impossible for him to deliver the message which he had prepared and which was so greatly needed by that large, representative body of church workers. A committee was appointed to conserve the effects of the meeting by bringing a large number of men's organizations represented at last Sunday's meeting into direct affiliation with the Brotherhood movement.

To Tourists in England

Tourists to England during this summer are cordially invited by Leslie W. Morgan, the pastor, to attend the Sunday services at the Church of Christ, Wightman Rd., Hornsey, N. London. The West London Tabernacle was once the mecca of Disciple tourists, but since that work has been closed Hornsey is the natural substitute.

Take the tube to Finsbury Park, and then by Muswell Hill tram (street car), to Wightman Road, or by train to Hornsey station.

Services are at 11 a. m. and 6:30 p. m. Mr. Morgan will be pleased to hear from intending visitors and will gladly give them any help within his power. He may be addressed, "Wringcliff," Priory Rd., Hornsey, N. London.

The Hornsey Church has lately dedicated a comfortable and useful house of worship. For years the congregation has met in a temporary iron structure. Their new church home was made possible by the generosity of Mr. Charles Traxler, a devoted American Disciple, now a resident of London, who gave in all over $7,500. He is the chief supporter of all financial enterprises of this young congregation and a leader of Disciples in England. In the plans now afoot for paying off the remainder of the debt on Hornsey Church, Mr. Traxler leads off with an offer that challenges the people to do their utmost. "Better than all," says Mr. Morgan, "he is the most valuable church worker and helper I have ever known. He lends a hand to every department, and excels in getting other people to work." Mr. Traxler formerly lived in Akron, O. His religion is of that kind that does not suffer in being transplanted.

Hiram College Notes

Hiram College notes:

Preparations are being completed for an unusually elaborate commencement season in Hiram commencing the last of the first week of June and extending over into the second week. Although the actual time devoted to commencement exercises has been shortened this year, no part of the usual program has been omitted. The Hesper and Alethean literary societies will together stage "An American Citizen," a comedy in four acts written by Madeleine L. Ryley and considered of unusual merit. The big musical event will be the presentation of "Patience," a comic opera. Professor Rollo A. Talcott, of the department of oratory is directing the first play and Professor Sadlier, of the musical department, the second.

Although smaller in number, the Senior class of this year has won a high place of esteem with the student body and faculty through their good class work and because of their active interest in the general activities of college life. It is rumored also that the class has planned one of the most enjoyable "Sugar Days" ever given by a graduating class of Old Hiram. In the class are eight young men who expect to enter the ministry. One member, O. F. Barcus, has already received an appointment as missionary to China and will leave for that field after spending another year in Hiram.

Recently Hiram students have had the priviledge of listening to a number of speakers, including old students who have brought messages of inspiration and interest. Harold Baker, a graduate of class '09, who has worked three years in Buffalo, spent his last day in America previous to departing for the mission field in Thibet, in Hiram, addressing the students at the Sunday morning services, April 28. J. C. Archer, returned missionary from India, now doing graduate work in Yale university, spent one day renewing old acquaintances and visiting his alma mater. Mr. Archer spoke to the students at chapel session. Mrs. Oliver W. Stewart, wife of the well-known temperance orator, addressed two public meetings in Hiram recently on the subject of Woman's Suffrage. Mrs. Stewart has a winning personality and pleasing speech and delivered a convincing lecture.

Professor E. E. Snoddy has been filling the pulpit of the Euclid Avenue Christian church for several weeks in the absence of pastor J. H. Goldner, who is on a tour through Europe. Professor George Peckham has returned from a hurried trip to California, where he was called by the serious illness of his son.

O. T. L.

The India Mission

The annual report of the India Mission of the Disciples of Christ for the year just closed is now out. It is a well printed booklet, and will be a surprise to many people, as it shows what Indian workmen may do. The report was printed in our own mission press at Jubbulpore, with little American supervision, and what it did have was by missionaries who know little or nothing of press work.

The territory covered by the mission in an extensive one. There are fourteen centers or "stations" where we have mission bungalows, and where missionaries are stationed. Unfortunately, one of these, Hatta, was closed a large part of last year owing to the fewness of our missionaries. The area of this field is over 13,000 square miles, and the population considerably over 2,000,000. In all this vast area, only we are preaching; no other mission has anything to do among these folk. Connected with these central stations are twenty-one outstations, where Christian workers live and carry on schools and evangelistic work. In the area worked there are about 1,500 villages, some of but a few houses, while others have as many as 8,000 inhabitants in them. There are many other villages too in which we ought to be trying to preach, but it is simply impossible to do so. In some of the villages we preach weekly, or even oftener; in others perhaps but once a year.

Sixty missionaries were accredited to India in 1911. Some of these went on furlough during the year, and some came out from home during the year. Others were quite new, and their chief occupation was getting ready for future work. Sickness interfered with the work of some. In addition to these, 233 Christian workers, natives of the country, were employed in different Christian activities. Eighty-three non-Christians were employed, chiefly as teachers in schools.

Fifty-three evangelists were employed in preaching the gospel. Of these, three had been trained by G. L. Wharton, and nineteen in the Bible College. Twenty-eight have had no training, some of them because they are not qualified to receive much. Thirteen Bible women, and a few untrained, taught 1,475 women in their zenanas. There were seven physicians and one nurse. They and their twenty-five assistants managed nine hospitals and fifteen dispensaries, treating 1,336 impatients and 64,190 out patients, with 122,235 separate treatments; 1,168 operations were performed.

In three girls' orphanages there were 394 girls, and in one boys' orphanage, 241 boys. In the Industrial Home for Women and Children there were eighty-two and thirty-six children; 143 lepers were in three leper asylums. In the Bible College there were twenty young men and fifteen young women preparing for Christian work. In the boys' high school there were 107 boys. Sixteen girls were in the girls' normal school, 571 pupils in the six middle schools, and 2,730 pupils in the forty-three schools. In all 3,424 pupils were receiving secular education.

There were sixty-four baptisms during the year. The present membership is 1,372. Sixty-two Sunday-schools have 200 teachers, with 1,126 Christian and 2,726 non-Christian pupils, a total of 3,852. There are ten Endeavor Societies with 462 members.

The work is a great one. It grows faster than our ability to handle it. With a doubled force we could treble the work we are doing. Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest that he send forth reapers into the harvest.

GEO. WM. BROWN.

Jubbulpore, April 4, 1912.

Conference of the Association of Colleges

The Association of Colleges, of the Disciples of Christ, had their spring conference at Indianapolis, May 7 and 8, together with the National Bible School Field Workers' Association. College representatives were present from Butler, Hiram, Eureka, Transylvania, Christian University, Cotner, and Columbia, while regrets were received from several other schools which found it impossible to have representatives present. Dean Charles R. Brown, of Yale Theological Seminary, was with the association for a day and gave it the benefit of his wide religious educational experience. With Pres. T. C. Howe, of Butler, president of the association, in the chair, the conference was concerned with two things, first, a closer relationship between the colleges and the Bible-schools of our brotherhood, and second, more complete co-operation among our colleges themselves.

The first matter was presented to the conference by Pres. R. H. Crossfield, of Transylvania, chairman of a committee that had gone thoroughly into the subject of a correlation of all educational interests among the Disciples. The suggestion was made that a Summer School of Methods established at as many of our colleges as possible would be an effective means of increasing the knowledge of Bible-school problems and methods, and making the colleges of more direct service to the church. These Schools of Methods would be atended, it was contemplated, by Bible-school workers, teachers and college students; they should be largely self-sustaining during their six-weeks' existence each summer, and gradually a relationship between our colleges and our Bible-schools would grow, similar to that between the state universities and the high schools. This presentation of the committee was followed by hearty endorsement by many of the men present, and then Robert M. Hopkins, American Bible-school superintendent, delivered an address on the Bible-school Outlook for the Disciples of Christ, in which he laid especial emphasis on just such a need as President Crossfield had noted. This general subject was discussed at one other joint meeting of the college men and the Bible-school workers. The other conferences of the two organizations were held separately.

The second topic considered by the college section concerned itself with the need of co-operation between our colleges themselves. Chancellor William Oeschger, of Cotner University, was chairman of the committee that reported on this matter, making certain recommendations. Associated with him were Mr. Crossfield, President Charles E. Underwood, of Eureka, President Miner Lee Bates, of Hiram and Chancellor Lewis S. Cupp, of Christian University. One of the recommendations was that a uniform statistical blank be prepared and circulated among the colleges of the association, thus attempting to secure definite information as to the resources, equipment and aims of each school, with a view to securing complete co-operation among all the colleges in the realization of these combined aims. Other means of securing this co-operation were presented and will be considered further by the association. A second recommendation was that a publicity secretary be appointed, to whom each college should make a monthly report and who from these reports should compile news notes for our religious journals. This was in line with the requests of the papers themselves and was immediately adopted by the association. President Underwood, of Eureka, a man with invaluable newspaper experience acquired in former years, was appointed publicity secretary.

The Louisville convention will not be without its educational program, Monday forenoon, October 21, having been given over to the Association of Colleges. A program committee, Messrs. Underwood, Cupp and Oeschger, are in charge of arrangements for that half day and will have announcements ready in the near future.

The two very hopeful things about the conference were the cementing of closer relationships between the Bible-schools and our colleges in a common educational purpose, with the far-reaching benefits that will accrue to both, and the actual steps that were taken to launch a unified educational propaganda among the Disciples. The stress of the two days' work was greatly lessened by the gracious hospitality of the C. W. B. M., in throwing open the Missionary Training School for the entertainment of the delegates. Prof. C. T. Paul, Dr. H. C. Hurd and Miss Rebel Withers, of the Training School faculty, were untiring in their efforts for the comfort of their guests and the men enjoyed to the utmost the freedom of Butler Colege and the training-school.

EMERY W. ROSS.

Ohio State Convention

The Ohio Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the Ohio Christian Missionary Society will meet in convention in the church at Canton, Ohio, May 20-23. A splendid program has been prepared. Addresses will be made by C. M. Chilton, I. J. Spencer, A. C. Smither, G. W. Muckley, C. C. Smith, A. L. Orcutt, J. H. Mohorter, W. C. Pearce, F. M. Rains, Grant K. Lewis, Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, Mrs. Ora Haight of India. Speakers from Ohio will be I. J. Cahill, Miss Mary A. Lyons, John P. Sala, Myron C. Settle, E. W. Thornton, M. J. Grable, C. A. Freer, Traverse Harrison, J. N. Scholes, W. G. Loucks, H. B. McCormick, F. C. Ford, F. M. Field, John Mullen, C. R. Sine, E. P. Wise, W. D. Ryan, John E. Pounds, C. R. Okley, A. H. Jordan, T. J. White, L I. Mercer and others.

The ladies of the Canton Church will give a reception to the ladies of the C. W. B. M., at 4:00 p. m., Monday. A fellowship dinner is planned for 6:00 p. m., Monday, in the First U. B. Church.

The music of the convention will be in charge of W. E. M. Hackleman. The publishing nouses will have fine exhibits. A splendid opportunity will be given the people of the state to examine and purchase books pertaining to the various activities of church work. Much should be made of this opportunity.

The Canton Church building is well adapted to meet the needs of a great convention. There will be exhibit rooms, rest rooms, nursery and offices open to all the persons in attendance.

The main line of the Pennsylvania, the B. & O. and Wheeling & Lake Erie pass through Canton, and it also has three interurban trolley systems, which make it easy of access from all points of Ohio. The people will be met at the trains and at the interurban station by a white-capped reception committee, who will escort them to the church.

Lodging will be provided in the homes of the city at the rate of fifty cents a night, and in many instances lodging and breakfast will be given for fifty cents. Good meals can be procured at the restaurants, of which Canton has many, at twenty-five cents each. The First U. B. Church of the city, within one block of the Christian Church, will serve dinner and supper for twenty-five cents a meal. They will arrange to seat five hundred at one time. Canton excels in the number and quality of her good hotels, which will give reasonable rates. All things are now ready; Canton's doors are thrown open; a glad hand will receive you. Come to Canton May 20-23 and help make this Ohio's biggest and best convention. P. H. WELSHIMER.

The First Echoes

The first echoes of the May offering reaching our office are heartening. Among them the following are selected.

Hubbard, Ohio, a mission church and in debt sends $18.25; apportionment $7.50.—Geo. F. Crites.

The New Baltimore Church in Ohio sends $14.70; apportionment $7.50.—A. M. Jenkins.

The Normanda Church in Indiana sends $21, doubling its apportionment.—Guy L. Campbell.

Beargrass Church, St. Mathews, Ky., sent $40. Gave $29 last year.—W. H. Tharp.

Logan, Iowa, exceeds apportionment which is $25.—W. B. Crewdson.

Maywood Church, Oklahoma City, took its first offering for Home Missions. Apportionment $20; offering $42.—Garrett W. McQuiddy.

The Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., gave three times as much for Home Missions as last year.—Geo. A. Miller.

LaBelle, Missouri, raised its apportionment of $30.—R. E. L. Prunty.

Lanark, Illinois, raised almost $65.—J. Edward Cresmer.

Waterloo, Iowa, gives $35. Gave nothing last year.—Lewis P. Kopp.

Hico, Texas, sends $45.—O. L. Lyon.

West Fourth Avenue Church, Columbus, Ohio, raised more than their apportionment.—T. L. Lowe.

Lancaster, Pa., sends its first offering to American Missions, amounting to $6.10; members 34.—Warren Sherwood.

Grant City, Missouri, sends $40, thus making a beginning in American Missions.—J. H. Darnell.

Elmwood, Nebraska, sends $23.41; apportionment was $15.—L. W. Myers.

Bellefontaine, Ohio, sends check for $35.—W. F. Lockhart.

Langdon, Kansas, sends offering $57.21.—W. C. Cranston.

Masonville, Ky., sends $21.—W. J. Hudspeth.

Lathrop, Mo., sends $83.05.—Baxter Waters.

Kiowa, Oklahoma, remits $5.00, this being the first offering for American Missions.—Geo. F. Duffy.

Quanah, Texas, in the midst of its three years' drought, sends $10. This little church responds to every call.—Ben M. Edwards.

St. Joseph, Mo., remits by draft $200.—C. M. Chilton.

Cowden, Illinois, reaches its apportionment and sends draft for $20.—F. M. Stambaugh.

The High Calling

(Continued from page 14.)

That same night Bauer in his simple manner told Walter something more of his troubles, enough to give Walter a glimpse into the real sorrow of his heart. Walter in his turn told in part the story of his temptation and of his struggles and tortures to escape. To this Bauer listened with a faint smile and with perfect understanding.

In the days that followed, they agreed to construct the lamp between them and share in the profits from it. And when they began work on the mechanism each found that the other had discovered little improvements which were necessary to the best construction, finally producing a lamp far more perfect and practical than Walter's first attempt.

The day after that memorable scene with Bauer in the shop Walter wrote home a long and exuberant letter, a part of which we may read.

"Mother, I can't begin to tell you what a relief I have experienced since I told Bauer all about it. I believe I had a little taste of hell for a while and I don't want to go through it again. Bauer and I are the best friends you ever saw. He is just the op-

Subscribers Wants

Readers of the Christian Century find its columns valuable for advertising their wants or wares. The charge is one cent for each word, with a minimum of thirty cents for each insertion. Cash must accompany the order to save bookkeeping.

DO YOU NEED HYMN BOOKS for Church or Sunday-school? Write for prices, care of M, NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

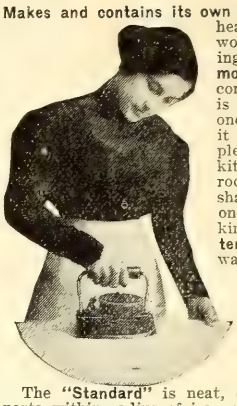
CHURCH CLERK: Do you need church letters? We furnish a well designed letter in blocks of fifty at 50 cents. Write us, care of X, NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

J. T. SHARRARD, of Paris, Ky., would like to supply some church in lake region during July and August.

Self Heating Iron

NEW "STANDARD"

Makes and contains its own heat. Works while it is heating, heats while it is working. Saves miles walking. Saves its cost every month. Economical, safe, convenient. The "Standard" is stove, fuel, heat—all in one. Fire is inside. Carry it about, go where you please. Don't stay in hot kitchen; iron any place, any room, on porch, or under shade tree. Go right along, one thing after another. All kinds of clothes ironed better in half the time. No waiting, no stopping to change irons. Right heat. Easily regulated. No time wasted. Iron on table all the time, one hand on the iron, the other to turn and fold the clothes.



The "Standard" is neat, durable and compact; all parts within radius of iron and handle. No tanks nor fittings standing out at sides or ends to hinder and be in the way. No wires or hose attached to bother. Right size, right shape, right weight. Cheapest fuel, two cents does ordinary family ironing. Every iron tested before shipping. Ready for use when received. Price low—$4.50. Sent anywhere.

"Standard"

AGENTS MAKE MONEY Men or Women. Quick, easy, sure. All year business. Experience not necessary. Sells on merit—sells itself. They buy on sight. Every home a prospect. Every woman needs it. Price low—all can afford it. HOW THEY DO SELL—Even 2 or 3 a day gives $27 to $40 a week profit; 6 sales a day is fair for an agent; some will sell a dozen in one day. Show 10 families—sell 8. Not sold in stores. Send no money. Write postal today for description, agent's selling plan. How to get FREE SAMPLE.

C. BROWN MFG CO., 279 Brown Bldg., Cincinnati, O.

REMEMBER

CHILDREN'S DAY

For Foreign Missions

FIRST SUNDAY IN JUNE

SUPPLIES FREE

THE UNUSED CROSS.

ONE HALF THE WORLD IS BEYOND THE REACH OF ANY MESSENGER OF JESUS CHRIST.
AND I, IF I BE LIFTED UP FROM THE EARTH, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day Supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Bible Schools observing the day in the interest of Heathen Missions.

FREE SUPPLIES

1st. Coin Pocket Missionary Collectors. These are a great improvement on the missionary boxes formerly used. Attractive, convenient, suitable for old or young.

2d. Darkness and Light. The new Children's Day exercise by P. H. Duncan. Filled with beautiful songs, exercises, and recitations. Good for older pupils as well as little folks. Adapted to any school.

ORDER AT ONCE. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance. Write to

STEPHEN J. COREY,
Box 884. Cincinnati, Ohio.

posite of me. I'm impulsive and quick and get mad quick and all that. You know all about it, but he is slow and calm and takes only a little at a time. He is not what you would call handsome, but he has the most beautiful brown eyes I ever saw. If I was a girl I would think he was handsome because his eyes are. He has told me a good deal about his home life and I have told him something about ours, and he has asked some questions. And, oh yes, he is coming home with me for the holidays. At first he refused, but when I told him how much you wanted him to come and how lonesome it would be for him here, he consented to come. I hope you will all like him. Helen will probably think he is odd and solemn, but I hope she will be kind and all of us can make him feel at home.

"We are working on the lamp together and it is almost finished. We are keeping the construction of it a secret because we want to spring it on Anderson, the foreman. I haven't told you about him. He is all up on electricity, knows as much about it as Edison, at least he almost says so at times, and he really does know a lot, but he is the one teacher in the whole bunch I don't like. There is a manner about him that makes you feel he has on a dress suit and stovepipe hat all the time. I heard the other day he is related to the Van Shaws, a cousin or something of the steel magnate at Pittsburg. I have never had any trouble with Anderson, but I felt relieved the other day to hear that I was not the only fellow in the school that he ruffled. He is mighty unpopular. Bauer and I are going to make sure of our lamp first and then give Anderson a look at it. If the thing goes as well as we expect I don't know how much there will be in it for us. But if it is anything like what I expect, no more stewardship for me. I'm tired of waiting on the swells, and since the Van Shaw episode I've not had a very pleasant time with some of them. You see, mother, there is a crowd here that seems to think it is necessary to be coarse and fast in order to be men. The more money they can spend, the more beer they can drink, the more chorus girls' photographs they can get to paste up in their rooms, the more tobacco pipes they can display over and under their mantels, the more slang and indecency they can learn, the more college atmosphere they think they are creating. I wonder sometimes why the professors don't seem to care about the morals of us students. We never hear anything in the class room or the shop except the technical parts of our studies. I haven't a single teacher at Burrton that I would go to if I were in real trouble and I never would think of going to President Davis about anything. He is a great scholar and hustler for money, but I should hate to have to go to him for advice or sympathy.

"Well, I have made the letter long enough. I'm getting a little homesick to see you all, and looking forward to the holidays. Expect me home with a trunk full of money from the sale of the lamp. If we get it patented we may either sell the thing outright, or Bauer thinks we can better make profitable terms with some good electrical manufacturing firm like Madison Brooks & Co., New York. Love to all.

Walter."

Mrs. Douglas answered him at once and in the course of her letter expressed her delight at the happy outcome of Walter's experience with the lamp and with Bauer's friendship.

"I don't know when you have given your mother more happiness, boy. I was so happy I cried all the forenoon while your father and Helen and Louis were out of the house. I am delighted that you have made a friend. Do you know what that means? If Bauer is what you think he is, you and he have something more than a trunk full of money. A man or a woman can live to be fifty years old without gaining more than two or three such friends as Bauer. So what has really happened to you is a splendid thing. And I hope you will feel very rich indeed. Of course we would all be pleased if the lamp turns out to be a success. But I suppose you will make up your mind to be ready for anything. There are many slips between models and patents, and it will be well for both of you not to buy expensive trips around the world on the strength of your discovery until the money is really in hand.

"Louis is giving us some trouble lately. He is very slow in his studies, especially his Engish. Your father, I think, feels annoyed by it, because he wants Louis to be literary. But Louis' English teacher brought to your father the other day a composition Louis had written on the Tuberculosis Outdoor Hospital recently established at the Mansfield farm by the State Board of Health. Miss Barrows, the teacher, is a very practical person and she went out to this tuberculosis station with a section of her class in English, and told the members to keep their eyes open and on their return to the school to write one hundred words about what they had seen. And this is Louis's contribution to the symposium:

"'Tuberculosis was started in 1884, by Dr. Trudeau, who had it in the Adriondacks. Although consumption is not inherited and does not belong in the climate it is getting very popular. The sleeping bags are very useful to the consumptive people because they can keep their heads out and put the rest of their bodies into them. I saw the germs. It is a big white ball with blue spots on it. I think it would be fine to sleep in one of those beds with the head inside and the lungs outside.'

"Well, when your father read this, he simply choked. In fact we all choked, and Helen who happened to get hold of it somehow, just screamed. Poor Louis was mad at every one of us and especially at Miss Barrows when he heard she had taken his account to his father. At first your father thought Louis was trying to be funny at the expense of the English department in the high school. But he wasn't. He was in dead earnest, and doing his best. I tell your father that it isn't fair to ridicule Louis. Ridicule is a dangerous form of criticism and Louis is very sensitive. I don't blame him for saying that the teacher ought not to make fun of him when he is trying to get his lessons. He fairly hates some of his teachers because they use sarcastic or ironical remarks about him in the presence of the whole school. It seems strange to me that any teacher will do that, especially in the case of a boy like Louis. They defend themselves by saying it is the only way to wake the students or shame them into doing good work. But I believe they are wrong in their methods with boys like Louis and I am going to talk with them about it for his sake.

"We will welcome Bauer with you at the holidays. He will feel at home with us your mother has anything to do about it. We all anticipate his coming. If you are a little homesick to see us we are all more than a little eager to see you. I pray the good God to keep you pure and true.

Lovingly,

"Mother."

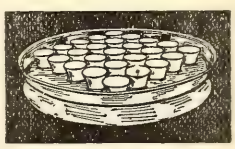
Two weeks after this and two weeks before the Christmas holidays, Walter and Bauer had completed their lamp and given it a test. It was more perfect by far than Walter's model. It worked with a practical certainty that left no doubt in their minds that unless some unforeseen factor came in to change conditions they had a workable, economic mechanism, which was automatic and durable.

Within a day or two they decided to let Anderson into the secret and Walter asked him to come into the shop at night to see the result of some special original work. This was a common request and the foreman simply made his engagement at the hour assigned, and when the hour came he went in and watched Walter and Bauer bring out the lamp and make the necessary connections. Anderson had respect for Walter's ability, recognizing in him the brightest mind for electricity that Burrton had ever seen in a student. He stood by silently at first while Walter in considerable excitement and some evident pride did the explaining. But when the light started in the arc and the brilliant glow of it began to flow out its dazzling shafts through the shop the professor started forward, a look of astonishment came over his face and he asked Walter a question, so unexpected, that Walter turned pale and looked first at Anderson and then at Bauer in blind wonder and a great sinking of heart.

(To be continued.)

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
CENTRAL CHURCH
New York, 142 West 81st St.
Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE INDIVIDUAL
"Noiseless"
CUSHIONED TRAYS
4 Different Features
WHY?


1st—"Noiseless"—As all cup holes are cushioned.
2nd—Dust-proof—The Trays interlock.
3rd—A short glass—no need of tipping back the head.
4th—Automatic Filler—Fills rapidly and evenly.
Does not mar the sacredness of the service.
Write for booklet. Outfit sent on trial.
DIETZ COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
107 No. Dearborn St., Dept. T., Chicago.

Drake University
Des Moines, Iowa.
COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS.
Four-year courses, based upon four-year high school courses, leading to the degree of A. B., Ph. B., S. B. In the School of Education, included in this college, are courses for Students in Domestic Science.
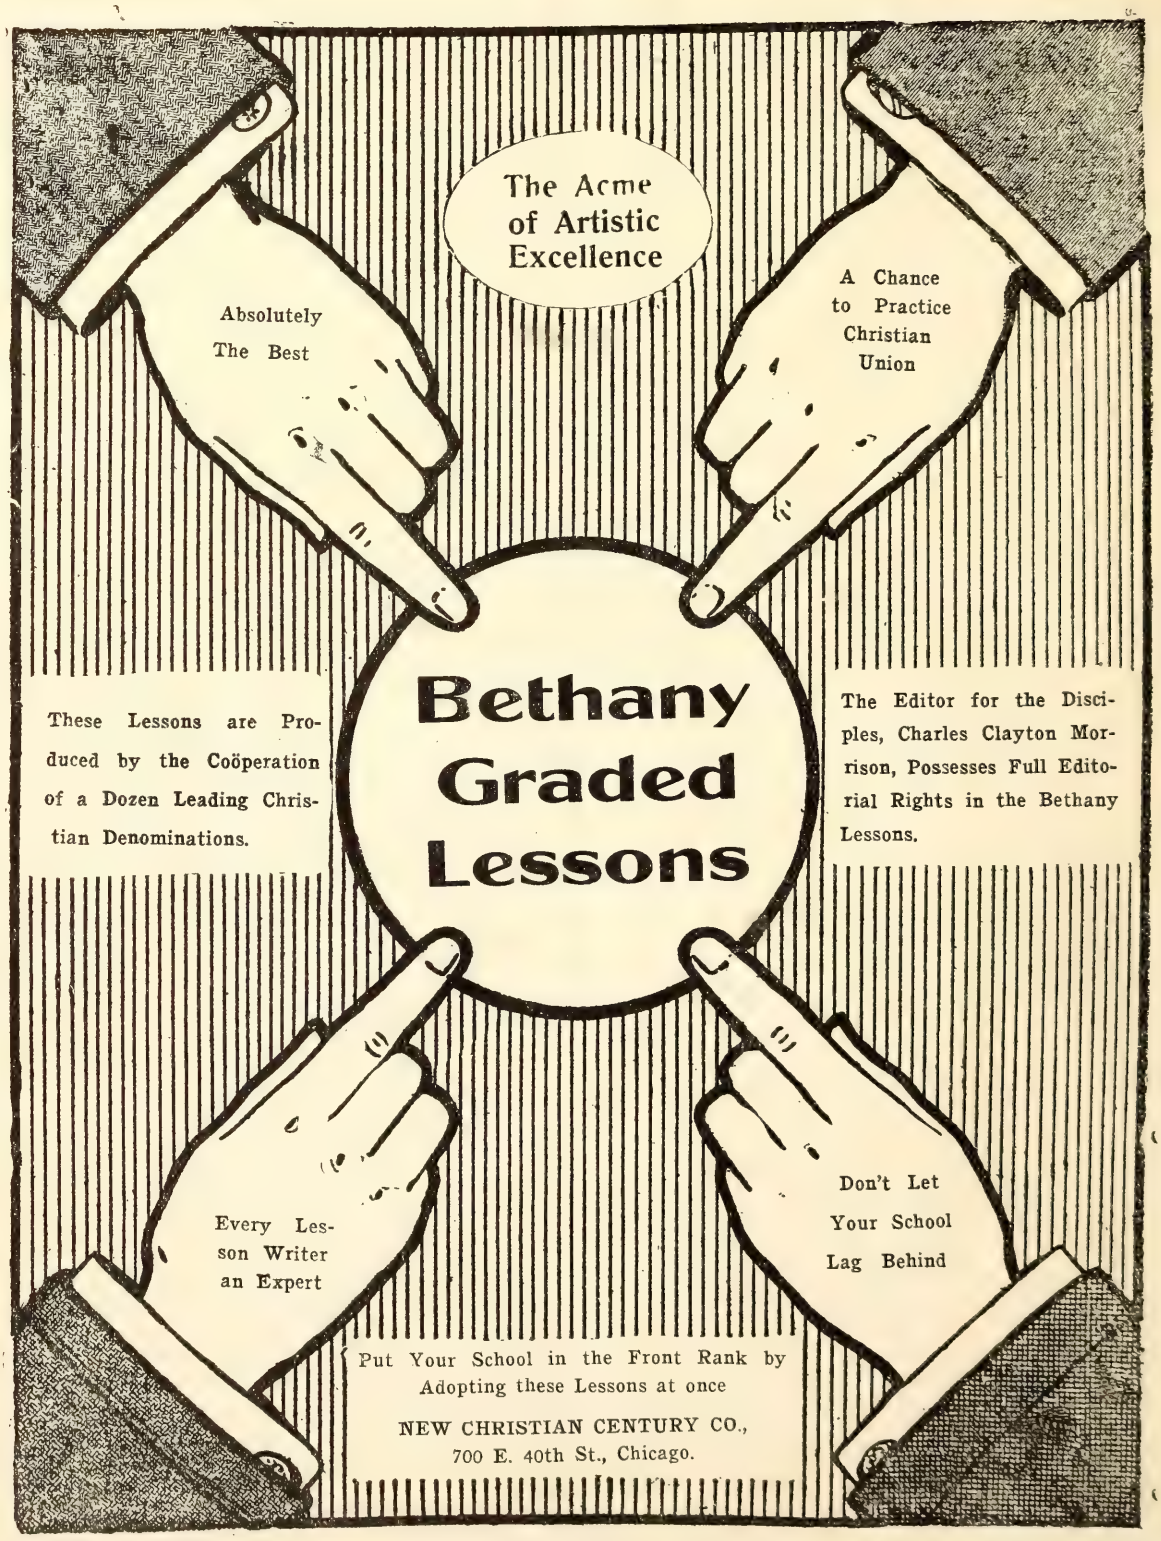
Primary Teachers.
Kindergarten Teachers.
Grade Teachers.
High School Teachers.
COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE.
Graduate course, requiring three years' work, leading to degree of D. B.
COLLEGE OF LAW.
Three-year course, based on four-year high school course, leading to degree of LL. B.
COLLEGE OF MEDICINE.
Four-year course, based on four-year high school course and two full years in college, leading to the degree of M. D.
COLLEGE OF DENTISTRY.
Three-year course, based on four-year high school course, leading to the degree of D. D. S.
INSTITUTE OF FINE ARTS.
Special courses, based upon such preparation as best fits the student to pursue the study of his chosen course most profitably. The Institute of Fine Arts includes three distinct departments:
Conservatory of Music.
School of Painting and Drawing.
School of Dramatic Art.
For catalogue and other information, address,
THE PRESIDENT,
DRAKE UNIVERSITY,
Des Moines, Iowa.



The Acme of Artistic Excellence
Absolutely The Best
A Chance to Practice Christian Union
Bethany Graded Lessons
These Lessons are Produced by the Coöperation of a Dozen Leading Christian Denominations.
The Editor for the Disciples, Charles Clayton Morrison, Possesses Full Editorial Rights in the Bethany Lessons.
Every Lesson Writer an Expert
Don't Let Your School Lag Behind
Put Your School in the Front Rank by Adopting these Lessons at once
NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.,
700 E. 40th St., Chicago.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX May 23, 1912 Number 21

The Idealism of Jesus
By H. D. C. Maclachlan

Methodism at Minneapolis
Reporting the Quadrennial Conference

Some Results of Biblical Criticism
An Editorial

CHICAGO

Topics of the Times

Some of the big railroad presidents are strongly of the opinion that there is plenty of good work in a man after he passes the age of 45 years. President Mudge of the Rock Island is 55 years old and says he never felt better fitted for work. Says Mr. Mudge: "A man over 45 years of age no longer useful? That's all bosh. A man is in his prime at 45. Of course, there is an unofficial rule that a railroad company does not want to take new men into the service at 45. We want them before they get to the prime stage, so that they will be prime in the service at 45." B. L. Winchell, president of the Frisco system, was inclined to the same view and pointed out that the retiring age on most railways is 70 years. He added that while it was the tendency of railroads to hire young men who have a chance at least of many years of usefulness before them, there is no fixed rule on a majority of the railroads against hiring men who have passed the 45-year mark.

The will of John Jacob Astor drawn in New York last summer shortly after he married the youthful Miss Force as read the other day makes his son William Vincent Astor not yet of age its principal beneficiary. The will brings out the fact that Astor cared nothing for charity and believed in Astor money for the Astors. Aside from provisions for Vincent Astor the will provides for unconditional bequests of only $276,500. Among these there is only one of a charitable nature. This is $30,000 to St. Paul's School at Concord, N. H. The remainder of the legacies is to relatives, friends and faithful servants. Valuations of the estate run anywhere from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000. A close friend of the family said that the smaller figure, in his opinion, is nearer the correct estimate. Nearly all other provisions of the will, as made public, deal with the trust funds, of which there are three—$5,000,000 for the young widow, $5,000,000 for the colonel's young daughter Muriel, the child of his former wife, Ava Willing Astor, and $3,000,000 for the expected posthumous child of the present widow. No provision is made for the wife who divorced him, and if the young widow dies or marries again the $5,000,000 trust fund, together with the town house and other property left to her, reverts to William Vincent Astor. She received, however, $100,000 outright, without further stipulation, and until the income from the trust fund shall become available the trustees are directed to pay her an income of $200,000 a year. There was an antenuptial settlement which she accepted in lieu of dower rights. The amount of this has never been made public. Rumors have placed it at $5,000,000. The fact that Mr. Astor left his estate nearly all to his son brings out the fact just as with Field that the great fortune business is decidedly unwholesome business and that the one per cent of the population which is said to control 70 per cent of the nation's wealth is strongly desirous and of the opinion that the one per cent shall continue to control the 70 per cent.

Stanley W. Finch, chief of the bureau of investigation of the federal department of justice, has done good work in the war on white slavery. Mr. Finch is head of the agency which has done most of the actual investigation work, leading to 219 indictments in the nine months ended March 31, followed by only nine acquittals. New legislation he recommends would be in these directions: To bring about closer supervision of mail and telegraph communications, inter and intra-state. To enable women in "white slave" cases to testify against their husbands. This testimony is frequently essential to the establishment of the government's case. To allow issuance of search warrants on sufficient evidence, and arrest without warrants. All this, he said, could be brought about by a fuller public realization of the present horrors of the traffic in women. He estimated the number of public prostitutes in the country at 250,000. The theater, the motion picture show, the dance hall, the cafe, and the skating rink, while in themselves often useful and beneficial for education, entertainment, and exercise, he said, become instruments for the work of the men and women engaged in the "business." A mock marriage or a real marriage, he said, was frequently the agency employed. For this reason, he urged legislation allowing women complainants to testify against their husbands.

Miss Chang Yuyi, daughter of Chang Yin Tang, the Chinese minister at Washington, broke a bottle of champagne over the bow of the Fei Hung at the New York Shipbuilding Company's yards, the first warship to be built in this country for the Chinese navy. Miss Chang Yuyi, like her sister, Miss Lillie Chang, was dressed in a white tailored suit, and wore a picture hat. All of the other Chinese who participated in or attended the christening were also dressed in American costume. The boat is intended for a training ship for Chinese youths and officers. Its length is 320 feet, displacement 2,600 tons. It will be capable of about twenty knots, and will carry 232 officers and crew. Minister Chang predicted that this is only the first of a number of cruisers to be built for the Chinese navy in this country.

That the percentage of illiteracy in Illinois is only 4.2, placing it first among the eleven states making the best showing, with the states of the Middle and Far West far surpassing those of the East and South in the proportion of citizens able to write, is shown in a report published by the census bureau. Illinois leads New York, with a percentage of 5.5, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and many other states. Illinois has only 157,958 persons over ten years of age who cannot write. In ten years the number of illiterates in the United States more than ten years of age has decreased more than 600,000. The number of illiterates at the census of 1910, was 5,516,193, as compared with 6,180,069 in 1900, a decline from 10.7 to 7.7 per cent in the proportion of the population ten years and over. The number has largely decreased in Texas, Louisiana, and the District of Columbia. There has been a decrease of illiterates among the negro population in the country, in number 625,107, and in percentage from 44.5 in 1900, to 30.4 in 1910.

The shares of Standard Oil stock are divided up as follows, according to one of the dailies last week. His holdings, approximately 245,000 shares of Standard Oil of New Jersey, brought to John D. Rockefeller, upon the dissolution of the "trust" over 900,000 additional shares of former subsidiaries' stock as his proportion of the enforced distribution of the parent company's share assets. Today, if he has neither sold nor added to these holdings, he has in his name about 1,200,000 shares of these various issues, including parent company stock. The Charles Pratt estate, the second largest holder of record, held on January 1 last, 52,000 shares of Standard of New Jersey, and a grand total of 240,000 shares of all companies. C. W. Harkness was third with 43,000 shares of the parent company and 207,000 shares of all, while the Northern Finance Corporation was fourth largest with 40,000 shares of the New Jersey company, and 189,000 shares total after distribution.

About People

—Major Thomas L. Rhoads has succeeded the late Major Archibald Butt, who died like a hero on the Titanic, as President Taft's chief military aid. He is forty-two years old and unmarried. Until recently, Major Rhoads served on the medical staff of the Walter Reed General Hospital, near Brightwood, a suburb of Washington. He has served in the medical corps of the army since 1900, being appointed from Pennsylvania as an assistant surgeon.

—William F. McCombs, of New York, who is heading the not exactly successful movement to gain for Governor Wilson the democratic nomination for president, is said to be the youngest man who ever managed a national candidacy. After being graduated from Princeton University, and the Harvard Law School, Mr. McCombs became a lawyer in New York, and took part in political work. He is a member of the National Democratic Club.

—General Bennett H. Young, of Louisville, Ky., commander of the Army of the Tennessee, has been elected commander-in-chief of the United Confederate Veterans. General Young, the new commander, served in the civil war under General John H. Morgan. He was born in Jessamine County, Ky., in 1843. General Young has four boasts he sometimes makes. These are: "I never swore an oath; I never told a lie; I never drank whisky; I never touched a card." Good for the general!

—President Daniel Willard, of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, who formerly ran an engine and ate out of a dinner pail, is traveling on his road continually looking after its interests. For two years, since he assumed charge of the road's affairs, at least 75 per cent of his time has been spent away from home. Mr. Willard never lets the sun go down without coming personally in contact with some one or group of the 61,000 men under his direction. Mr. Willard says he is going to spend $150,000,000 for improvements on his road within the next ten years.

—Prince Mohammed Ali, brother of the khedive of Egypt, is on his first visit to America. He expects to see "almost everything," he says, in the five weeks he will be in the country. "I hope to see a good deal of both America and Australia," said the prince, "before I return to Egypt. I shall travel over the United States, British Columbia, and Alaska, after which I hope to pay my long-delayed visit to Australia." The prince is about 36 years old, and has been traveling almost constantly since he was six years old. He speaks English and a half dozen other languages perfectly.

—United States senators, like other men, go and come. The terms of the following republican United States senators expire with the present term of President Taft, on March 3, 1913: Borah, of Idaho; Bourne, of Oregon; Briggs, of New Jersey; Brown, of Nebraska; Burnham, of New Hampshire; Crane, of Massachusetts; Cullom, of Illinois; Curtis, of Kansas; Dixon, of Montana; Gambell, of South Dakota; Guggenheim, of Colorado; Kenyon, of Iowa; Nelson, of Minnesota; Richardson, of Delaware; Smith, of Michigan, and Warren, of Wyoming. The terms of the following democratic United States senators expire on the same day: Bacon, of Georgia; Bailey, of Texas; Bankhead, of Alabama; Davis, of Arkansas; Foster, of Louisiana; Gardner, of Maine; Martin, of Virginia; Owen, of Oklahoma; Paynter, of Kentucky; Percy, of Mississippi; Simmons, of North Carolina; and Watson, of West Virginia. The term of the successor of the late Senator Taylor, of Tennessee, will also expire on the same day.

The Christian Century
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The May Garden

THE FIRST WEEK IN MAY, ONE YEAR ago, I was in the Tennessee Mountains, and I found one of its days set apart for what the people poetically called the May Ramble. It was the annual and universal custom on that day for everybody to leave home, and spend the time roaming through the woods. And how beautiful the world was on that perfect May day! The superb trees of the Southern Appalachian Range were clad in their tender new verdure, and the peerless early mountain flower, the azalea, was in its glory. There were tongues in all the trees, for the mocking bird, the red bird, and a host of other songsters poured out their hearts in a psalm of praise for the new birth of life and nature. One's heart swelled at the thought of the bounty and goodness of the heavenly Father, in filling those lonely places with the choicest things in the realm of sight and sound.

* * *

How our lives would be enriched, if we would devote some of these rare days to taking May Rambles! It is well to go to the woods if we can, but the listening ear and the watchful eye can often perceive wondrous things in our own yard, or our own street.

If one has a few trees or shrubs, what a fine time this is to enjoy and study birds!—for birds are social creatures. One must use protective as well as benevolent tactics toward them—protection above all from their most ruthless enemy, the cat. Friendship to birds means implacable warfare on cats—especially on your neighbor's cats. There is nothing so well calculated to arouse the worst passions in the human breast as the sight of a cat (belonging to someone else) prowling around your bird haunts, seeking whom he may devour.

* * *

And speaking of cats and birds, is it not a deplorable thing that one of our sweetest singers is called a catbird? No warbler has a more varied repertoire of thrills and runs and cadences, except his cousins, the mocking bird and brown thrasher. But because of one peevish, discordant note like his arch enemy, he is branded with the name of cat bird! How unjust! How mean!—and yet how common! A man may possess all the cardinal virtues, yet if he falls into some unhappy fault, he is labelled by this one vice and his many noble qualities ignored.

During the past two weeks, I have counted twenty-eight different birds in my own yard, among them the most tuneful singers we have in this section. What sweeter sound in all nature than the oriole's clear whistle, the cardinal's "what cheer, what cheer," the Carolina wren's "jubilee, jubilee, jubilee," the song sparrow, the catbird, and above all, the brown thrasher, pouring out his heart in varied and matchless melody! Even the robin's call, for all its sweet monotony, is most dear and welcome.

Since I wrote of the April Garden, the lilacs and fruit blossoms have run their course, and are now but a beautiful memory. But we must not grieve, for the season has been so perfect that each morning we wake to new blessings. Just now the loveliest of our tree blooms are in their prime—the locusts are filling the air with fragrance; the horse chestnut, the buckeye, the tulip, the dogwood are in full flower.

The big Harrison rose bush, first fruits of this queen of flowers, is one mass of golden bloom. In the garden, the irises are at their best—six different kinds are blooming, three have finished their course, and two are still to come. Along the borders, the bleeding heart, the columbines, the peonies, and dearest of all, the lilies are arrayed in all their glory. How fragrant and exquisite are the lilies of the valley—and could anything be lovelier than the lemon lilies! There is something pungent and distinctive about their odor that has a far off kinship with the wild wood scent of the yellow jasmine. It belongs to the day lily class, and Ben Jonson may have been thinking of it when he describes "a fallen oak, dry, bald and sere," and says:

> A lily of a day
> Is fairer far in May,
> Although it fall and die that night
> It was the plant and flower of light."

* * *

But May is not only the time for revelling in the presence of the dear old friends that come but once a year, it is also a time of preparation for the midsummer when most of them will have finished their season of bloom. The annuals must be transplanted from their sheltered frames and boxes into the open beds. I am not the gardner I once was, but they are all out now, and I could not but feel an unchristian vainglory, as I gazed upon the neat rows of green that are holding up their heads so bravely. Was it a punishment for my sins that a sudden cool spell swept down upon us and tortured me with the fear that frost might lay them low.

* * *

But whatever may be the price of the May Garden, whether of back ache, or heart ache, it is worth all it costs. How could we live without flowers! How we depend on them to express the inexpressible for us! They tell to the beloved the love that is past our speech. They voice our joy in the happiness of friends. They speak sympathy with sickness and trial and bereavement!

* * *

But their noblest mission is to "deck the low grave where valor sleeps." It will soon be the time when both North and South will give expression to their grateful remembrance of the brave men who gave love's crowning test—that a man lay down his life for his country.

IDA WITHERS HARRISON.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Investment Swindle

It seems to be a part of American character to be looking for something for nothing. Hence investment swindles of one sort and another have made greater headway here than in other sections of the world. Ten years ago, we were having a great spasm of interest in our ministry concerning the promotion of certain oil-stock schemes, patent gate enterprises and other wild-cat ventures. They ended in disaster and men with life-long reputations of fair-dealing came out with reputations besmirched. After this wild-cat period only men of uncertain characters continued among us promoting schemes that would yield a fortune in a short time.

Signs are not lacking, however, that certain other fraudulent enterprises are to be launched. We have heard something of great fortunes to be made in Florida land, though the people in Florida have not themselves the reputation of being bloated plutocrats from the use of these wonderful lands. We hear periodically of real estate investments in New York that will produce a fabulous interest on the investment. In the end widows place their savings in the hands of sharpers. Laboring men lose the savings of a lifetime. A great flood of woe follows in the train of these plans for rapid riches. There is one certain principle that any man can keep in mind. A phenomenal rate of interest always means an unusual measure of risk. Men would never buy government bonds if there were safe investments bringing larger returns.

Six per cent is a good interest on capital. A larger anticipated return carries one over into questionable investments where the chances of loss are great and very often where the ethics of the whole enterprise may fairly be put upon trial. With so many suicides reported every day as the result of unhappy investments in the country, it would seem that no further preachment were necessary to make our citizenship cautious in the kind of business enterprise it engages in.

The Methodists and Social Service

The Federated Churches of America, last November, passed a series of resolutions against social abuses that gave voice to the new social conscience of the age. At about the same time action was taken by the Unitarians making an even more radical statement. The Methodists are just finishing their quadrennial conference in St. Paul. Their social service report indicates the length to which they have been willing to go in taking a stand on the side of humanity in the age of the social question. The specific ends to be accomplished are set down as follows:

Equal rights and complete justice for all men in all stations of life.

The protection of the family, by the single standard of purity, uniform divorce laws, proper regulation of marriage, and proper housing.

The fullest possible development for every child, especially by the provision of proper education and recreation.

The abolition of child labor.

Such regulation of the conditions of toil for women as shall safeguard the physical and moral health of the community.

The abatement and prevention of poverty.

The best possible care of all dependent persons, and also all prisoners.

The protection of the individual and society from the social, economic, and moral waste of the liquor traffic.

The conservation of health.

The protection of the worker from dangerous machinery, occupational diseases, injuries, and mortality.

Free access to employment and the means of self-maintenance for all men for the protection of workers from the risk of enforced unemployment.

Suitable provision for the old age of the workers and for those incapacitated by injury.

The principle of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes.

A release from employment one day in seven.

The gradual and reasonable reduction of the hours of labor to the lowest practicable point, and for that degree of leisure for all which is a condition of the highest human life.

A living wage as a minimum in every industry and for the highest wage that each industry can afford.

The most equitable division of the product of industry that can ultimately be devised.

The representatives of the united churches have already declared their conviction that anything over ten hours in any business or employment is an abuse which should not be tolerated in a Christian community nor exacted by a Christian employer. It is our further belief that in many of our large industries the strenuous working conditions make immediately necessary the eight-hour day,

The minimum living wage is already a legislative demand in several industrial states. Recent data concerning wages and living conditions in large sections of our industrial population are the basis of this demand. The connection they reveal between low wages, with their resultant bad housing, and mal-nutrition, and the low development of morality and spiritual life, make it incumbent upon the churches to rally in the campaign to realize their demand for a living wage.

In addition, the entire force of the churches should be thrown into the nation-wide campaign, by investigation and legislative enactment, to protect the workers from industrial accidents and industrial diseases and to provide swift and sure compensation for the sufferers from such accidents and diseases.

The Court of Domestic Relations

At a recent banquet of citizens the first annual report of the Court of Domestic Relations, operating as a branch of the Municipal Court, was rendered. This remarkable Chicago institution was established in order to give, in this city of frequent divorce, more careful consideration to family questions. This court takes time to go into each family situation in a friendly way, and instead of disposing of the case in an easy way by divorce, the family is reunited if possible to furnish the children with the proper opportunity.

There is need for still further machinery in order to make the court more effective. It is stated that we need a "Bureau for Husband-finding." Such a bureau would not be intended as a means of procuring husbands but as a means of finding and recovering husbands that had run away from family responsibility. During the past year there were 514 such cases in Chicago, eighty-seven of them running away from a charge of bastardy; 1,172 husbands were found and tried in court. Most of them were sent back to work, for the court very sensibly held that one man at work was worth a thousand in the house of correction. Only thirty-eight were sent during the year to the latter institution.

The benefits of the court are significant. Women and children in these family cases are no longer compelled to go to the police court with its evil influences. The court furthermore guarantees a prompt trial in these cases, especially where a jury is involved. The inauguration of such methods of justice gives prophecy of the good day when citizens will no longer feel that the courts are "against them," but will willingly bring their troubles to experts who are qualified to untangle them as friends.

Universal Peace

On May 19, from many of the pulpits of the land there rang forth the message of universal peace. Whatever the emergencies of the past may have demanded, it would seem that Christian nations might at least be at peace with one another and by combination guarantee the peace of the world. When the Moslem threatened to conquer Europe, we could scarcely have asked for peace on the terms of surrender. We might again face the emergency of a higher civilization meeting a lower one on the field of battle with the duty of conflict. No legalistic interpretation of scripture should prevent this, with due deference to our good friends, the Quakers. It certainly is the ideal of the kingdom of God, however, that the time shall come when men "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks." The burden of war and the preparations for war place an economic burden on the race that it can ill bear, and all over the world working men are beginning to see that they may serve humanity in a larger way than by giving themselves as "cannon's flesh" in some war of conquest.

The forces that make for peace are now noteworthy. The Christian church herself is getting a conscience on the subject of war. There is in this country an aggressive organization called the American Peace Society. The captains of industry in settling their economic strife by arbitration and combination have taught the world a lesson that there is a more effective way. A yellow press is feeling more and more the unpopularity of mere jingoism. The national hatreds that were once cultivated so assiduously are being mollified. We hear talk at times of conflict between Germany and England, or between the United States and Japan. Such talk is often promoted in the press by interested parties, for a purpose. The citizens of Los Angeles passed a resolution not long since rebuking the jingo talk of war with Japan. It has been shown that the idea of Japan's desiring a naval station in Mexico is pure myth. Thus the tattlings and gossip in military circles are no longer potent to inflame a people to war.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

The Minister's Salary

In the United Presbyterian church the average salary of the pastors is $1,241. This is a slight advance over the salaries paid last year. Urging a further increase in the salary of their home missionary workers the United Presbyterian has the following to say:

"We know that God will feed the sparrows and the hungry ravens. But the missionary is no sparrow. The sparrow has nothing to do but fly around and find the food which God has provided for it. The missionary has the burden of souls upon him. That is his work; not to hunt for bread. God has taken it for granted that when the church sends out workmen it will meet the bill in the evening. It is not enough that the missionary have faith in God. He must have faith in the church that appoints him. He must have confidence that it will see that his table and library and wardrobe are supplied. Man cannot live by faith alone, and the monthly bills are evidence of it.

Sectarianism and Unity

The following letter from a correspondent in the Living Church (Episcopalian) is a model of a kind found in the journals of all denominations. Every little while some ardent soul writes that "if we are only a Protestant sect, the sooner we are wiped off the earth the better." Then there are those who, if they could be convinced that ours was not the only true Apostolic church would "withdraw at once from her communion." But the letter throughout is a facsimile of that written by the first sectarian zealot many hundreds of years ago. It reveals a mental condition against which no argument can prevail. To those within the denomination, such a letter is worth its weight in gold; to those without, it teaches the frailty of human judgments. To the authorities, it is the voice of a loyal spirit; to the onlooker, it is the voice of a sectarian. To them has been entrusted the exclusive guardianship of the pure and unalloyed faith of the Church. But when once the doctrine of exclusive salvation has been broken, and they are led to see that God has a people in every communion who are set for the defense of the gospel, all ranting is at an end. God has provided against the possibility of the faith's destruction by committing it to millions who live in widely different communions. And while the sectarian serves a useful purpose in his own denomination he is the real foe to the Church universal. He can help build up a sect, but no sects will ever be ready for Christian union, no matter how much they advocate it. A letter of this character may make Disciples smile, but we have written many like it—and were vexed when others smiled.

It seems to me that Bishop Griswold, at the Church Congress, expressed a mighty truth, and one that should be carefully considered by those of our church who are so anxiously zealous in promoting the cause of Christian "unity," when he said: "If it be true as contended that we are a Protestant sect, the sooner we are wiped off the earth the better."

Now I am not one of "the wise," a college graduate, etc.; I am just a plain workingman—a printer. But I would like to ask some of our clergy who apparently deny the catholicity of the church and all that a humble, devout churchman should hold dear, and who teach and advocate that the church is but one of many Protestant sects, what consolation and peace do they offer to the thousands of people who, like myself, have come into the church under the—perhaps deluded—idea that they were entering the true Fold of Christ? Having "tried" two different denominations and not finding the peace and assurance that I craved—and let him who thinks the subject one for jest recall the similar experience of the saintly Bishop Huntington—with the kindly guidance of the Holy Spirit, and the counsels of a true priest and shepherd of the church, I found a home at last. It is now nine years since I was confirmed, and my belief in the Apostolic Foundation of the church has been strengthened yearly and daily during that period.

Therefore, if denominationalism does not satisfy those reared under its teaching, why attempt to tear down the walls of our Zion, under the mistaken impression that Christian unity can be promoted by destroying those very things which are essential to the life of the church, and which have afforded "peace and quietness" to countless numbers of wanderers? If it is true that the church has no greater claim to an apostolical origin and a divine mission than the countless sects of today, then what is it that is more and more attracting people to consider her unique position, as she stands midway between the complacent exterior of Rome and the tumultuous aggregation known as Protestantism? I reply, without fear of successful contradiction, that it is her claim to be a true, legitimate branch of the holy Catholic Church that is drawing to her men and women of every station in life, from every denomination.

Christian unity will never come about by tearing down; it will come by a building up, by holding aloft our own standard—not in arrogance, but in humility, but never forgetting our apostolic lineage nor the loyalty we owe our dear old Anglican Catholic mother. "Feed My Sheep," was the admonition of the Good Shepherd, and surely it is not a true shepherd who would weaken or impair the Fold in which the flock has taken shelter. As Dr. van Allen well says, "there are sects and denominations enough to satisfy every taste," and to those of us whom sectarianism failed to satisfy, it seems a strange remedy to propose to cure the evils of sectarianism by injecting sectarian ideas into the church.

The church must be true to her divine mission, and the unity that Christ prayed for cannot be attained by attempting to recast the church on a denominational foundation. And in conclusion, let me say, in all sincerity and humility, that if I did not firmly believe that I am a member of the holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, and that the so-called Protestant Episcopal Church is a true, legitimate branch of the same, I would feel compelled by my conscience to withdraw at once from her communion.

The Disappearing Fatherhood

Since becoming pastor of a Baptist church in one of the most aristocratic sections of Boston, Rev. Austin K. De Blois, D. D. has been making a careful study of the population with the hope of discovering the opportunities for the growth of his congregation. The results are discouraging. Commenting on these the Watchman (Baptist) concludes:

"The statistics of Dr. De Blois strongly support the well-established conclusion that the population of the country is being recruited almost entirely from the middle and poorer classes of society. The contribution of the wealthy classes to the increase of population is so inconsiderable as to be not worthy of attention. Consequently efforts for the moral and religious elevation of the people and the making of a better human race, to be effective, must be directed to the medium and the poorer classes in the social scale."

All of which lends point to the observation of the famous French traveler who said that in America the large houses have small families, and the small houses have large families. Moreover, we may well inquire why wealth should be a menace to the increase of population, and why such a relentless law should hold that those have many children who can take the poorest care of them, while those who can take the best care of children have few or none? Is the small family of the wealthy one of nature's ways to reduce levels in the social scale, and to maintain an equilibrium, if not an equality? But these startling figures as interpreted by the Watchman, will carry their own lessons:

The gist of the whole matter is that there are not enough children in the entire Back Bay district of Boston to make more than one good-sized Sunday-school if every child could be gathered into one. Of the 732 families of which definite information was obtained 559, or nearly three-fourths, have no children. Of the 173 families which contain children sixty have one each, fifty-seven have two each, thirty-six have three each, twelve have four each, six have five each, and only two families have six children; and no family in the whole wealthy Back Bay district of Boston, has more than six children, as far as the faithful canvasser of Dr. DeBlois could learn. Moreover, the term "children" was construed very liberally, and in this canvass included young people at or even above the age of seventeen years, born, perhaps, when some families were in poorer circumstances more favorable to the propagation of the race. If the term "children" had been more strictly limited, to those, say, under the ages of fourteen, we are assured the above figures would have been reduced one-third. We do not imagine that the wealthy families of Boston are an exception. Probably substantially the same conditions exist in the higher social elements in all cities. It should be remembered also that the Back Bay can be occupied only by people of wealth whose children in many cases have grown up and live elsewhere and by single people or reduced families who occupy apartments.

The religious affiliations of the 173 families on the Back Bay in which children were found are interesting: seventy-one declared a preference for the Episcopalian worship, forty-two for Unitarian, eighteen for Congregational, five for Roman Catholic, four for Baptist, two for Christian Science, two for Jewish, one for Methodist, and twenty-four were entirely foot-free in religion, and attend no church services, either regularly or intermittently. Even many families which claimed some church affiliation seemed to have no desire to have their children attend Sunday-school; and in the case of every one of the twenty-four families which did not attend any church services, courteous and cordial invitations for the children to attend Sunday-school were promptly and emphatically declined.

There are enough lessons in social economics and religious propaganda in the interesting statistics furnished us by Dr. De Blois to fill a volume. It is evidently a folly to build a Christian church in a wealthy and fashionable district of any large city with a hope of numerical growth from this immediate locality. All of the ten or more churches in the Back Bay district of Boston depend chiefly for their congregations on people coming from some distance, and the Sunday-schools, where there are any, can be sustained only by parents sending children from a distance, which, in the case of small children most parents are reluctant to do. Protestant churches are abandoning the city districts which are occupied by foreigners, although the streets are swarming with children; but if they locate in wealthy districts they will clearly be jumping out of a frying pan into a polar region of perpetual snow and ice.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.
United Religious Press Building

Children and the Kingdom

"Whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it." Apply this saying to the church as a teaching agency and it requires that the church train its children for independence in thought and action. The schools of the state are not established in the interest of any special policy or reform but to the end that the children of the state may be trained for the life that is worthy. In like manner, the schools of the church do not have for their first aim the support of some special enterprise of the church, but the training of the children in the knowledge of God and of their duty toward man. The Sunday-school, therefore, is not an adjunct of any other organization of the church. It has its own well defined task and it must have freedom in the doing of it.

It would be a grievous error, however, if the schools of the state should ignore the problems which occupy the minds of patriotic citizens. The worthy life is one in which all human interests have a place. Independence belongs to those who have knowledge of life as it is and of the road that leads from present conditions to the better future. In the Sunday-school, too, all the interests of the church have a rightful place. It is important to know the history of Christianity. Such knowledge helps one to be sane and calm in the presence of desertion and failure. It is necessary to give reasons for believing that the best is yet to be, for ours is a religion of hope, not of renunciation. But neither history nor prophecy is of value unless it is vitally connected with the life we are now living.

That Christianity is a world religion is the common opinion of Christians. This opinion should have proper expression in the teaching and in the worship of the church. A Sunday-school that should teach that Christianity is a local faith and that no effort should be made to preach the gospel to all the nations would be set down as an enemy of Christianity. To the doctrinal statement and the worship must be joined wisely directed efforts to carry the gospel to the nations. "This class has been talked to death," means that there has been a gap between what was said in the class and what its members practiced. There has probably not been too much said as often as there has been too little done. If the children have something to do for missions and can see the value of what they do they will not only give immediate aid to missions but they will be prepared for future usefulness in the church.

It is the right of the child to get his impressions of the non-Christian people and their customs from persons who believe that the strong ought to help the weak, to whom the possibilities as well as the weaknesses of the foreigner are known, and who are able to harmonize theory with practice. It is still common experience to be suspicious of the man of another race and religion. The habits of barbarian ancestors have not been entirely overcome. There is need, then, of education to fit us to judge our neighbor with fairness and kindness, if he happens to differ from us in color and opinion. The educated person will try to understand the lowest savage before he passes judgment on him; the uneducated or half-educated accepts the classifications of prejudice and acts upon them.

We cannot discuss children and the kingdom without discussing adults and the kingdom. The dominant interests of adult members of the church have much to do with the ideas entertained by the children as to what is worth while and what may be disregarded. The community that exhibits its men every Sunday morning in front of the saloons is not likely to raise up a large group of young men devoted to the missionary enterprises of the church. If the Sunday-school is the place for the study of the truths of religion, adults are needed there just as much as the children. When fathers and mothers have no time for the study of the Bible and of Christian activity, the children ought not to be blamed if they conclude that one does not have to be very old before he gets over being religious.

It is necessary to bear in mind that the religion of childhood is not that of youth and that the religion of youth is not that of maturity. For many generations the proverb has been current, "You cannot put old heads on young shoulders." Yet this is what we sometimes try to do when we enter the field of religious education. Have not many of our sorest disappointments come because we have expected children to appreciate motives which appeal only to mature persons and to understand words for which they have no corresponding experience? [Mid-week Service, May 29, Prov. 22:6; Matt. 21:15-16.]

S. J.

The Results of Biblical Criticism

The agitation produced by the critical method in the study of the Scriptures has now given place largely to a feeling of assurance regarding certain of the great results of the method, and of gratitude that upon foundations made available by criticism the work of constructive Bible study may now go forward with fresh vigor.

The alarm that the pursuit of critical studies aroused has now quite subsided, save in the most conservative circles. It is now clearly perceived that biblical criticism is a method and not a result, and that it is inevitable as soon as study supersedes the mere reading of the Word of God. Its results may be either positive or negative, but the method itself is a necessary preparation for the competent use of the Bible.

It is sometimes maintained that biblical criticism is a recent enterprise, begotten by the restless sprit of the nineteenth century. While it is true that the most notable achievements of the process were reached during the last half of the past century, the method itself is as old as the Bible.

It is to be seen in the work of the prophets of Israel. It was their task not only to utter the message of their generation as they understood it, but to review and correct the messages of their predecessors. There are notable instances in the Old Testament of such criticism, in which prophets of a later date repudiated and denounced the teachings of those who had previously spoken in behalf of God.

In the work of the law-givers the same principle is observed. The three great bodies of law which were successively issued in the name of Moses at different periods in the national history, reached ever fresh and more advanced ground, displacing the institutes of an earlier time, and establishing radical departures in new directions. No student who has any acquaintance with the progressive legislation of Israel is unfamiliar with this feature of criticism.

Passing by such revisions of the Psalms and the wisdom literature as mark the activity of biblical critics in other departments of the Old Testament, one notices the attitude of Jesus toward that entire body of literature. The Old Testament was his Bible. He reverenced it, nourished his soul upon its great ideals, quoted it with affection, and in large degree reaffirmed its principles. Yet he employed the critical method with free hand in the discussion of its utterances. He recognized its imperfection and its need of revisal. In subjecting it to such scrutiny as revealed its defects, he put himself at once in the ranks of that company of reverent biblical critics whose work has been so notable a contribution to the illumination of the Word of God.

And in the history of the Christian Church the work of criticism upon the Scriptures has been almost continuous. From the days of the fathers to our own time, with varying impulse and activity, the work of scrutiny, review, and correction has gone on, sometimes in the department of textual revision and sometimes in the field of historical and literary inquiry. Today the process has reached that degree of completeness at which it is possible to speak with confidence of its accepted results, which are the basis of almost universal biblical study.

The results of the critical process have been twofold. On the one hand it has removed many of the unfounded traditions of Jewish and early Christian teachers. The single example of the Book of Hebrews, which for centuries was regarded as the work of the Apostle Paul, but which practically universal Christian scholarship attributes to another hand, illustrates this negative phase of criticism. A long list of similar results might be named.

On the other hand, the work of criticism has been constructive to an equal or even greater degree, in its vindication of many of the early beliefs of the church regarding the authorship of certain of the documents. The leading epistles of Paul, and the synoptic gospels are examples of this type of results.

There are those, to be sure, who would deny that there are any assured results obtainable in the field of biblical criticism. They would point to the fantastic and grotesque suggestions of critical workers here and there as the only results of the process. It need not be denied that many theories have been advanced incapable of proof in the light of fuller examination. But criticism is self-corrective, and such results are suure to receive the assessment they merit at the hands of succeeding inquirers. No result can stand that does not validate itself to the entire group of critical workers.

It would be strange if there were not varieties of opinion expressed in regard to many of the problems which arise in the history of criticism. Many of the criteria are appreciable only through long and careful study. In the nature of the case some of these results will be determined by subjective judgment on the part of the critic, and will not at first appeal to the inexpert opinion of the average reader. Here time and further examination alone can determine whether the results will approve themselves to general judgment.

While it is true that a valid criticism ought to be apparent to the uncritical mind, and that it is the average layman's view which must approve or disapprove of the results, yet it is beyond controversy that in the last issue the results of criticism will find vindication first in the opinion of experts and, then by increasing familiarity they will be accepted by less expert students.

Furthermore, it must be remembered that there is very great variety in the results obtained by critical work. The workers themselves are many. The personal equation of each will determine to a considerable extent his conclusion. And more than this, the eagerness of all to obtain results would inevitably lead to wide varieties of opinion, some of which would appear fantastic to a degree.

Yet in spite of all these facts, the main lines of critical judgment are marvelously attested by the mass of expert opinion. While there are wide variations in regard to details, the main lines of inquiry reveal a harmony of opinion among the critics which is astonishing in view of the subjective and individual judgments which have wrought at the process.

The work of biblical criticism receives valuable illustration at this point from critical activities in other fields, particularly in the realm of art. It would seem impossible to harmonize the varying opinions regarding the artistic creations of the masters of painting and sculpture. Yet as every student knows, in spite of the conflict of schools and the war of individual opinions over details, the great lines of artistic criticism are firmly estabilshed and are accepted by all. Even so are the results of the critical process as applied to the Bible.

The values of these results, both positive and negative, are unquestionable. They make possible a history of Old Testament religion which was never available before the critical process had done its work upon the documents. They are also providing the foundations for a convincing narrative of the New Testament community now for the first time within reach.

They are likewise furnishing the basis for a systematic theology which shall be not merely an arrangement of texts, in harmony with special theories, but a truly systematic and convincing statement of New Testament thought. Precedent to this achievement it was necessary that lower or textual criticism should do its careful work of providing an authoritative text. Then the higher or literary criticism followed with its discussion of the problems of date, authorship, and historicity. On these, once more, biblical theology has built its presentation of the religious views of the different writers of Holy Scripture. And finally upon these foundations the great science of dogmatic theology now proceeds to erect its structure.

The convincing character of the human experiences recorded in the Bible is another of the assured results of the critical process. These human lives in which the principles of the Hebrew and the Christian faiths were disclosed are no cloud-land apparitions as they once tended to be, but are now veritable men of flesh and blood, with whose experience the biblical student finds himself profoundly concerned. The contrast between the colossal and unreal figures of the prophets as they were painted by Michael Angelo and those human and convincing portraits of the prophets as Sargent has depicted them is the difference between the older and uncritical biblical material of religious experience and that which the Bible now furnishes as the result of this process.

But most of all, the divine element in the Scriptures is now more evident and more truly capable of vindication than before the days of criticism. The human character of these documents has become increasingly evident, but the divine purpose which breathes through them and which utilized men for the accomplishment of the ends of the kingdom of God is now clear as never before. And the life of Christ, in which Old and New Testament alike find their completion, reaches a new value in the history of religion and achieves supremacy as the guide, inspiration and goal of the redemptive process in humanity.

A Debt or a Dole

From time to time the churches are subjected to a criticism of the custom of taking an offering for any cause at the regular services.

Some think the finances of a church should be managed in private. It is made to appear that the presence of the contribution plate is fatal to the presence of the unchurched masses.

All such criticisms grow out of a misconception of the place and purpose of the offering. With all its power in the world the sanctity of religion has never become attached to money. We have heard the practice of taking the offering referred to as "vulgar". Many church members regard the passing of the plate as a beggar's boon, and never associate it with the worship of the sanctuary. To them that part of the program is a grind and not a grace; a dignified performance of what may be seen on the streets in the cases of those unfortunates who display their mute appeals for help. The church is regarded as a public mendicant, and the presence of a large congregation is only a splendid opportunity for the invading of the unresponsive pocket.

For much of this condition the church people themselves are responsible. In the smaller towns, in particular, whenever a campaign for funds is announced, good persons on the committees announce that they are out "begging for the church." That phrase does duty for pastor's salary when in arrears, for the purchase of an organ, for the building fund, and for about everything else within the circle of the church's life. "Begging" is overworked. A gift, in the judgment of the workers, is an alms, rather than the payment of a debt, an offering to the Lord or any recognition of a high and holy privilege. It is looked upon as an out and out dole to the church which has placed herself in the attitude of having so little to give that nothing but benevolent bounty is asked in return. Such a course is positively degrading. A great institution like the church, under those conditions, becomes a corporate cripple which cannot be allowed to die, in every community. The church that begs will be treated like a beggar.

For generations the practice of selling sittings, or pew rents was found to give the most satisfactory results. This could be true only of wealthy or large congregations. It was always looked upon as a disagreeable necessity, developing a force of protestants wherever in operation. There seemed to be no help for the distress. Among the disadvantages was the artistocratic and exclusive spirit which it fostered. The poor could have no place within the walls of such a sanctuary without having their poverty emphasized. The visitors must sit near the door, or in the gallery, or they could stand. It took a mighty voice to fill such a church with the lowly or with people in moderate circumstances.

The popular preachers have dispensed with pew rents just as fast as they have been able; they realized that they hardened the distinction between poor and rich into a caste. Last year one great Presbyterian church in Brooklyn abandoned the pew-rent system at a sacrifice of $50,000 a year. That shows that in such churches the spirit of interest in humanity still lives. The members could easily have urged the necessity of the custom, or the premature death of the church as the alternative. But they found other and less objectionable means for carrying on their work than the rental of sittings.

In a recent address, Dr. W. T. Manning of Trinity Church, New York City, declared that "the seats ought to be free and open to all equally; and to see in this an opportunity for us to realize and illustrate more fully the life of the church in this world as our Lord himself wants it to be."

All such utterances are in harmony with the spirit of the age, and are a reflection of the mind of Christ. It is certain that the munificence which invites the rich is certain to repel the poor. In the sanctuary the rich and the poor must sit down together, since the Lord is the maker of them all.

The solution of church finances must be found in the deep devotion of the church to the will of Christ which counts no sacrifice too dear, no service too heroic. The giving of self will render impossible the devices to which we so often resort to fill the treasury, and which advertise loudly the fact that a more complete consecration is waiting the congregations who do these things.

When men make Christ supreme in their lives money becomes an incident; when they make money supreme, Christ becomes an incident. E. B. B.

Editorial Table Talk

A Theme for An Editorial

A correspondent writes as follows: "A. C. Smither's write-up of the Congress was worthy of S. S. Lappin. You ought to write an editorial on the 'Descent of the Editors,' with the careers of five progressive men in mind—J. A. Lord, a radical thinker in Missouri; W. R. Warren, a progressive pastor in Pennsylvania; S. S. Lappin, an up-to-date leader in Illinois, who assumed the editorship of the Christian Standard while assuring his friends that there would be a change of temper and policy there when he got his hand in; Herbert Moninger, a member of the Campbell Institute; and now A. C. Smither, formerly a progressive in California who, while a pastor, earnestly advised two churches, one a Congregational, the other a Disciple, to unite on a basis not involving the re-baptism of the Congregationalists. Why this reaction? Is there anything inherent in our plea that continually drives us back to the days of the Franklins and the Lards?"

There is a theme here, certainly, and we have often thought on it. It has elements of pathos, indeed of spiritual tragedy in it. The cause of this reaction is not in the "plea," however. There are three points of explanation which we would suggest if we were to write the editorial asked for.

First, this tendency to reaction betrays the dominance of the commercial motive in our journalism.

Secondly, it betokens a distrust of the intelligence of the rank and file of the people. The common people and the common preachers are supposed to demand the traditional teaching with much sectarian jingo talk thrown in, and it is supposed that they will support no other kind of paper.

Thirdly, it discloses a certain inward insincerity, albeit not always conscious, in dealing with life's essential ideals. The voice of prophecy is dying out of the Disciples' journalism. Catholic feelings are being displaced by sectarian feelings. The free journalism of the earlier days is being transformed into a vested interest, and it is the vested interests of the denominations that stand in the way of Christian unity more than the sum total of creedal differences. Newspaper leadership without vision and moral independence means that the plea for unity will eventually turn to ashes on our lips.

We do not wish to write the editorial asked for, nor is it necessary. The facts pointed to by our correspondent will write an editorial by themselves if they are made the subject of even a slight degree of reflection.

The Bible as a Sociological Book

It is astonishing to the modern student who reads our sociological literature and also studies the Bible to see how thoroughly the latter is impregnated with modern ideas. In the very beginning we are introduced to primitive races and tribes who help to illustrate any text on social origins. W. Robertson Smith made a great hubbub when he first approached the Bible to discover the significance of these records, but his work still lives in scholarly circles. The growth of a tribe from a family, and of a nation from a tribe in the annals of ancient Israel shows us a social development of profound significance.

Charles R. Brown, of Yale Divinity School, has given us a study of the revolt of Israel in Egypt and calls it the first strike in history. He traces the welding together of the dull mass into a nation. The early history of Israel is social interpretation. It is history written with the religious and social thesis that a nation that lives right will prosper but that a nation of evil-doers will perish. This thesis was illustrated in the downfall of the north kingdom and the dispersion of the ten tribes. The prophet distinctly traces this calamity to such social evils as monopoly, drunkenness, luxury and perjured courts. Had the Christian world not been so interested in studying the prophets to furnish a theological argument on the divinity of Christ, they would have found in the prophets political campaigners against national abuses. They would have found these men exceedingly human in character, and discussing issues essentially modern for this very generation.

And how shall we speak of the social message of the New Testament since every reformer claims Jesus as the patron saint of his movement. Whether it be a philosophic anarchist like Tolstoi, or a socialist, or any other kind of reformer, all believe their principles can be found in the sermon on the mount. The early church was communistic for a time, and Paul was always taking collections in the Greek churches for the poor saints in Jerusalem. Where in the world can you find such uncompromising democrats as Luke and James? If the Bible gives a little to the professor of theology, it gives much to the modern sociologist.

—"The destructive trinity of Literalism, Legalism and Formalism, are begotten one of the other," said Prof. F. O. Norton in his paper at the Kansas City Congress. In the following lucid way he traced their genealogy: "First, what was intended to teach principles has been interpreted to teach legal enactment—literalism; then mere obedience to these legal enactments has been taken as putting God under obligation to save—legalism; and finally, the mere legal requirements have come to be observed without the heart being concerned in the observance—formalism." This trinity is the bane of spiritual religion and the source of sectarian divisions. The task of those who advocate a spiritual religion and a united church is to banish this anti-Christian trinity from Christian thinking and practice. The way to get rid of formalism is to get rid of legalism. The way to get rid of legalism is to get rid of literalism. And the way to get rid of literalism is to affirm and reaffirm that Christ taught principles, not statutes; that there is not a single legal specification in all his gospel; that he was not a legislator, a lawgiver, but a life-giver; that he furnished his followers with the dynamic but not the technique of his kingdom; that he added no new command to religion save to love as he loved. Dr. Norton is right when he insists that no Christian unity is possible while we continue to read the words of the New Testament after a literalistic fashion.

—The "Christian Worker," that bright newspaper published by Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary recently. It was established by Rev. H. O. Breeden who was then pastor of the church. Rev. Finis Idleman, the present pastor, is the present editor, but it is well-known that Mr. George A. Jewett, a layman and elder of Central church, is the active force that has kept the paper going all these years. Few congregations can boast of such a great soul as Geo. A. Jewett. Successful in business he has been through all his years a man of profound spiritual life, gentle, idealistic, tolerant and loyal. Underneath his picture, which the "Worker" prints on its front page in the current issue, are these words: "He is at this hour the epitome of the history of the Disciples of Christ in the city of Des Moines. As a member of the church in this city for near a half century and its clerk from boyhood during forty-six years, as a continuous trustee and secretary of Drake University, he is the incarnation of the dreams and prayers of a religious body now numbering many thousands in this city." The Christian Century congratulates Central Church and the Disciples of Iowa on its possession of this inestimable asset, the Christian personality of Geo. A. Jewett.

—No less than 1,500 French priests have left the Romish Church during the last ten years. The principal causes of such desertions are, the modernism movement, the propaganda made by the laity against the religious community, the separation of church and state, and, finally, the recent papal utterances, full of violence and hatred. The theological seminaries are scantily attended. The number of students is only half that of five years ago. Some of the old priests preach now the gospel of Christ in Protestant churches and chapels. The Romish Church in France is passing through a great crisis.

—Reporting the laying of a corner stone for a new house of worship in an Illinois city the newspapers say that many interesting objects were deposited in the copper box, among them "copies of the Christian Standard of the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries." These were more likely recent issues of our Cincinnati contemporary mistakenly but not unnaturally assigned to antiquity.

The Idealism of Jesus

"I Saw Satan Fall as Lightning from Heaven."—Jesus

BY H. D. C. MACLACHLAN.

Not yet has Satan fallen—hardly has his throne been shaken; yet Jesus, the poet and idealist sees him falling: "I beheld Satan fall as lightning from heaven."

An idealist is one who interprets the world in the light of what should be rather than what is. The realist takes the world at its face value and accepts things as they are. The idealist accepts things as they are only provisionally—as prophecies of greater and better things to be. The realist is static, the idealist is dynamic. The realist has knowledge, the idealist has faith. The realist says "Life is such-and-such"; the idealist says, "Life shall be such-and-such."

In moral matters the realist is the conservative, while the idealist is the radical, the reformer. The realist says, "Let well enough alone;" the idealist says, "There is nothing well enough short of the best." The realist says, "Be not righteous over much, lest society call you a crank;" the idealist says, "Be ye therefore perfect, lest God count you a failure."

The Greatest Idealist.

I make this explanation in order that you may not misunderstand me when I talk about the idealism of Jesus. Jesus was the greatest idealist the world has ever seen. He read everything in the light of eternity. He demanded that human life should stop short only at the perfection of God himself. He criticised the present, only that He might glorify the future. He believed in the perfectibility of human nature. He rested in no half-way-house of morality —no accommodation of the moral law to the convenience of man. Every sentence of the Sermon on the Mount is an idealism—a setting of the world's course not by a rush-light trimmed by the fingers of man, but by the utmost star lighted from the lamp of God.

A God of the Ideal.

Jesus idealized even God Himself. Before His time the world had been content with a commonplace and a compromise God; a divinity that was simply a magnified humanity with all its passions and foibles; a God of the actual, not of the ideal, of the "is," not of the "ought." There was little or nothing "spiritual," as we would say, about the gods of the heathen. They might dwell on Olympus, but they loved and hated, squabbled and "made up," were cruel, envious, and sensual, just like the men and women who worshiped them. The "spirituality" of Greece came from its poets, artists and philosophers—not from its religion; its idealism was the fruit of the sacred grove only after Plato had begun to walk there. Even the God of the Jews, so idealized by the greater prophets, had become in Jesus' day a mere magnified Scribe spending hours in the study of the law of Moses and making salvation turn on the breadth of a hem or the setting of a phylactery. But the faith of Jesus refused to be satisfied with such a God. It demanded that God should be the Highest; that He should be perfect in every attribute of justice, mercy and truth; that the furthest reach of a human thought should be simply a spelling of the first syllables of the perfection that is God. The God of the Pharisees dwelt in temples made with hands; the God of Jesus Christ had His temple in the hearts of men. The God of the Pharisees was a Jew, bigoted and sectional; the God of Jesus Christ was neither Jew nor Greek, but simply human. The God of the Pharisees lowered the standard of righteousness to accommodate his worshipers; the God of Jesus Christ exalted it above human reach in order that—ah, the paradox of idealism!—

H. D. C. Maclachlan.

men might be inspired to reach it. The God of the Pharisees was a lawgiver; the God of Jesus was a Saviour. Further than that idealism could not go.

"How Much More."

"How much more" is Jesus' characteristic phrase about God. If man is just, "how much more" is God. If man is merciful, "how much more" is God merciful. If man is benevolent, "how much more" benevolent is God. If man is a father, "how much more" fatherly is the Father in Heaven. Nay he went further. He said, "God is man at His highest and best." "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father," He said to Thomas, who wanted to handle things unseen. But he did not mean that Thomas could see God with the physical eye or apprehend Him with the natural mind: He meant the eye of faith—the idealizing power which, seeing the perfection of Jesus within the limitations of His brief ministry and the greater limitations of His age and country, could expand them into a conception of the Father in Heaven who had sent such a Son to earth.

Thus Jesus humanized God and in so doing idealized Him. The realist would take infinitude and bring it down to the level of finitude. Jesus, being an idealist, took imperfect humanity and, making it perfect in Himself, called that perfection God.

Man More than He Seems.

In the second place, Jesus idealized human nature. Man was more to Him than he seemed. He might be ugly, miserable and sinful; but he was made to be beautiful, happy and good. Had He looked merely at things as they are, he must have despaired of human nature; for no one ever has had such a keen sense of the injustice and cruelties of life or the abysmal depths of sin as had Jesus of Nazareth. But even in the worst injustice and blackest sin He divined a star of hope. Man might be bad; but he was the son of God. He might have wandered into the far country; but back in the recesses of his soul were hidden the memories of the Father's house, waiting at the right touch to lift him up from the swine and turn his weary feet homeward. The coin might be lost; but it was still a coin, bearing beneath all the filth and grime the image and superscription of the King. And even to the drunkard in the gutter and the harlot on the street it could be said: "Be ye therefore perfect."

Christ's Idealism Tested.

Ah, but they say: "That is mere idealism; the facts of human nature do not bear Jesus out." Do they not? Did not Christ put his theory to the test? Did not human nature respond to his touch? Ask Matthew the Publican, who forsook all and followed him. Ask Paul the persecutor and blasphemer who in after years was to say, "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." Ask the weeping girl who bathed his feet with the hot tears of penitence and wiped them dry with her long silken tresses—ask her what power released the hidden springs of virtue in her breast and brought her back, bruised and bleeding, to the Heart of Love.

Humanity at the Highest

But Jesus' greatest idealization of human nature was Himself. In his life and death He was saying to the world of sinning, suffering men and women, "See what humanity at the highest is. See what you may by my help become." He was not a supernatural being apart from humanity and therefore no paragon for it, but the Elder Brother—bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. Yet He was perfect. He was the carpenter's son of Nazareth; yet nineteen centuries have utterly failed to exhaust the treasures of that life. "Christ no after-age shall e'er outgrow." He is the leader of the race; the beacon-light of universal history; the vindication of God's wisdom in making man—human but flawless, a man but a God! And looking on him at his highest, humanity even at its lowest can say: "That is what God wants me to be, and what by his grace I may yet become."

The Practice of Idealism

Thus Jesus not only preached idealism, but practiced it; not only theorized that human nature was perfectible, but started it out on the road to perfection; not only said, "Ye are sons of God" but himself, the Elder Brother, reached out his strong, tender arms and gathered men and women into the great household of love.

Furthermore, Jesus idealized human society. Others had said, "Heaven must be postponed far into the future;" Jesus said, "Heaven is here at your doors." Others had said, "The kingdom of God supplants this world;" Jesus said, "The Kingdom of heaven is within you." He began his preaching in Galilee with the announcement, "The Kingdom of heaven is at hand," and all through his ministry he went on the assumption that this kingdom in its perfection of peace and purity could be realized here below.

The Sermon on the Mount.

Look for a moment at the Sermon on the Mount. It is Jesus' legislation for the new kingdom. There sits He on the hilltop among his disciples laying down law after law for human conduct not as it is, but as it shall be when his gospel shall have had "free course and been glorified." All the laws based on the imperfection of human nature are abrogated by others based on its possible perfection. Moses had said, "Thou shalt not kill," but Jesus says "Thou shalt not be angry with thy brother." Moses had said, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself," Jesus said, "Swear not at all." "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," was the old compromise with the hardness of men's hearts. Jesus, believing that human hearts were not hard at all but soft when touched with divine love, refused all compromise and said, "Whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." Of old they had humanized the will of God when they said: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy;" Jesus divinized the will of man when He said: "Love your enemies and pray for them that persecute you." The best human morality had said, "Be as good as you can;" Jesus said: "Be ye therefore perfect even as your Father in Heaven is perfect."

The Ultimate Heresy.

"But," they sometimes tell us, "all that is very beautiful, but quite impracticable. It may serve very well for a dream-world, but is quite impossible as a rule of real life." Ah! that is the worst form of unbelief, the ultimate heresy; for it means that Jesus was a visionary—a companion for idle moments, but not a helper in the dust of the fight. If the ideals that He set before us in the Sermon on the Mount are really above and beyond human attainment; if it is forever impossible that human society shall be a reflection of the divine; if the struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest is the last word of human progress; if the brotherhood of man is only poetry that can never be translated into fact—then, we need not hesitate to say it, Jesus of Nazareth is to be numbered among the pathetic failures of history—the most pathetic because the most self-assured. He stakes all on the one throw of love, and to doubt the triumph of love is to deny the Christ of God.

The Preacher an Idealist.

Again they sometimes tell us preachers: "Don't be so idealistic. Be more practical, less uncompromising, more 'safe and sane.'" Could a more unworthy temptation come to a preacher of the Gospel? His business is not to accommodate the law of God to human frailties—(God will take account of these in his own way)—but to demand that human nature shall be content with nothing short of the highest, nothing less than the best. In so far as he preaches the ideals of Jesus, he must be in advance of the society to which he ministers; in so far as he is not in advance of it, but merely accommodates himself to its moral and social conventions for peace' and policy's sake, he is not preaching the ideals of Jesus, but furthering the interest of one whom Browning describes as "The devil, the old stager, at his trick

Of general utility, that leads Downward, perhaps, but fiddles all the way."

This in conclusion let me say. Our faith in Jesus is manifest in no other way than by accepting his interpretation of life and throwing all that we have and are into his battle for a redeemed humanity. Who among us will enlist for that campaign? Who among us will fight side by side with Him for a better world?

"Charge once more, then, and be dumb;
Let the victors, when they come—
When the forts of folly fall—
Find your body by the wall!"

When the Superintendent Went Calling

By Arthur Stern Robb

Sagebrush Bill sat before his little shack one bright Monday morning, his rickety chair tilted back against the open door, his right leg thrown carelessly across his left knee. A somewhat soiled and battered account book rested on the knee of the crossed leg, held firmly in place with the forefinger of his left hand, while the other hand patiently and laboriously checked off a list of names with a very short and very blunt pencil. As the pencil slowly traveled down the list, the frown on the forehead of Sagebrush Bill deepened. The stubby graphite reached the last name but one, when suddenly it remained poised above the book, arrested by a thought that came to the long, lanky figure seated in the tilted chair. Sagebrush raised his eyes from his task and let them rest on a prickly-pear that was trying to look respectable in the hot sunshine, some hundred yards away on the prairie. For full five minutes Sagebrush stared at the cactus, then slowly the pencil finished its journey upward and its point rested beneath his nose. A grim smile took the place of the frown, and a deep chuckle sent the pencil back to check the last name in the open book before him. The chair came down on its four legs with a jar that set every piece of wood in its groaning frame trembling, and rising to his six-feet-two Sagebrush Bill disappeared quickly through the open doorway of his shack.

Mr. William Hackett, locally yclept "Sagebrush Bill," was the superintendent of the Saddle-Horn Sunday-school, having held that office just three months to a day. He had been "rounded up and branded," as he expressed it, by the home missionary; and when the home missionary organized the Saddle-Horn Sunday-school, Sagebrush had been prevailed upon to take the position of superintendent. And a right good one he made, too, for Sagebrush was thoroughly in earnest in his conversion. As he said, he was no longer a "maverick," but belonged to the "herd of the Saddle-Horn corral."

Now one thing in this Sunday-school business that Sagebrush could not understand was why, when people so easily promised to come to Sunday-school, they never came, and were always ready with a long string of excuses to explain their absence when he called on them for an explanation. Again, some scholars would attend a single session of the Sunday-school and that would be the last the superintendent would see of them until a call from him would result in the presence of the delinquent scholar another Sunday. And then that was the end of the scholar's attendance until the next visit from the superintendent or a teacher.

On this bright Monday morning the home missionary had called, and Sagebrush had commented in not uncertain terms on this phase of his Sunday-school work.

"Now, why is it, parson, so many folks promise to come out, and then furgit all about it?" remarked Sagebrush to the home missionary as he was leaving.

"I do not know, Sagebrush, unless it is human nature," replied the home missionary, as his little broncho started off. Just as the home missionary reached the road that ran by the shack, he stopped, and, looking back at Sagebrush with a twinkle in his eye, he added: "Many of the people are from some of the large Eastern cities, and they may have learned the habit before coming here." And with this parting shot, the home missionary rode away. Then it was that Sagebrush had gotten out his little roll-book and tipped his chair against the shack to study out a plan to improve the attendance at the Saddle-Horn Sunday-school.

At just 1:30 that afternoon Walt Jones reported at the post-office of the little prairie town that he had seen Sagebrush Bill back of his shanty sharpening a bowie-knife on a grindstone. At 2:10 Hank Smith rode up and gave out that, as he passed the shack of Sagebrush, he had seen him sitting in the doorway polishing three six-shooters and a Colt's 45. (The 45 was a very special favorite with Sagebrush.) At 3:45 Lariat Jim called for his paper and said he had just left Sagebrush greasing his seventeenth cartridge and the other sixteen were setting in a row on the door sill, each cartridge looking neat and ready for business with a fresh coat of tallow.

Many were the conjectures as to the cause of these war-like preparations on the part of Sagebrush. It was known that "he had got religion," but it was also well known in the Saddle-Horn community that he was a dead shot, and that he could throw a bowie-knife into a knot-hole in a barn door at twenty paces.

It was Wednesday evening when Sagebrush swung himself into his saddle to make, what he termed "a few Paris calls." He was fully armed. From his belt hung two six-shooters and a hunting-knife. From one boot-leg protruded the butt of another six-shooter, and from the other the handle of a bowie-knife was visible. From his hip-pocket the polished handle of his favorite 45 glinted in the sunlight. An extra belt of cartridges was slung across his broad shoulder. As the rays of the setting sun fell upon the cactus on the prairie Sagebrush drew the 45 from his pocket, and carelessly pointing the barrel in the direction of the prickly-pear, pulled the trigger. There was a flash, a puff of smoke, a roar, and one of the purple spiny fruits on the topmost cactus stem flew into a thousand fragments. With a peculiar smile Sagebrush trotted his pony up the road.

The first place at which Sagebrush reined up his pony was the little frame shanty of Walt Jones. The family was at supper, but a vigorous knock on the door brought one of Walt's girls to open it.

"Howdy, Clairy, is yer dad in?" spoke Sagebrush, in his best manner. Before "Clairy" could answer, Walt, himself, came to the door with a cheerful "g'd evenin', Sagebrush, come in."

"No, thank ye, ain't got time. I jist called t' see why yer children weren't at Sunday-school last Sunday."

"T' tell ye the truth, Sagebrush we didn't git up airly enough. Ye ort t' hold Sunday-school in the arfternoon."

Sagebrush closed his right hand over the butt of the left boot-leg six-shooter. "They'll be out next Sunday, Walt?"

"Yes, yes, Sagebrush," hastily returned Walt.

"And say, Walt," the six-shooter came half-way out, "ye'll be thar, too?"

"Yes, siree!" This with emphasis.

"And ye'll all be thar ev'ry Sunday after this?" The gun was all the way out now, and looked cold and shiny in the dim light from the kerosene lamp, that streamed through the open door.

"Ye bet, Sagebrush," and as Sagebrush gently rubbed one finger along the barrel, Walt added, "Ye won't hev to come agin, we'll come reglar; honest Injun."

The revolver went back to its place with the "thank ye" of Sagebrush, and as he got into his saddle, he said significantly, "I'll look for ye all, Sunday."

The next house was that of old Pap Wells, at the head of Jenkins draw. Sagebrush got off his pony, and, hanging his square-braided quirt to the saddle-horn, he drew the Colt's 45 from his pistol-pocket and hammered loudly on the door. Old Pap Wells opened the door in response to the ominous tattoo to find himself staring into the muzzle of a very ugly-looking weapon.

"Why, howdy-do, Sagebrush, whut's wrong?"

"Howdy, Pap, I've called to see why yer boys weren't at Sunday-school Sunday."

"Why, ye see, we—we fooled 'round somehow, and they didn't git started—we jist natcherally let the time slip by without noticin'."

Click! The 45 hardly moved as the hammer came back. "Will they be out next Sunday, Pap?"

"Will they? Well I guess; I'll bring 'em myself."

"Thank ye, Pap. I don't want t' make another call on the subjeck."

"Ye won't have to, Sagebrush."

"Good-night, Pap."

"Good-night, Sagebrush."

The third place on the calling list was the home of Shanty Dick. Sagebrush tapped on the door with the handle of the bowie-knife, —by way of variation, and Shanty answered the summons.

"Wall, whut's the racket now, Sagebrush?" exclaimed Shanty, starting back, as he saw the walking arsenal before him.

"Shanty, I ain't seen none of yer family out t' Sunday-school or church."

"Don't need to come, Sagebrush. We can warship right here on the prairie; and, 'sides, we work hard all week, and we need the rest on Sundays."

"Mebbe so, mebbe so," replied Sagebrush, as he softly ran the end of his thumb along the edge of the bowie-knife, "but ye'll come out next Sunday?"

"I don't know about thet, ye have jist had my sentiments," returned Shanty, somewhat nervously.

For reply, Sagebrush jammed the point of the bowie-knife into the open door, pulled a gun from his belt and the Colt's 45 from its holster, and sticking the barrels into the face of Shanty Dick, he said, clearly and smoothly, giving each word the same even tone, "Ye and yer family'll be at the Saddle-Horn Sunday-school next Sunday, at ten o'clock, forenoon; ain't I kerect?"

"Ye aire that, Sagebrush, we'uns 'll be thar, ev'ry one of us—won't be a single one missin'."

"Come airly, Shanty; good singin'."

"All right, Sagebrush. ye kin count on me."

"Good-night, Shanty."

"Good-night, Sagebrush."

The last call Sagebrush made that evening was at the little sod-house of Hy Simpkins, who lived three-quarters of a mile northeast of the big Bunch-grass buffalo-wallow. Sagebrush knocked gently, for he did not want to disturb the whole household, if they were in bed. Simpkins answered the knock immediately, and, as he opened the door, he held a lamp high above his head to see who his caller might be.

"Why, hallo, Sagebrush, is the ye? Come right in, whut be ye doin' with all them shootin' irons; the family is in bed, but come in anyhow. And bowie-knives, too, what—"

"Hy, broke in Sagebrush, "I'm makin' a few calls this evenin'. I ain't seen anny of yer boys out t' Sunday-school."

"Wall, Sagebrush, I ain't much on goin' to Sunday-school or church myself, an' I don't like to make my boys do things whut I don't like to do. Ef they ain't got enny inclination to go to Sunday-school or church they kin stay to hum."

Sagebrush quickly pulled the favorite 45, and, as he held the barrel in his left hand, the muzzle pointing towards Hy, he ejected the empty shell left in the cylinder from the shot at the prickly-pear. Drawing a fresh cartridge from the full belt, Sagebrush deftly slipped it into the empty chamber, and snapping the weapon together he stuck the muzzle under Hy's long nose, as he exclaimed slowly: "Do ye smell the taller, fresh and prime, on that lead, Hy?"

The lamp never wavered in Hy's hand as he answered somewhat faintly: "I do, Sagebrush, I reely do, s'help me."

"Bring the boys t' Sunday-school next Sunday, Hy?"

"Ye bet, be thar on th' dot, whut's th' time?"

"Ten a'clock—ye won't furgit?"

"Wall, I guess not."

"All right, Hy, I must be goin'; good-night."

"Good-night, Sagebrush; I'll be thar with the kids."

And Sagebrush rode away in the darkness toward the lonely little shack on the prairie that he called home.

But time will not permit telling of all the calls that Sagebrush made that week. Suffice to say that on the following Sunday the Saddle-Horn Sunday-school was packed to the door; and the attendance and interest kept up all summer. But that fall Sagebrush Bill was "found out," and the superintendent of the Saddle-Horn Sunday-school received a call to superintend the Sunday-school of a large influential church in an eastern city.

And he took the Colt's 45 with him.

Methodism at Minneapolis

Doings and Sayings of Methodist Quadrennial Gathering

The great Minneapolis conference, to continue throughout May, is characterized by spirited sessions, as great questions of vital interest to Methodism are debated and decided.

Bishops' Report.

In their report on episcopacy, the bishops declared emphatically that there is no lack of leadership in the church, and said: "It is a singular fact that the most insistent demand for more leaders comes from those centers of population where already are concentrated our strongest preachers and our strongest laymen."

The address said that many modifications of episcopal power have been made, that the power of receiving and suspending ministers had been taken away; that the bishops no longer have the power to choose their own residences; that they have no supervision over colleges; that the office is "in the vital elements of denominational protection, as well as tactical leadership, without legal equipment or authority." "The Methodist bishop," said the address, "cannot even enforce discipline against any preacher or member who refuses duty." It was declared that under these conditions, fears of abuse of power by the bishops are groundless; that the appointive power of bishops was not such that it could be used to coerce a preacher's conscience or judgment; that a large number of the appointments are made in harmony with the wishes of those concerned.

Opposed Diocesan System.

With this introduction, the bishops attacked the proposed plan to create geographical districts, and declared that instead of adopting the diocesan system, it would be better to "exalt the pastor and dignify the district superintendent." The address declared that under the present system, there could be no "high church nor low church controversies, no ritualistic and anti-ritualistic agitations; no serious doctrinal disturbances."

The bishops indicated their belief that the old system of ministerial itineracy should be established, and that a minister should not be permitted to remain in one charge more than a limited number of years.

Important Question.

Dr. Edgar Blake, of New Hampshire conference, favored prompt and efficient analysis of the bishops' address relating to episcopal supervision. He declared that the effectiveness of the college of bishops was one of the important questions of the church, and that no part of the episcopal report was given more attention by the college than that subject.

"The clergy are not to be restricted from expressing their opinions on so grave a question of the church," declared Dr. Blake. "No man is to be read out of the camp as a mere camp guard because he expresses an opinion contrary to episcopal enunciation, and it is time to cause a halt in the episcopal suppression of the clergy."

Dr. Blake said the effectiveness of the bishops had been attacked on two grounds: the appointment of supervision without regard to episcopal residences, and on account of continuity of service. He said that one conference in Maine had been presided over by a different bishop each year. He declared that no regard was taken of episcopal residence in assigning bishops to work of the year, and that episcopal courtesy frequently prevented the resident bishop from having any control over his territory.

"Four-fifths of all assignment of bishops in the last four years have been outside the episcopal territory of the dignitaries' residence," he said. "In my own conference during that time we have been presided over by a bishop from California, one from Tennessee, and another from Switzerland, while our resident bishop has not taken part in episcopal supervision, because of courtesy to the bishop presiding at the annual conference. We must have continuity of service of our bishops if we are to get direct and active episcopal supervision."

The Vice Problem.

Taking up the vice question, the address declared that no school, home, or companionship is safe against the "pollution of vice."

"When the profits of the brothels of a single American city are set down by an authorized committee on vice at $16,000,000 for a single year, when it is declared in reputable prints that there are 100,000 unpunished manslayers at large in this country, not including the large class of influential citizens who do their killing under legal sanction, what have we to say for American morals?

"Can anything less than the new birth save the people? The world is growing better, but it has yet to learn to mourn more for its sins than for its catastrophes."

Problems.

Discussing Methodist problems, the address declared that great danger is contained in the tendency toward congregational episcopacy, which was branded as "unthinkable."

The address declares that "the maze of Sunday revelries in city and country and the craze for cheap amusements, for orders, clubs, fraternities, and sports, exclude religion from the thoughts of all classes and ages."

The address declared that the gospel preached by Methodism is not losing its power and should never be ashamed. "For it is the power of God unto salvation unto everyone that believeth."

Against Tobacco.

The conference, by three-fourths vote, declared that no man who uses tobacco in any form is eligible to election to any office in the gift of the conference.

The conference unanimously adopted a resolution approving the action of Indian Commissioner Robert J. Valentine, in ordering that no clerical garb be worn in government schools. The resolutions asked that Secretary of the Interior, Walter Fisher, uphold this order.

The conference went on record as favoring the union of Methodist churches, and sent a greeting to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Arbitration between capital and labor was approved.

Defeat Supreme Court.

The project to establish an ecclesiastical supreme court for the church was defeated by a two-thirds vote.

The committee on judiciary proposed to create a court of appeals made up of fifteen men—bishops, ministers, and laymen—ineligible to but elected by the general conference, to hear appeals and pass upon questions of law submitted to the general conference. At present, the conference itself is the highest appellate body of the church.

Opposed to It.

Dr. Blake, of New Hampshire, said: "It is not machinery, but dynamics, we need. The gain of the church during the last quadrennium, is approximately 40,000 less in membership than in the previous four years. Our gain last year was less than one and one-half per cent of the church. There is nothing wrong in a body selected by this conference to hear appeals and determine questions of law; but to give that body the right to pass on actions of this body, is without parallel in the reactionary proceedings of the church."

Rev. R. A. Chase, of Greeley, Colo., attacked the report in a bitter manner, declaring that the project would sell democratic rights of the church for "a mess of pottage." He said by adopting the report the conference itself would be dissolved. He characterized the report as a revolution of the whole church, and called it a "trust" and a "monarchy." "It is a bad time to institute a trust," said Dr. Chase. "As a general body, we have had to reverse ourselves less than any supreme court of this country. This speaks well for the sound judgment of the delegated representatives of the great church."

Dr. James M. Buckley, of New York, said: "I am opposed totally to this affair. It would take away from this conference our freedom. This court of final appeals was opposed from the beginning of Methodism in America. Two general conferences at least decided against it. It is not wanted."

Women Pastors?

Barred thirty-one years ago from the Methodist Episcopal ministry by a church rule prohibiting the ordination of women ministers, but finally coming to the Methodist general conference as a lay delegate, Mrs. Katherine L. Stevenson, of Massachusetts, has presented to the conference a memorial withdrawing the ban on women ministers. She declares she will carry the fight to the floor of the conference, and that she believes that women "if called by God," should be chosen as bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church.

"Women," said she, "have just as much right to preach as men, if they are called by God into the Christian ministry. Why should women be denied the authority of the church to preach in the churches? If God calls a woman to preach, and he certainly does, for he called me to preach the gospel, why should men question God's call of a woman into the ministry? Think of men refusing to listen to a call of God, simply because it is made to a woman?

Colored Church.

A resolution was presented by Dr. W. M. Lucas, of Mississippi, regarding episcopal supervision of the colored church.

"We need some episcopal supervision of the Southern church," said Dr. Lucas. "We are not making growth, and I doubt that the white church would have made any advancement with the limited supervision given to our part of the church in the last four years. We have not had more than thirty days of episcopal supervision in four years, and with 350,000 communicants of the church, it is time that the church gave us special consideration."

English Topics

Crisis Near in Home Rule and Disestablishment

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

Two bills of first-class importance have been introduced into the House of Commons—the Irish Rule bill, and the Welsh Disestablishment bill. There would be absolutely no hope of getting either of them through both branches of Parliament were it not that the Reform bill had previously been passed. The lords would throw them both out without a moment's consideration. As it is they will be thrown out in the first instance, but the hope of the Government is to secure their passage before the end of the present Parliament under the two year rule by which it is possible to pass a bill over the heads of the lords.

Attitude of Opposition.

Of course the Opposition is saying that the present government has no mandate from the people to pass the Home Rule bill, and this in spite of the fact that they did their best in the last two elections to assert that there was nothing else before the country. This is easily explained since they believed that they had more hope of winning in English constituencies if the fight were on this question than if it were on either tariff reform or the reform of the House of Lords. It is probably true that Home Rule would not carry if it were submitted to a referendum in English constituencies alone. It does not seem to have entered into the heads of some people that others should sometimes be given what they want, not what we want them to have.

Violence a Possibility.

Ireland is practically unanimous for Home Rule outside of Ulster, but some are even trying to say that Ireland does not want it. Feeling is running high on both sides, and is destined to run higher still before the matter is settled. It will be surprising if there is not even bloodshed. Open threats to that effect are continually made, especially by opponents of Home Rule. The threats used to be on the other side, and some of them were carried out, but now with a brighter prospect for the success of Home Rule, the tables are turned. It is a significant fact that the more conciliatory methods adopted of late years by Home Rulers have had their effect. Suffragettes might well learn a lesson from this.

I will not undertake to deal with the details of this bill as Home Rule is such a popular question in America that your papers have doubtless thrown full light on the bill as now before Parliament.

Welsh People Favor It.

The Welsh Disestablishment bill has been laid before the House within the last few days. Mr. McKenna is the member of the government responsible for this. It is hoped that he will be more successful in getting the bill through than he was in getting the Education bill through. His method of introducing the Welsh bill has been referred to as the "new way," as he declared that he was coming with a sword in his hand when he made the educational proposals. His critics imply that he has broken his sword and now trusts to more lamblike methods. His assurance that the proposal for the disestablishment of the Church in Wales is in part for its own good is not received seriously by his opponents. It is suggested that it would be an analogous situation for a highwayman to assure his victim that he was relieving him of his valuables lest they might prove to him a hindrance and a snare. As has already been said the claim is made that Wales does not want disestablishment. The reply is, that thirty-one out of the thirty-four constituencies in Wales sent liberals to the present Parliament with a distinct pledge that they would demand disestablishment. In the 1906 election, when there was a landslide for Liberalism, every Welsh representative was a Liberal. The campaign has been on for fifty years, and there is no question about the majority of them wanting it. The Established Church is the strongest Church in Wales compared with any single Free Church, but has only about one-third the number of communicants which are found in the Free Churches combined. It is claimed that the Established Church is at present growing faster than the Free Churches, but in other quarters it is denied. One difficulty is to secure accurate statistics, the communicants at Easter being practically the only available test.

Free Churches Decrease.

It is not at all improbable that the Established Church may have increased in numbers faster than the Free Churches during the past four or five years. They were not so much affected by the great Welsh revival, and hence have not suffered during later years from the tremendous slump to which the Free Churches have been subject. It was certainly grossly unfair for a certain Liberal M. P. to quote in a speech in the Commons the Free Church statistics from 1902 to 1908, saying that the Free Churches increased by 7,000 per year, and then to quote the Church statistics from 1905 to 1911, showing that the increase was only at the rate of 2,000 per year. It could probably be shown that the Free Churches in Wales had lost 7,000 per year in the past four of five years.

Lloyd George Defends Bill.

The bill was supported in the House yesterday in a powerful speech from Mr. Lloyd George, who was on his feet for an hour and a half, and was subject, as usual, to severe heckling. He declared that all the great preachers whose names are household words in Wales were Nonconformists. The great Sunday-school organization for old and young in Wales (a unique situation, for in England Sunday-schools cater almost exclusively to children, and they often of the poorer class) was built up by the Free Churches. The same was true, he declared, of all the organizations which were peculiar to the Welsh people. He used, with great force, the point that much of the endowment of the Church originally belonged to the Roman Catholics, and that it was taken without any prickings of conscience. Since 1662 the Church had added only a mere fraction to its endowments. To the Roman Catholic Church the Church of England represents a schism. "It is as heretical," Mr. George Lloyd declared, "as the Baptist Church; as much a heretic as I am. The noble lord (referring to Lord Hugh Cecil) is a schismatic and is no better than a Baptist."

Reformation a Precedent.

More property was taken over at the time of the Reformation than is being taken over by the present bill. The charge that the endowments would be devoted to secular purposes was answered by the assertion that the maintenance of the poor was not a secular service. Did someone say that you are taking away something that was given to God, his answer was "he who gives to the poor lends to the Lord."

The Church will retain about 750,000 dollars per year. That, he declared, was not spoliation, robbery or plunder. If it was, the plunderers did not know their business.

A splendid thrust, popularly phrased, was given by Mr. George Wyndham, when he said, "The Government is asking the House to take the property of the faith of ages in order to endow the fads of the moment."

Provisions of the Bill.

Briefly the bill provides that the four Welsh dioceses shall be disconnected from Canterbury. The strong exception taken to this provision makes it clear that they are finding themselves the victims of the very system, the overthrow of which they are protesting against. When the Church is disestablished Parliament will have no longer power to either help or injure.

Power is given to form a synod to provide for the future government of the Church.

The present endowment is £260,000, of this amount, a minimum of £87,000 is left to start with, and in addition to this, every existing incumbent is to hold his existing stipend as long as he holds the living. For many years the Church will continue to receive the benefits of the whole endowments, but this will gradually drop until they receive only about one-third. Under certain conditions, however, they may have the benefit of two-thirds. The sum of about 130,000 dollars, now used for the maintenance of Welsh Bishoprics, is to be handed over to the University of Wales for distribution amongst Welsh colleges. No endowments received since the year 1662 are to be in any way interfered with.

Diverting of Funds.

On the face of it, it appears to the unprejudiced lay mind that it is wrong to touch any of the endowments, but when it is pointed out, and even admitted by the opposition, that what are commonly called endowments are not so much endowments as they are trust funds, a new light is thrown on the matter. These funds were originally left very largely for the support of the poor, and the advancement of education. Quite aside from the fact that many of these funds were devoted in the age of corruption in the Church for the use of unworthy bishops and clergy, there is this fact that goes a long way towards establishing the perfect fairness of the proposals, namely, that while the purposes for which much of this money was given were once supported and managed by the Church, they are now dependent upon public funds. The taking over of education by the nation is one thing. The improvement and extension of the Poor Law is another. The more recent provision for old age pensions, and the benefits under the insurance act are others.

Measure to Benefit Whole.

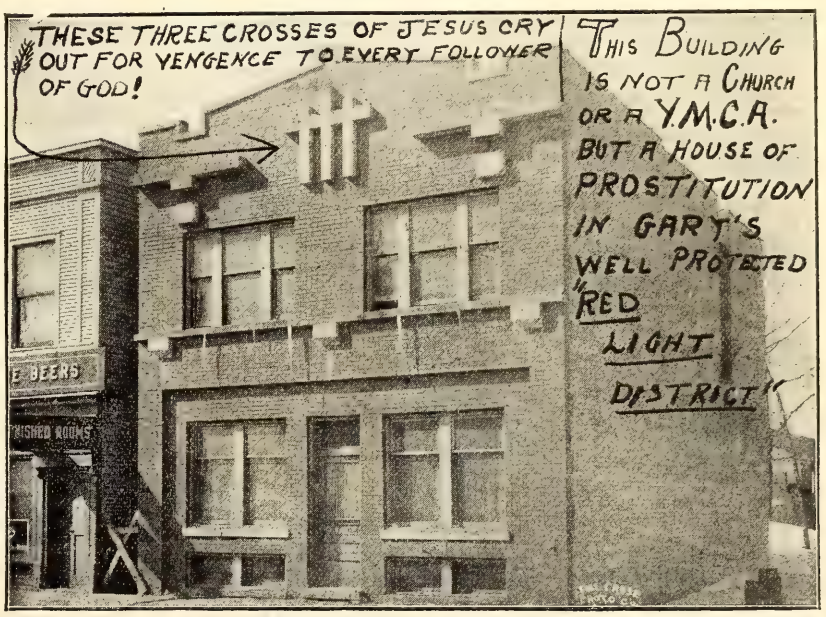
It really means this, that the money will be administered for the benefit of the whole people rather than for the benefit of a single denomination.

The strong opposition to this bill is explained largely on the ground that its enemies fear, and its friends hope, that it is but the entering wedge for more drastic action which will end in the disestablishment of the Church in England.

"Wringcliff," Priory Road,
Hornsey, London.

THE STORY OF THE THREE CROSSES

BY NELSON H. TRIMBLE.



THESE THREE CROSSES OF JESUS CRY OUT FOR VENGENCE TO EVERY FOLLOWER OF GOD!
THIS BUILDING IS NOT A CHURCH OR A Y.M.C.A. BUT A HOUSE OF PROSTITUTION IN GARY'S WELL PROTECTED "RED LIGHT DISTRICT"
BEERS

Down in the heart of the vice district in Gary, Ind., a building was erected for immoral uses, and the owner in a defiant mood had set in the wall over the door three stone crosses of the same type and style that usually remind Christians of their Master crucified!

The plan was so cruel and wicked that the acts of those who hung our Saviour on the tree seem almost considerate beside this staggering blasphemy.

Months have gone by since this sneer in stone was turned toward the Christian population of the city. No one seems to resent the blow. God pity us!

Perhaps these agents of darkness have unwittingly portrayed the real condition of things. I am wondering if it would not be well to plant three crosses at the entrance way to every vice district in our country and let them stand symbolical of the triple crucifix that takes place each time a life is poisoned in these dives.

One cross would represent the city administration and the official paid by the taxpayers to keep the city clean.

Another would represent the business interests of the city that are in open or silent partnership with the greed that made all this shame possible.

The third cross, the central and largest one, would represent the silent Christians who remain calm and unprotesting in the face of this most stupendous problem.

Every time a soul goes into one of these houses of death each of the three responsible groups crucify Christ anew.

If our hearts would understand this we could not sleep unprotesting as the myriads of bleeding crosses came before our eyes. We would protest, we would proclaim. A new crusade would be spontaneously born, not to rescue a tomb, but to save life. We would go forth on the pilgrimage of salvation, if we could but catch the vision, and never sheathe our sword of light until we had rescued every contrite sister and every penitent brother from the Golgothas of the world.

—The newest organization to apply for incorporation under the New York state laws is the American Society for the Protection of the Alleged Insane, which aims to save sane folks from being held for insanity. The incorporators state that "many cases where sane persons were pronounced insane, committed to institutions, and ultimately discharged after legal fights, prompted clergymen, lawyers, and physicians, to organize this society for the purpose of preventing such miscarriages of justice."

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS."

Copyright 1911, George H. Doran Co.

CHAPTER VI

"Didn't you know that this lamp has already been made and patent applied for by Gambrich of New York?"

"No! When?"

"Within the last week. Wait. I'll show you."

Anderson went over to his own desk at the end of the shop. In the few minutes he was gone, Walter and Bauer exchanged questions.

"Do you suppose that's true?"

"Doesn't seem possible, does it? If it is, our cake is dough."

"Anderson seemed pleased when he announced the fact, if it is one," said Walter bitterly.

"It may not be true, you know," said Bauer hopefully.

Anderson had come back in time to hear the last sentence.

"It is true, though, young man. See."

He had the last copy of the Electrical News, and it was open at an illustrated page.

He laid it down on Walter's bench and he and Bauer eagerly bent over it.

Almost the first glance revealed the fact that the lamp described in the paper was identical with their own and application for a patent had been made within ten days. The account of the discovery, moreover, made the date earlier than the discovery made by Walter.

"You see, don't you," said Anderson, "Gambrich has exactly the same device of metal coupled to one electrode. It's an ingenious device and you fellows have certainly great credit for thinking it out almost simultaneously with Gambrich."

"According to this account, our lamp was made before Gambrich's. Does that give him priority of invention?" asked Walter eagerly.

Anderson shrugged his shoulders.

"Priority of manufacture does not legally cut any figure by the side of priority of invention. You might be able to prove that you had made the lamp before Gambrich made his, but that would not help you any if he invented his arrangement first, long before you made your lamp."

"Is that really strict justice?" said Bauer slowly.

"It is law," said Anderson grimly, "and you must remember that law and justice are not in every case synonymous. I'm sorry for you fellows. There's a lot of money in that invention for the manufacturers of the lamp, and considerable for the inventor if he knows how to make terms."

"Do you mean," asked Walter gloomily, "that really we have no right at all with what we have made?"

"Don't you see you haven't? What can you do? Ask any lawyer, if you don't believe me."

Anderson spoke somewhat testily as he started to go away.

"I believe you're glad we missed this opportunity," said Walter angrily. He was tremendously discouraged over the event and could not control his feelings.

Anderson grew very red and turned on Walter in a rage.

"I don't mind saying I am glad your pride has had a tumble. You have been unbearable for some time. Maybe this will teach you a lesson. There are people in the world who know a little about electricity as well as yourself."

All of which was not calculated to sweeten Walter's sense of defeat or make him more friendly to Anderson, who, after glaring at Bauer, who had not said a ward, abruptly went out of the shop.

The lamp was working all this time, with an exasperating smoothness and precision that spoke eloquently of its financial possibilities. There were a few workers in the other parts of the shop who, realizing that some unusual event was on, began to gather around Walter and Bauer and ask questions. Among the group was Van Shaw.

In a few moments everyone knew the story of the lamp, and Walter and Bauer came in for congratulations over the invention and sympathy for its uselessness to them.

"I could have told everybody about that lamp two months ago," said Van Shaw, speaking with an indirect manner peculiarly offensive to Walter. "I have had advices from a near friend in New York that Gambrich was at work on this device. It's a pity some Burrton man can't have the credit and the cash that are going to Gambrich."

Walter's fingers closed around one of the tools on his bench and he felt mad enough at that moment to throw it either at Van Shaw or the lamp. He did not do either, but when the crowd had finally gone away, he sat down at his bench and said to Bauer: "What chumps we were not to apply for a patent weeks ago. We might have contested it. We have let a fortune slip out of our hands through our stupidity."

"It's because we did not take anyone into confidence. I never thought of a patent. I was too much absorbed in the lamp itself to think anything about anything else."

"Whom could we have taken into confidence? Van Shaw or Anderson? But I don't feel like giving up. Why can't we contest our rights? There are cases in the courts every day over patents and inventions."

"But it takes a lot of money to hire a lawyer and go to law," said Bauer with real Teutonic caution. "And I haven't a dollar to spare. According to Anderson, it's as good as settled that Gambrich has the legal right to the lamps."

Walter stared at the arc gloomily. He felt the disappointment with deep bitterness. Not only was his pride smitten at the thought of others who were working out his ideas, but the thought of the money he might have made, and the relief that money might have brought him, rankled deepest in his mind.

Bauer took the affair more philosophically. He went over to Walter and put a hand on his shoulder.

"When we are beaten we might as well accept it and make something else. I don't like to see you take the thing so hard."

"What else can we make?" Walter said after a moment. "I've lost my ambition."

"Oh, no you haven't; not for good and all. Why, we might invent a typewriter telegraph."

"It's too late, that's already been done."

"I'll tell you what would bring us fame and money," said Bauer with his usual slow manner and his friendly smile. "What the world needs is a letter writer that will take letters at dictation, first hand."

Walter stared at Bauer gloomily. "What's that?"

"A direct letter writer," said Bauer. "A machine that the business man and the minister and the college professor and the politician and the railroad man and the lover could talk into. As fast as he talked, it would make a visible mark on the paper and when the person was through dictating his letter he could pull it out all typewritten ready to send. Just think what a blessing this would be to the busy letter writer."

Walter stared at Bauer as if his friend was crazy. Then, after a moment of doubt, he burst into a great laugh.

"Well, of all the— It's the first time I ever knew a German could be out and out funny. Do you know what your letter writing machine would have to do? It would have to know how to spell right."

"No, it wouldn't. All it would have to do would be to spell phonetically. Every machine would spell and print just as the person talked."

"Yes, and what will become of the great army of stenographers and typewriter girls who make their living now at taking dictation? I don't want to invent something that is going to deprive thousands of people of a living."

"You could marry one of them and I would marry another. That would take care of two of 'em," said Bauer solemnly.

Walter looked up at him a moment, and then he roared. It was what Bauer wanted him to do. And when they finally went to their rooms Walter was feeling somewhat better, although he did not get a good night's sleep. His dreams had in them fitful glimpses of Van Shaw and Anderson and a red hot arc lamp that glared and flamed at him with a diabolical grin that rejoiced in his defeat.

It was two days before he could bring himself to write home a full account of the matter. Both his father and his mother replied to this and each wrote in full sympathy with him and a knowledge of what his disappointment would be to him.

"Of course," Paul said, at the close of his letter, "if it is true that the New York man really invented the idea of the lamp before you did and then patented it before you did, that settles it, even if you were first to make an actual model. The patent laws recognize priority of invention where no unreasonable delay has followed the invention and the application for patent. Looking up the subject in the Electrical News and consulting the Alvord, our best patent lawyer here in Milton, I am afraid you are too late to do anything, and a contest, Alvord thinks, would result in nothing but expense for you and your friend. If I thought there was any legal right you possessed and ought to have I would be willing to help you contest for it. But that seems to be out of the question.

"Don't let this defeat mean too much to you. It is not a defeat. You did your best and actually made a very important discovery, you and Bauer. If you can do that, you can do other things as well. The unknown, undiscovered world of electricity is boundless. You have as much right to enter in as anybody, and far more probabilities than most persons that you will find something worth while. We are all anticipating your home-coming for holidays and expect Bauer to come with you. Affectionately your father.

"Paul Douglas."

Walter's mother wrote in much the same way and cheerfully urged him to take all the disappointing things with hopeful equanimity.

"The longer I live, the more I find the real joy of life consists in doing our best with God's help and leaving the results with Him. Of course we all like to get results out of our efforts. But we forget that results always do follow honest effort, only they are not always the results we expected and wanted. No doubt, boy, you feel like saying to us at home, 'Yes, it's easy for you to sit there at your ease and deal out calm chunks of sympathy to me and tell me not to worry or feel bad, but if you had worked as hard as I did you wouldn't find it quite as easy to be happy over this disappointment.'

"Well, we confess all that, but your mother doesn't want to see her son give up and go down to defeat from one or two or a dozen or even a hundred blows. You have had the joy of making the lamp (after you cleared your soul by confession to Bauer), and you know that your brain works at its best along inventive lines and you know the field of invention, especially in electricity, is limitless. Your mother says to you, we feel proud of you and we will feel doubly proud if you will learn to take this disappointment cheerfully. Don't be a baby over it. Be a man. The tests of manhood are not found in the easy, but in the difficult things of life.

"The great thing after all, is to live up to the high calling. I don't care much, Walter, whether you ever invent anything or not, although I wish you could find out how to make a machine that will take off a woman's hat and hold it in church so that she can take care of her hymn book, her Bible, her gloves, her pocket book, her fan, her umbrella and her handkerchief, but if you never discovered a single secret of nature and discover the secret of a useful life, I would be and shall be the happiest of all women, for that is my ambition for you and always will be.

"Be sure and bring Bauer home with you. We are all interested to see him.

"Lovingly,

"Mother."

Helen also wrote to Walter at this time. She was not much of a letter writer but she wanted to add her word of sympathy with the rest and Walter felt especially pleased that she exerted herself on this occasion.

"Dear Bub," Helen wrote, using the name she had always given him in her childhood. "We all feel awfully sorry about the way the lamp came out. It didn't seem fair to you and I hope you will invent something better that will throw that lamp in the shade, so to speak. We all believe in you and I have never for a moment doubted that in time you would be another Edison. I'm enjoying my school this year more than ever. Since our new gymnasium director was appointed I have found favor in her eyes and she has turned over one of the academy classes to me by consent of President Bruce. I did plan to study for a position as professor of domestic science, but since this appointment work opened up I feel as if I could like to be a physical director in a college or a Y. W. C. A. I love the gymnasium work immensely and Miss Rhodes says I am her best pupil.

"We are all wondering what sort of an individual your Felix Bauer is. Does he speak broken English very badly? Will it be difficult to him without a German grammar? I have an idea I shall not like him very well, from what you have written about him. But I don't suppose that will make any difference to him.

"Father has got into politics all right and as he and mother have written you, he has been elected senator and will begin his term in January when the legislature meets. Father is very hopeful about doing things. Mother says he will have lots of opposition from the machine. I don't understand all this political discussion, but you know father. He is dead in earnest as you know and now that he is elected he is going to make the machine, whatever that is, 'sit up and take notice.' This is what my teacher in English would call a disjointed metaphor.

"Father is working over a dozen bills calculated to reform the state. The word 'reform' is a household word in the Douglas family. But you know father. Isn't he the dearest man that ever lived? It makes me mad to read what the papers have been saying about him ever since he was nominated. Anyone who didn't know father would think from reading these papers that he was an out and out villain. And we all know, and Milton people know, that if ever a man lived who had a pure and earnest desire to help make a better world, father is that man. I hate politics. It seems to me it is the meanest thing there is. I don't know anything else so mean as to take a man like father and question his motives and call him all sorts of names and try to blacken his character. Mother says she doesn't mind, but I believe she can't help feeling it some. It just makes me mad.

"Well, bub, don't be discouraged. We believe in you just as much as ever. We are looking for you home next week.

"Oh, by the way, does your friend Bauer have to have his beer regularly? And must we lay in an extra supply of sauer kraut and pretzels? I am sitting up nights studying my German exercises so I can say 'Eine Schwalbe macht noch Keinen Sommer' and other interesting topics of conversation.

Lovingly your sister

"Helen Dillingham Douglas."

Walter laughed over this letter, but rather resented the tone Helen displayed about Bauer. "I hope Bauer won't make any bad breaks and I don't believe he will." But Walter had a little talk with Bauer that same evening in which Bauer expressed a little nervousness about his approaching visit at Walter's home.

"I haven't ever been anywhere to speak of, you know," he said a little doubtfully. "And I begin to feel a little afraid of meeting your folks.'

"Afraid? Why, you can't even look at mother without falling in love with her. And as for father he will take to you right off. I know he will, for several reasons."

"But your sister?" Bauer looked up at the photograph of Helen on Walter's dresser. "Somehow I feel a little afraid of her. I don't believe I'll get along very well. Does she talk German? I feel a little more at my ease if I can talk what you call small talk in my own language.'

"No, I don't believe Helen knows enough German to talk it intelligently. But you needn't be afraid of her. She is interested in your coming as all the family are and she has asked me several questions about you," said Walter, not venturing to tell Bauer what the questions were.

"Is that so?" said Bauer, looking pleased. Then after a moment he added, "It's awfully good of you to ask me to your home. I won't forget it."

And indeed, Felix Bauer, you never will.

The two friends reached Milton three days before Christmas and were met at the station by Paul and Louis. Paul took to Bauer from the moment he first saw him. You know how that is, that indescribable attraction you feel towards certain people even without an introduction, and Bauer had the same feeling for Walter's father. At the dinner table that night Bauer soon forgot his timidity because everyone was so kind. There was any number of questions to ask. Walter did a large share of the talking. Mrs. Douglas looked proud and happy. Helen was on her best behavior and in less than ten minutes Bauer had lost his fear of her and was in danger of entertaining the opposite feeling. Walter Darcy and Louis Darcy, Esther's brothers, were present, and helped to make the meal a lively and entertaining occasion. And Felix Bauer said to himself when the evening was over that it was the pleasantest evening of his life.

The next morning Paul asked Bauer to go down to the office with him. The News was installing a recently invented linotype and Paul wanted Bauer to see it.

They looked over the mechanism and then came back to Paul's office room. Bauer was looking over some specimen type Paul had on his table when three men came in.

Paul looked up, his face changed color for a moment and he asked the visitors to be seated. He knew two of the men and they introduced the third.

"Senator Douglas, this is Judge Livingston of Camford. We want a talk, a private talk with you on political business," said the speaker, the Hon. George Maxwell, as he looked at Bauer.

"This young man is a friend of mine, spending the holidays with us," said Paul quietly, and he introduced Bauer to the three visitors.

There was a pause, and then Mr. Maxwell said, "We want a private conference with you, Mr. Douglas, if you don't mind." Bauer started to go out and Paul said to him, "You don't have to go unless you prefer."

"I'll go back to the house, Mr. Douglas," Bauer said, and immediately went out.

Maxwell started to shut the door after him.

"Mr. Maxwell, that is not necessary," said Paul very distinctly. "I think I know what you have come to see me about. Let me say, gentlemen, once for all, that I have no secrets, and no use for any in my political life. I do not believe in all this private conference and closed doors in connection with any action of mine in the coming legislature. I am not going to do a single thing that will require me to whisper or retire behind any closed doors. So, seeing this is my office, and it is the regular custom to leave the door open, we will leave it open."

The Hon. Maxwell looked doubtfully at Paul and the other visitors did the same. They finally went over to a corner of the office and whispered together. Then they came back, drew their chairs close up to Douglas's desk and Maxwell said:

"Mr. Douglas, we have come to see you

(Continued on page 22.)

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

"THE IRON WOMAN"

Margaret Deland's Wholesome Story of Marital Duty.

Mrs. Deland has a firm hold on our affections because of her "Old Chester Tales," these veritable annals of American village life, no figure in contemporary fiction is dearer to us than Dr. Savendar, that true shepherd of his flock, whose ministrations were less from the pulpit, than in the hearts and lives of his people. "The Iron Woman" is probably the most important of recent novels—not even excepting "The Case of Richard Meynell," by Mrs. Humphrey Ward. It touches greater depths of emotion than Mrs. Ward's book, and its study of spiritual struggle is part of the common chord of human life. Its complex and delicate theme is the same as its immediate predecessor, "The Awakening of Helena Ritchie;" both books deal with the problem of the misfit in marriage—one of the most pressing of the social issues of our day. The world of fiction is full of the unhappily married, and the usual treatment is from the point of view of the individual—his right to happiness, his right to rectify a mistake in marriage, by breaking the bond with an unloved, uncongenial mate, and forming a fresh tie with some "affinity."

A Deeper View.

But Mrs. Deland takes a broader and a deeper view than that. While she shows an exquisite sympathy with her characters in their sorrow, and compassion for their sins, she claims that society has rights in regard to the marriage relation as well as the individual. "No one," she says, "for his own happiness, has a right to do a thing which would injure an ideal by which the rest of us live."

That same point is now emphasized in our great labor strikes, when it is declared that the issue is not entirely between labor and capital, but that there is a third party vitally interested in the controversy—and that is the public.

Story of Helen Ritchie.

In "Helena Ritchie," a wife leaves her husband who has deeply wronged her, and goes to her lover, planning to marry him as soon as her divorce could be secured. But the husband would not grant the divorce, and so the lovers continued their illicit relations for a number of years. In time, the man began to find the tie irksome, partly because of the secrecy, and the necessary inconvenience it involved, but mainly because of his devotion to a lovely and innocent daughter. Finally, when the husband died, and he could have married Helena, he refused to do so. Her awakening to the moral wrong she had committed was wrought by her love for a little boy she had adopted. When her best friend, Dr. Willy King, found out her sin, he told her she could not be trusted with the charge of little David; but Dr. Savendar, though he does not spare her the wounds of a faithful friend, saw in the throes of her shame and anguish the birth of a new self. And so, as she went away to a new life in a new home, he trusted to her care the dear child, who had awakened her soul from its selfish and sinful slumber.

Contrast With "The Scarlet Letter."

She had been spared the punishment of public exposure. Unlike the guilty minister in "The Scarlet Letter," open and explicit confession of her sin was not demanded of her, because no one else was bearing the shame of her guilt but herself. So Dr. Savendar charged her in parting—

"My child, your secret belongs to your Heavenly Father. It is never to be taken from his hands, except for one reason—to save some other child of His."

"The Iron Woman" takes up the story of Helena Ritchie and David in their new home, and shows how the supreme sacrifice of confessing her sin and shame is demanded of her, in order to save her son from falling into the same horrible pit from which she had been rescued.

Substance of the Story.

Elizabeth, the beautiful and impulsive heroine of the book loved David and became engaged to him, but in a temporary estrangement from him, she hastily and rashly married Blair Maitland. In a crisis of her life, she turned to David, and they decided to ignore her loveless and unhappy marriage and live together, hoping that Blair would divorce her, and they could eventually be married. Before they had taken the final and fatal step, Mrs. Ritchie appeared, and appealed to them by every argument she could urge, to refrain from a union that would be a disgrace to Elizabeth, and a wrecking of David's whole career—but vainly. Nothing remained to her but to rise to the heights of the love which would save others, but could not save itself. The time had come to tell her own disgrace and shame in order to rescue them from a like fate.

"'A man once talked to me,' she said, 'just as you are talking to Elizabeth. He said he would marry me when I got my divorce. I think he meant it, just as you mean it now. At any rate, I believed him, just as Elizabeth believes you.'

"David Ritchie stepped back violently; his whole face shuddered. 'You,' he said, 'my mother? No!—no!—no!'

"And his mother, gathering up her strength, cringing like some faithful dog struck across the face, pointed at him with one shaking hand;

"'Elizabeth, did you see how he looked at me? Some day your son will look that way at you.'

"The murmuring crash of the sea on the sands was suddenly loud in their ears, but the room was still. It was the stillness of finality—David had lost Elizabeth."

Other Characters.

Mrs. Deland has described many counter currents of life in the book, besides this one central and terrible whirlpool. In Mrs. Maitland, the Iron Woman, she paints a person of perfect integrity and blameless character, but whose absorption in business and neglect of the graces and annuities of life estranges her idolized son, Blair, from her. In Blair, we have the ruin wrought by "fulness of bread and abundance of idleness." In Elizabeth, the hideous havoc that anger and uncontrolled impulse can work. We are taught the austere lesson in the whole sad and tortured story of Blair and Elizabeth and David that when we have sworn we must keep the vow, even to our own deep hurt. We see that there are better things than even a happy love, and higher things than our own good; and Elizabeth's possible submission to her loveless union with Blair holds out an ideal of the sanctity of the marriage relation that is profoundly needed in these days of easy and multiplied divorce.

I. W. H.

"Women and Children First"

By Mrs. Rheta Childe Dorr.

Mrs. Dorr tells this little incident in the Woman's Journal to show that the law of the sea in regard to women and children is not always the law of the land.

The factory where I went to work that Monday morning was one of the most dismal and uninviting I have seen before or since. It occupied a dingy, ill-lighted loft on the third floor of an ancient building in Brooklyn. On the first floor was a steam laundry, and this establishment claimed also a certain amount of space on the second floor. The larger space in the second loft, however, was occupied by a rag-picking and baling firm. As I toiled up the narrow stairway to our loft, I caught glimpses through the door of Italian and Syrian women, their heads tied up in shawls and handkerchiefs, picking over the rags. Their faces were expressionless; their shoulders drooped over the rags as if they were too depressed to sit straight. They were mostly women of middle age. Some of them were old grandmothers. Worn with child-bearing, with long years of deprivation and self-sacrifice, they were now past the productive period of industry. All they were fit for was sorting over the debris of civilization.

Better Upstairs.

Upstairs in our loft we did better. We made things. We produced cheap shirts. At least, the finished product of our toil was shirts. But none of us consciously made shirts. As for me, after I had demonstrated to the satisfaction of the forelady that I could operate a power machine, I was given a pasteboard box full of calico slips, four inches long, and perhaps an inch and a half wide. Some of the slips were white with a narrow blue stripe running through. Some had pink stripes, others black or purple dots. That was all the difference. The forelady showed me how to fold each slip, and how to run a line of stitching as near the folded edge as possible. I folded several hundred slips, placed the first one under the needle, touched my foot to the treadle—Z-Z-Z-Z-ip shrieked the machine—and we were off for the day. All the morning I fed those folded slips, one after another, as fast as my fingers could fly, to the galloping machine. All the time I was vaguely wondering: "What am I doing to a shirt? What relation to a garment has this little strip of cloth, folded once and stitched close to the edge?" It was two days later that

The late Mrs. Elmira Dickinson, whose beautiful and fruitful life as missionary and educational pioneer among the Disciples was the theme of Mrs. Harrison's article in this department two weeks ago.

I discovered that my strip covered the opening of the sleeve above the cuff.

My Fellow Workers.

At noon I had time to get acquainted with some of my fellow workers. Most of them were young girls, but a goodly proportion were mature women. The contrast between youth and maturity was marked. The girls wore elaborate hair, their cheap blouses were coquettishly low in the neck, and most of them wore shoddy jewelry. The older women were ill clad, and their hair was worn in tight braids or screwed up knots. They had plainly forgotten their ancient instinct for beauty.

I went all around the loft, making note of the frightful closets which discharged foul odors into the dark dressing-rooms. I observed that the only lightning provision was a length of gas tubing running above the machines. These were pierced at intervals with unguarded gas jets, and when, near the close of the afternoon, it began to grow dark, the forelady walked the length of the room, lighting the jets as she passed, with a flaming rag picked up from the rag-littered floor. There were signs about: "No Smoking." But more than once during the day a buyer strolled through accompanied by the boss, smoking big cigars.

The most disconcerting thing about that factory was the locked doors. As soon as the girls were inside and the power was turned on, the foreman closed and locked the doors. After that they opened only at the boss's command and at closing down time at night. I asked the girls why this was done.

"Why, you see," explained one of the older girls, "it's this way. A whole lot of women here are married, and they all want to go home at noon to look after the children. Of course the boss can't have that. He has to lock the doors to keep them in. Why? Because so many of them would get back late. Think of the power wasted! 'Course he can't afford it."

"These married women," spoke up a pert child of fourteen, her abundant yellow hair tied in a flaring bow of soiled pink ribbon, "they're all crazy about their kids. 'Member that Italian woman, Gussie?"

There broke out a sudden murmur of horror. "No, no, stop! Don't talk about it! Be still, the boss——"

"What about the Italian woman?" I insisted.

"Well, she—she had a little bit of a baby, awful thin and sickly, and she was bound she'd go home at noon to nurse it. When the doors was locked she tried to climb down the fire escape. About half way down there is a turn where a shutter comes out. She couldn't get around it quick enough. Yes, she fell. They said her neck was broke."

The law of the sea: women and children first.

The law of the land—that's different.

Yet it is known on land as well as at sea that the race is carried on by children, and that women are needed to care for the children.

Woman's Doings

—Queen Alexandra may have a court of her own at Marlborough House this season after the second anniversary of King Edward's death has passed. She is already having some of the larger rooms redecorated and refurnished, and she has told the ladies in her entourage that she means to lighten her mourning and take up public life again. The Queen Mother also intends to appear regularly at the opera. She will sometimes share the royal box with her son and his wife, but more often she will be accompanied by Princess Victoria and some members of her suite. Queen Alexandra resents being supplanted in her position as first lady in the land and Queen Mary disapproves of her mother-in-law's amazingly youthful appearance and beauty as well as her frivolity and love of dress and jewels.

—Helen Stoecker, head of the Mothers' Congress of Germany, says that the best way for women to help the army is to rear healthy boys to serve in it. She does not think that women should serve in the imperial army.

—Mrs. Mary Gaunt, who recently returned from a journey to the wilds of Africa, was the founder of the Travelers' club in London. She went up the Gambia in a boat and is said to have been the only white person to make the journey.

—Mme. Vassilieff, wife of the naval attache of the Russian embassy at Washington, says that she has never seen so many well dressed women in any country as in the United States. She thinks American women much superior to French women in that respect.

—Memorial services were held in the Congregational church at Manchester, Vt., for Anne E. Isham, who lost her life on the Titanic.

—Mrs. George D. Widener, of Philadelphia, who escaped death on the Titanic, saved more than $1,000,000 worth of pearls and diamonds which she took with her into the lifeboat. Mr. Widener, who was lost on the ill-fated vessel, presented his wife with $750,000 three years ago. These gems were insured for $700,000 and now insurance men are breathing easier.

—Miss Helen Frick, daughter of the steel magnate, Henry C. Frick, has built a clubhouse for working girls at Hamilton, Mass. It will be for girls needing a rest, and will have all the modern appliances for gymnastics and other aids to recovery of nervous poise.

—Among the Colorado Democratic delegates to the Baltimore convention, who are instructed for Champ Clark, is Mrs. Anna B. Pitzer of El Paso County, sister of the speaker. She was elected by the second district convention.

—Dr. Helen Stoecker is founder of the Union for Motherhood Protection, the one woman's organization in Germany which is said to have the kaiser's hearty approval.

—Senora Maria Unzue de Alvear and her sister, Senora Conception Unzue de Cesares, have erected and endowed what is said to be the most costly orphan asylum in the world. The institution is in Mar del Plata, Argentina, and is said to have cost more than $2,000,000 for the buildings alone. It is for the use of convalescent orphan children of the poor and is under the care of the Benevolent society of Mar del Plata. The institution is a memorial to the father and mother of the two women.

—Mrs. Taft has made the first contribution to the fund being raised among the women of the United States to be used in erecting a monument to the men on the Titanic who gave their lives that women passengers might be saved. It is to be hoped that the women of this and other countries, the younger women especially will draw the right kind of a lesson from the remarkable heroism of the male passengers of the Titanic.

—The French golfing girl is a rarity so far, but she is increasing in spite of difficulties, according to the Pall Mall Gazette. The links at La Boulie, at Chantilly, at Fontainebleau and elsewhere are gradually attracting her, and her skill when she does take up the game makes her fully the equal, if not the superior, of the English or American girls who are members of the same club.

—Donning overalls and jumpers, laying aside social conventonalities and arming themselves with picks and shovels, forty of the leading women of Gypsum and Eagle, Colo., joined hands with 150 men and worked through a day in putting seven miles of road between the two towns in first-class condition.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

B. L. Wray is holding a revival meeting for the church at Lomax.

There were three additions by baptism at Olney Church, where W. S. Gamboe is pastor, the first Sunday in May.

Evangelist E. C. Sarchett assisted a country church near Roodhouse in a meeting which lasted more than two weeks, in which there were fifteen additions, all but one being on confession of faith.

Evangelists James Sharratt and daughter are in a revival meeting at Brookport. The last meeting preceding this was at Joppa, which was concluded with a total of twenty-three additions.

The pastor of Griggsville Church, J. D. Dabney, is being assisted in a revival meeting by Hill and Seniff. Eleven additions were reported during the first few days of the meeting. All of these were by baptism.

In the meeting at Macomb, where the Fife Brothers are assisting the pastor, Allen T. Shaw, there had been fifty-two additions, with only eight days of invitation. The congregations are taxing the capacity of the church.

The revival meeting at Third Church, Danville, where S. S. Jones is pastor, closed with 102 additions in two weeks' time. The meeting was held under the leadership of the Roy L. Brown Evangelistic Company.

John R. Golden, pastor of West Side Church, Springfield, has been chosen by the Springfield Federation of Labor to deliver the annual memorial address for that body on Sunday, May 26. The address will be delivered in Lincoln Park.

The Logan County Ministerial Association was organized in the study of the pastor of Lincoln Church. The Association results from the initiative of G. W. Wise, and he was elected its first president, with J. Newton Cloe, pastor of Mt. Pulaski Church, as secretary and treasurer. The organization will meet once a month, the next meeting being in June, at which time "Religious Conditions in Logan County" will be discussed by G. M. Goode of Hartsburg.

University Place Church, Champaign, led by its pastor, Stephen E. Fisher, is attempting a large advance in missionary activity for the next few years. The church is already a living-link in the foreign, home and state societies. The support of Herbert Smith in Africa is provided by this church. The congregation is now setting for itself the task of equipping the station where Mr. Smith labors at a cost of $8,500, which it is hoped will be accomplished within the next five years.

The Central Church, of Peoria, has received an acceptance of its call to M. L. Pontius of Connecticut, extended a few weeks ago, to succeed W. F. Turner, now located at North Yakima, Washington. The Peoria church has not selected an untried man, as Mr. Pontius was located at Taylorville for a number of years before his retirement to enter Yale University, where he acquitted himself with distinction during a course lasting through several years. His return to the state and to the Peoria church is gratifying news to Illinois Disciples.

W. M. Groves, who was preaching for the church at Virginia, during the last year, has resigned this pulpit. He is resigning the pastorate in order that much of his time may be given to advancing his candidacy for re-election to the legislature, where he has served one term most acceptably, and with high commendations from the moral forces of the state. It is understood that his successor at Virginia will be C. E. French, who for several years has been ministering to the church at Tallula. Mr. French is a wide-awake pastor, whose record assures the new church to which he goes of a faithful ministry.

The query, "Can J. M. Rudy come back?" is answered in the Quincy Herald of recent date, with the announcement that he already has come back, and has become pastor of the Ninth and Broadway Church in that city. Mr. Rudy was pastor of this church fourteen years ago and did a work of unusual proportions through a period of six years. During the years since his Quincy pastorate, he has been located in Iowa, Missouri, and Indiana, but has never been forgotten by the Quincy Church. The esteem in which he is held here was attested in the unanimous vote of the Board of Officers and of the congregation at both morning and evening services on the day when the call was extended, not a single vote being registered against his return to the pastorate. For the past year Mr. Rudy has been doing evangelistic work of an effective and permanent type. His answer has not been definitely given to the church at Quincy, but already he is on the field as temporary supply, and it is confidently expected by the congregation that a favorable answer will be given in a few weeks. Mr. Rudy will be cordially welcomed in his return to the Illinois ministry.

Leroy church, where R. D. Brown ministers, is progressing rapidly in various lines of Christian activity. Last year a $20,000 church edifice was dedicated entirely free from debt, and this year the congregation has raised sufficient funds to send a missionary to the foreign field. They have selected Miss Minnie Vautrin, whose home is in Cisco, as their representative. Miss Vautrin has been, for the last two years, in the State University at Champaign, where she graduates this year. She is a young woman of exalted Christian character and devoted to the church's interests. The congregation at Leroy is not large, and the achievement of providing funds sufficient for such an enterprise is meritorious for one of its numbers. Mr. Brown has been pastor of the church here for two and one-half years, and during this time the church has enjoyed an unprecedented growth, both numerically and in matters pertaining to the spiritual life.

Secretary's Letter.

C. H. Hands, of Fairbury, began his new work at Mason City, May 7. We wish every success to both preacher and church.

J. E. Stout had eleven additions at Sandoval in spite of much opposition. He is now in a short meeting at Chauncey with full house.

G. W. Ford, of West Salem, assures us that the new $12,000 building will be erected this summer, about $10,000 of which is already pledged. The church has given Mr. Ford time to hold a short meeting.

F. L. Starbuck reports two additions at McLean, May 5. A new modern $3,000 parsonage is well under way at Shirley, and the church will observe their annual roll call and anniversary service on May 26, with an all day program and free dinner and supper.

Please do not lose sight of the fact that May is home-state mission month and that half the May offering comes back to Illinois. And further, if this offering is adequate to the needs of the work and will justify such action we will not call for the November offering. In this way we may be able to reduce the number of missionary calls, which seems very desirable to everybody. Now double up on the May offering and send it to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

On May 31, we will mail out the blanks for the annual statistical reports from the churches and we trust they will all be filled out and returned promptly. We will pre-pay the return postage, as we have done for several years, but even then it is astonishing how many preachers and church clerks have failed us in the past. Let it not be so this year. Fill out the card at once and mail it.

W. D. DEWEESE, Office Sec'y-Treas.
J. FRED JONES, Field Secretary.
Bloomington, Ill.

Chicago

The Ministers' Association spent a recent Monday at Valparaiso, Ind., as guests of Claude E. Hill, the pastor there. Mr. Hill had provided six automobiles which took the pastors through the city and a good part of the surrounding country. The great university was the main object of interest.

O. F. Jordan gave an interpretation of Chicago Disciple history at the ministers' meeting, May 3. He traced three periods—the period of beginnings, the period of independency, and the period of missionary co-operation. The latter period began at about the time of the World's Fair in 1893 and has continued with increasing character until the present. The two influences of chief importance in this period were said to be the City Mission Society and the Disciples' Divinity House at the University of Chicago. The qualities imparted to the Chicago situation by these factors were interpreted with great lucidity.

Vaughan Dabney and his thriving church at Douglas Park celebrated their occupancy of the recently purchased Congregational church building by a week of services last week culminating in three meetings on Sunday in which Dr. I. N. McCash, American missionary secretary, was the chief speaker. Many pastors and members from other congregations attended the Sunday afternoon service. Mr. Dabney has accomplished a work at Douglas Park which is the pride of all who have known its difficulty and its discouraging outlook at the time he entered upon it three years ago.

Church Life

F. S. Ford has accepted a call to the pastorate at Alameda, Cal., going from Ukiah, Cal.

C. C. Wilson is filling commencement dates for the Central Lyceum Bureau of Indianapolis during May.

Frank Bare has accepted the pastorate of the church at Lincoln, Kan., going from Pauls Valley, Okla.

The church at Dewey, Kan., has called C. F. C. Kinkaid who has consented and is now on the ground.

John T. Stivers is leading a meeting for the church of which L. O. Ferguson is minister, at Petaluma, Cal.

L. Wolf and W. N. Lemon report 52 baptisms during March at the Manila station of our Philippine mission.

F. M. Dowling had 37 additions in a meeting recently held at San Jose, Cal., where G. W. Brewer is pastor.

David Lyon has been pastor at Topeka, Kan., for four years and has recently resigned. The work is in good condition.

Robt. Whiston is in a meeting at Klamath Falls, Ore., where E. M. Flinn is pastor. There were 20 added the first two weeks.

Walter B. Zimmerman and his party of workers have recently closed a meeting at Bay City, Tex., with nearly fifty additions.

C. C. Sinclair has begun his labors with Central Church, Kansas City, Kan., having resigned from the pastorate at Wichita, Kan.

S. W. Nay has accepted the call of the church at Gary, Ind., having resigned the pastorate at Argentine, Kan., to accept the work.

S. P. Spiegel has resigned at Wilson, N. C., to become state evangelist of Alabama. He will enter his new duties about the first of June.

Wilhite and Shaul are in a meeting at Warsaw, Ind., and have had 52 additions already to the church of which J. O. Rose is pastor.

Crayton S. Brooks in the meeting at Massillon, O., where H. E. Stafford is pastor, had had about 135 additions at the end of the first two weeks.

F. L. Pettit will enter upon his duties as pastor of the church at Neodosha, Kan., in about two weeks. He has formerly been at Lafayette, Ind.

The church at Dodge City, Kan., where M. L. Sorey has been pastor, has called G. C. Stearns of Lemar, Colo., who will enter upon his duties soon.

C. L. Organ, of Des Moines, had 187 additions in Spray, N. C., at the last report. The church had taken on great activity as a result of the meetings.

Graham McMurray is holding a meeting for the church at Greenville, Tex., where S. R. Hawkins is pastor. There were eighty additions at the last report.

A. W. Crabb wishes to commend the earnestness, enthusiasm, and unselfishness of Gus Thompson, pastor at Charlottesville, Ind., where they have just held a meeting.

The church at Wichita Falls, where R. R. Hamlin was pastor, has called F. F. Walters of Independence, Mo., who will begin his residence in Texas about the first of June.

J. Q. Biggs is in a meeting in his home church at Pawhuska, Okla. There have been 20 additions, which makes a gain of 140 per cent in the year of the present pastorate.

There were 67 additions in a meeting recently held at Belhaven, N. C., by the pastor, J. D. Waters. The Belhaven Church is planning to erect a new house of worship.

P. H. Mears has recently accepted the pastorate at Asheville, N. C., and already plans are being pushed to erect a modern Sunday-school building and to secure an organ for the church.

The church at Wichita, Kan., recently presented its pastor, Walter Scott Priest, with an automobile. Mr. Priest wishes his brother ministers to know that he has no intention of resigning at Wichita!

The Disciples of Ontario will hold their convention May 29-June 3 at Grand Valley, a place about 70 miles west of Toronto. A cordial invitation is extended to any and all who will come to join in the fellowship of the convention.

G. Hopping, secretary of the Sunday-school of Park Avenue Church, East Orange, N. J., reports that the school is prospering in a substantial manner. On May 12 the attendance was 447 and the offering was $13.90, a splendid showing.

W. E. Crabtree will hold a meeting for the church in his old home at Madisonville, Ky., in September. The church at San Diego, Cal., where Mr. Crabtree is pastor, is rejoicing in the recent achievement of raising a debt of over $9,000.

C. P. Craig, pastor at Terrell, Tex., is in a meeting. A. E. Ewell, pastor at Beaumont, is doing the preaching, and Miss Una Dell Berry is leading the singing. There had been forty additions up to the time of the last report and the outlook was good for many more.

G. H. Nichol, pastor at Red Oak, Ia., is in a campaign for a new building for the church. Already some $16,000 has been raised but at least $9,000 more is desired. This is the second pastorate of Mr. Nichol with this church and the work is in splendid condition.

Gerald Culbertson has accepted the pastorate at Martinsville, Va., going from Third Church, Richmond, Va. During the more than five years of Mr. Culbertson's ministry at Third Church, the membership has increased to 600 and the building enlarged and greatly improved.

Geo. L. Snively says that the dedication of the $40,000 building at Marshall, Mo., was the greatest experience of his life. B. T. Wharton, pastor, has been with the church for fifteen years and is naturally greatly rejoiced at the achievement which has just been consummated.

We regret to record the death of M. W. Harkins, pastor of the church at Union City, Ind., who died May 11. Mr. Harkins returned from California last June and the work was in every way promising. The congregation and the family have the sympathy of the brotherhood.

Claire L. Waite has had 15 additions at Central, Cincinnati, O., since last report. This makes a total of 52 additions since Jan. 1. The Sunday-school is in a close contest with Central Church, Newport, Ky., where A. M. Harvout is pastor. At the last report Cincinnati was a little in the lead.

There were 54 additions in the meeting held by D. A. Wickizer at Durant, Okla., where C. C. Hill is pastor. Theo. Moody of Dallas, Tex., led the music. It is felt that much good was done to the members already in the church by the strong preaching and the earnest work of the evangelist.

F. M. Rains delivered the dedicatory address for East Dallas Church, where more than $10,000 was raised. The dedication was on May 5 and the new pastor, J. G. Slayter, took charge of the congregation on May 12. The former pastor was Chas. Shelburne, who has been for some months editor of the Christian Courier.

Wright and Saxton had 73 additions in their meeting with B. S. Ferrall at Buffalo, N. Y. The pastor regards the work of the evangelists as of a permanent character. Five Chinese young men were among the additions. It is the purpose of the pastor to organize a Boy Scout Patrol in connection with his church soon.

D. H. Bradbury finished the three years' course at Auburn Theological Seminary on May 9, and begins a ten weeks' term of special mission work with the new Rockwell Springs Church at Syracuse, N. Y. He was tendered a farewell reception on May 10 by the church at Throopsville, N. Y., where he ministered during the seminary course.

The main building of McLean College, Hopkinsville, Ky., was burned on Feb. 3, and the authorities are struggling to raise the necessary funds to rebuild. Some $26,000 has been subscribed but $4,000 more is needed and it is earnestly desired that some generous givers will be found who will come to the rescue and save the situation from embarassment.

The northeast district convention of Iowa will, says F. E. Smith, be different. It will be held during the same week as the state convention, thus permitting churches to send delegates to both. Waterloo will entertain the convention, June 6-7. Miss Newcomer will be present on behalf of the C. W. B. M. It is confidently hoped that a perfected form of organization will grow out of the meeting.

The Minges Evangelistic Company is in a meeting now with A. L. Crim, pastor of Ellensburg Church, Wash. There were 206 additions the first day and the prospects for a great meeting are good. The other pastors of the city are joining in the services and are receiving converts as a result of the services. P. M. Kendall is directing the chorus for the company now and doing his work with the greatest acceptance.

Edwin C. Boynton, of Belton, Texas, reports the work at the First Christian Church as in healthful condition. Three added by letter during a recent meeting conducted by the pastor, and one by baptism more recently. The congregation, which has just contributed to both state and home missions, is a strong financial supporter of Texas Christian University, having during the past several years contributed through individual members over $10,000 to Christian education.

"Springdale, Ark., May 13, 1912.—Chas. A. Chasteen of Little Rock, closed a two weeks' meeting for us on the 5th, with 15 added. The meeting should not have closed but the state convention came on. I preach for the churches at Springdale and Gravette.

Two confessions at regular services not previously reported. I will be glad to answer questions about this country for anyone who encloses stamp. Many people are coming here from different parts of the country. B. F. Lively, minister."

L. A. Chapman reports five additions recently at Fourth Church, St. Louis, Mo., where he began his labors May 1, coming from Carmi, Ill. It is expected that a teacher training class of 20 will be organized soon.

A reception was given on May 3 to Dr. and Mrs. Bruce Brown by Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Chapman and Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Wickett in the Chapman home, Fullerton, Cal. This is one of the finest homes in all California and the reception was one of the most successful. Throngs of people were in attendance and the occasion was most happy.

Fifteen hundred men in line in the big booster club parade is the desire of the management of the Iowa State Sunday-school Association when it meets in its forty-seventh annual convention at Waterloo June 4, 5 and 6. A thousand delegates are expected at this convention. A great list of speakers, including Dr. John Balcom Shaw of Chicago is being prepared to address the association.

The men of the Indiana State Convention, which was in session at Hammond last week, spent one afternoon in a trip to Gary and a visit to the immense plant of the Indiana Steel Company. C. J. Sharp arranged the trip and engineered it. A special train of flat cars was furnished the party and obliging guides explained the operations. The trip to and from Gary was made in automobiles provided by Hammond business men.

George Darsie is to go to First Church, Terre Haute, Ind., from which church S. D. Dutcher retires on account of ill health. Mr. Darsie has been pastor at Akron, O., for the past seven years and the church is famous throughout the brotherhood for its missionary work. At present it holds the premier place among the Disciples for noble giving for missions. And this liberality has only caused the church to grow in other directions, in membership and Sunday-school efficiency and other essential particulars.

Bernard Gruenstein has been leading the city of Selma to a movement to raise a relief fund for the flood sufferers in the Mississippi River Valley. So successful was the effort that $500 in cash was raised and forwarded to the committee. The money was raised by a publicity campaign which Mr. Guenstein as a former newspaper man knew how to manage and consummate. The work of the church of which Mr. Gruenstein is pastor is prospering greatly. The Sunday-school is booming, having doubled recently. They are pushing a graded union for the entire city.

"Kindly announce the coming state convention of Michigan through the columns of the Christian Century. We meet at Kalamazoo, June 4-7, 1912. A great feast will be spread. The menu has been arranged in an approved manner. The courses will be served satisfactorily. This is a state convention with all the helpful features of an international gathering. Much time was consumed by the program committee in selection of subjects and speakers. Each speaker is a specialist in the line of his theme. Kalamazoo—'It's up to you'"—J. Frank Green, Secretary.

W. H. Pinkerton of Bowling Green, Mo., is reported to have preached a masterful sermon at the district convention comprising several counties in that part of the state. The sermon was characterized by true spiritual might and frankness of utterance. Mr. Pinkerton dealt with live problems of today. He affirmed that a Christian is one who bears the good fruit of Christian conduct. No formal test is adequate. He said that Alexander Campbell was a Christian and that his sins were forgiven long before he was immersed. The sermon made a deep impression upon the convention.

Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, Md., was the representative of the Disciples of Christ at the Centennial Celebration of Princeton Theological Seminary. It was a notable occasion and there were representatives from the institutions of learning and the religious bodies of Europe and America. Mr. Ainslie was also invited recently to address the Alexander Campbell Club at Yale. This is a group of Disciples who are banded together to promote the loyalty to the ideals of the Disciples. Mr. Ainslie will deliver a course of lectures at Yale next year on the history and mission of the Disciples.

Shiloh W. Durham died Feb. 11, 1912, at the home of his son at Long Beach, Cal., aged nearly 70 years. He was an active Christian for the past half century, being baptized by John S. Sweeney more than fifty years ago. Mr. Durham was a resident of Illinois for many years and was an active business man in this state. He is survived by four children. His brother, Judge Durham of Irvington, Cal., lost his wife just a few weeks before. The family and friends have the sincere sympathy of the Christian Century in the bereavement that has come to them and which will endure but for a little while.

Justin N. Green, well known and esteemed by the writer of these notes, is pastor of Evanston Church, O., a suburb of Cincinnati. Mr. Green has been very successful and has succeeded in leading his church to really heroic and magnificent giving. In commenting on the wonderful record of $40 of missionary offering for each member which was the record of the church for last year, we inadvertently wrote that A. M. Harvout was the pastor at Evanston. It was known to us at the time that Brother Harvout has recently taken the work at Newport, Ky., Central Church, a mention of which we made some time ago. We trust both these brethren will pardon us for the slip of the pen.

"Wichita, Kan., May 13—Great day at the Central yesterday, 625 at Sunday-school. Preached the baccalaureate sermon to the graduates of the high school, my daughter, Frances, being among the number; 1,100 in our large church auditorium. Am to give the commencement address at the high school in Leon, Kan., and also the baccalaureate sermon to this year's class at Oklahoma Christian University. Our Sunday-school averaged 536 the last quarter, the largest in its history. Aiming for 600 this quarter. Raised $260 for home missions May 5. Will make it $300. Have received 30 into the church the past three weeks. Audiences largest during present pastorate, filling lower floor and overflowing into balconies."—Walter Scott Priest.

"Irvington, Ind.—We have just closed a meeting at Charlotteville which resulted in thirty-three additions to the church. At that place we have a splendid house, nicely furnished, and some loyal hearted, earnest, and true workers; but the community in general had grown apathetic and indifferent, and could be aroused only by the greatest effort. A. W. Crabb of Brazil, the evangelist, with his wife, succeeded in overcoming this and is commanding large audiences and the best of attention. They were assisted by Brother Otis E. Watson of Terre Haute, as chorus director. I found Brother Crabb to be a perfect gentleman in all his dealings. A number of his sermons were among the finest I have ever heard. I cannot commend him too highly to the churches of Christ. One of the secrets of his success is that he gets every one to work. He goes from here to Marengo, Ind." Gus Thompson, minister.

Thomas W. Phillips, of New Castle, Pa., whose interest in education is well known, has given the money to found at Canton, O., a school for the training of preachers and Sunday-school workers who have not the opportunity of a college education. It is proposed to admit any who are properly qualified and who are prepared to take any of the work that is offered. The course of study is to last three years and should, in the course of the years, develop and discover some capable teachers and leaders. Certainly such schools will in no wise compete with our colleges but will rather stimulate and supplement them.

W. C. Pearce, in reporting the Kansas State Sunday-school Convention, held two weeks ago in Hutchinson, says that Charles S. Medbury of Des Moines made one of the most heartening addresses he ever heard. The theme was "The Resistless Kingdom." Dr. Medbury traced historically how Christ's kingdom had met and triumphed over one form of opposition after another and was bound to triumph over all obstacles that today stand in its way. The effect upon the listeners, said Mr. Pearce, was to produce the conviction that in spite of "the naughty and annoying hindrances" that the individual Christian experiences in his daily efforts to do Christ's will, the great empire of Christ is resistlessly coming into being. The disciple may seem to fail, but Christ is victorious. Dr. Medbury also conducted the devotions daily at the convention and spoke at a meeting of the fifty Disciple ministers whom Pastor O. L. Cook of Hutchinson found to be in attendance at the convention. The theme of Dr. Medbury's message to the Disciples was "Let us differ, but differ grandly!" He made a special reference to the spirit he hoped would characterize the Louisville convention next fall.

Frank Waller Allen's men's organization, famous as the "Greyfriars," gave their annual spring banquet May 13 at Paris, Mo. The two speakers were George A. Campbell of Hannibal, Mo., and E. S. Ames of Chicago. These Greyfriars wrestle with difficult problems, both practically and intellectually. They state their purposes as follows: "We try to determine in this brotherhood of seekers the relation of Jesus the carpenter to life. Our prayer is to be delivered from stupidity and ignorance while we are granted an open mind, a zeal for social justice and a love at work for people." In view of such aims as these it is not to be wondered at that their speakers chose two such dead-in-earnest subjects as "Jesus in the New Era" and "The Psychology of Religion." The former was Mr. Campbell's theme, the latter Professor Ames'. This club has a way of mixing up study, joviality, practical service, spiritual devotion and other normal human activities into one embracing fellowship, as well as any organization of which we have heard. We note an interesting item on the menu called "Chicago University Punch." This was probably put down to lend an orthodox aspect to the occasion.

Foreign Society News

The Central Church, New York City, James L. Philputt, minister, secured an offering of $1,100 for home missions and expect to give about the same amount for foreign missions. We congratulate the church upon its growing missionary interest.

The Philathean Society of the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., has contributed $500 to build a room in the Batang hospital to be known as the J. W. McGarvey room. A beautiful memorial this is to the late President McGarvey. We extend hearty congratulations to the society for its liberality and we express our high appreciation of the tender and fitting remembrance of him who served the College of the Bible so long and so efficiently.

The church at Keokuk, Iowa, enters the Living-link rank. It has enlisted for a term of five years. R. W. Lilley is the minister.

Miss Lavenia Oldham has just returned to Japan from her furlough. She has spent about twenty years in that land. The number of missionaries has been trebled and about all the buildings of the foreign society have been erected during that period. She sails May 21 on the S. S. Sanuki Maru and will reach Tokyo, June 6. Miss Oldham is supported by the Central Church, Lexington, Ky.

At the last meeting of the executive committee, Miss Minnie Vautrin, of Champaign, Ill., was appointed missionary to China. She will probably go to the field this coming fall, and is to be associated with Miss Alma Favors in the Girls' School at Luchowfu. Miss Vautrin is a graduate of the University of Illinois and was the honor pupil among 800.

A. F. Hensey, Bolenge, Africa, writes that they are in the midst of their quarterly conference and on March 24, baptized sixty-five.

Leslie Wolfe, Manila, P. I., writing under date of April 3, says, "Our evangelistic work continues to prosper. During March we baptized twenty-six in the city of Manila. Seven baptisms have been reported from the Tagalog Provinces, but all places have not yet been heard from."

The foreign society is sending seven new missionaries to the field this year. Many more are greatly needed. The year's work will depend much upon the returns from Children's Day.

A friend has just subscribed $5,000 as a direct gift for the work of the foreign society and hopes to be able to pay the whole amount before September 30.

Reports come that the situation of the starving millions in China is still pitiable. The Red Cross has issued an appeal for $800,000 in thirty days. Many of our own Chinese brethren need help and our missionaries could make wise use of several thousand dollars.

The new coin collectors for Children's Day are proving very popular. We have received more orders for Children's Day supplies to date than we had in all last year. Watchword this year—$100,000 from the Sunday-schools alone.

W. Remfry Hunt baptized some seventy Chinese at the dedication of the new Central Christian Church in Chuchow, China. The building is the gift of Mr. and Mrs. James Tisdale in memory of their brother, Walter Scott Tisdale. O. G. Hertzog designed the building and Dr. E. I. Osgood superintended its construction. Mr. Hunt will preach there regularly and visit and organize the country churches. Mrs. Osgood has a large class of women in the Chinese Sunday-school and does fine service.

Four more baptisms are reported by Herbert Smith at Lotumbe, Africa.

West Virginia Convention Held at Historic Bethany

The West Virginia state convention of the Disciples of Christ was held in the old church at Bethany last week. It was one of the best conventions in the history of our state organization. The fellowship could not be surpassed. There was a spirit of hopefulness in the air. Some splendid reports came in from the churches. Most of our mission points were in a flourishing condition and two or three were ready to become entirely self-supporting. More churches gave to the support of our work than last year. While we closed the year with a debt of $800, enough money is pledged to entirely liquidate the debt. The spirit of co-operation is growing in this state that has so long been dominated by ultra conservatism. Less was said this year about our "problems" with non-missionary brethren. Our missionaries seem to have lost themselves this year in the larger affairs of the Kingdom, and so were able to triumph over the pettiness of local difficulties. Secretary O. G. White gave good account of himself. Much of our success in the state is due to his untiring efforts.

The program was a very full one. It started off Monday evening with the State Ministerial Association. The addresses here gave evidence of the fact that our West Virginia men are modern men with a modern message. The association promises to be very helpful to the ministry of the state. A committee was appointed to provide a good reading course for young men and another for those of riper years. Another committee was appointed to secure credentials from all

CENTRAL CHURCH
DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.
New York, 142 West 81st St.
Rev. JAS. M. PHILPUTT, D. D., 11 A. M., 8 P. M. Welcome to the oldest church Disciples of Christ.

Drake University
Des Moines, Iowa.
COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS.
Four-year courses, based upon four-year high school courses, leading to the degree of A. B., Ph. B., S. B. In the School of Education, included in this college, are courses for Students in Domestic Science.
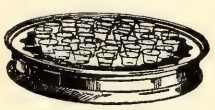
Primary Teachers.
Kindergarten Teachers.
Grade Teachers.
High School Teachers.
COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE.
Graduate course, requiring three years' work, leading to degree of D. B.
COLLEGE OF LAW.
Three-year course, based on four-year high school course, leading to degree of L.L. B.
COLLEGE OF MEDICINE.
Four-year course, based on four-year high school course and two full years in college, leading to the degree of M. D.
COLLEGE OF DENTISTRY.
Three-year course, based on four-year high school course, leading to the degree of D. D. S.
INSTITUTE OF FINE ARTS.
Special courses, based upon such preparation as best fits the student to pursue the study of his chosen course most profitably. The Institute of Fine Arts includes three distinct departments:
Conservatory of Music.
School of Painting and Drawing.
School of Dramatic Art.
For catalogue and other information, address,
THE PRESIDENT,
DRAKE UNIVERSITY,
Des Moines, Iowa.



THOMAS INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE
OUR SPECIAL SELF-COLLECTING Cushioned Tray has no equal. NOISELESS, DUST PROOF, INTERLOCKING. Best for pew or altar communion. Uses short, shallow cup, glass or aluminum (indestructible) no tipping of head. Saves ONE-FOURTH cost other services. Over 12,000 churches use. Send for catalog and "Special Introductory Offer." Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 120 Lima, Ohio

DRY AIR CLEANING
Cleans Carpets, Rugs, Mattings, Finished Floors, Linoleums, Without Raising a Dust. CLEANED ON THE FLOOR
Inrush of Air Draws Dust, Dirt, Germs, Grit into Cleaner. A Practical Cleaner, Made for the Home at a Home Price.
70,000 Home Vacuum Cleaners Sent to Families
THE COMING METHOD OF CLEANING for Every Family, rich or poor, city, village or country. One person uses. Right weight, right size. Easily operated. Made for practical use.
GETS THE DIRT. WE CHALLENGE EVERY OTHER METHOD.
Does not look like a broom, yet it does the work a broom cannot do. Like magic, dust, dirt, grit and germs disappear. Carpets, rugs, etc., look newer, cleaner, brighter, smell sweeter. Raises no dust to settle on person, furniture, draperies, walls, etc.

LOOK AT THE PICTURE! Standing erect, in fresh clean clothes, holding handles loosely, moving arms naturally, muscles relaxed, without unnecessary exertion. Nozzle gliding over the surface, carpets growing brighter and looking newer. It sucks up the dust dirt and germs from the warp and fibre of carpets, rugs and mattings on the floor.
What Users Say "Cleaned two rooms, took out five quarts of dirt." W. P. Collins, Pa. "Am pleased with the Cleaner, it certainly takes up the dust." Carrie H. Chandler, N.Y. "I can keep the dust down and do not have to inhale dust and germs; wouldn't take $25 for my machine." Mrs. W. R. Anders, O. "Makes the house smell much sweeter, no dust to fly around the room." David Bricker, Pa. "Am a small weak woman, but can manage it myself; it is as you claimed it to be, many thanks." Mrs. J. Parmley, Kans. "I am delighted with Cleaner; it will take the place of the broom in time." Mrs. Sarah Richardson, O. "It certainly removes fine dust which neither broom nor sweeper would do." Mrs. J. R. Bowerman, N.Y. "Cleans carpets on the floor better than taking them up." Frank Barnes, Calif. "I did not take up the carpet at housecleaning time this spring." Mrs. E. Robb, Wisc. These are statements from a few of the thousands of women who are enjoying the benefits of dry air cleaning in their homes.
It Will Do as Much for You Knowing this, would you do without it another day and miss the comfort, convenience and economy it means to you; the satisfaction it gives you to keep your home clean, and with so little labor. Dry air cleaning is the coming method: all will eventually have it. Won't you have it now? You won't make a mistake. You won't regret it. Price only $8.50. Sent anywhere. Order a Cleaner today. Write anyway for full information.
AGENTS--Money for You. $40 to $60 per week
Comes easy, quick, sure. Nothing to learn. Go into any home; sprinkle some chalk or fine dirt on the carpet; tramp it in; take it out like magic. Let the lady try it; she will keep it. Your sale is made. Go to the next—demonstrate in five minutes, and sell again; then the next. Sell eight of ten. Every family a prospect.
JOIN THE MONEY MAKERS
Men or Women. F. A. White, Ill., sold 15 in 5 hours. C. E. Goff, Mo., "Sold 5 Saturday; my first attempt." Geo. A. Smith, O., was out one evening, made $25.50 profit. Hilton R. Campbell, N.J., ordered 1, then 6, then 12—thirty since; profit $208.25. E. T. Evans, Ill., ordered 8, then 12—eighty-seven since; profit $487.75. F. E. Poole, Mass., ordered 1, then 6, then 12—one hundred and seventy-five since, profit $824.50. Mrs. F. E. Foss, a Minnesota lady, ordered 30—three hundred and twelve since; profit $1,457. F. S. Hoppes, La., ordered 50 and said: "More orders coming." So they go. Low price: only $8.50. Not sold in stores. Now is the time to start. THIS IS YOUR CHANCE. Be a money maker, be a success. Don't let someone else beat you to it.
$8.50
Send for FREE SAMPLE offer. Write quickly. Do it today.
R. ARMSTRONG MFG. CO. 2158 Alma Bld. Cincinnati, Ohio.

ministers working in the state with a view to raising our standards, and to protecting the churches against unworthy preachers. The sessions of the C. W. B. M. were presided over by our faithful president, Mrs. Winn. Mrs. Anna R. Atwater gave three inspiring addresses which brought the convention up to the mountain tops of vision.

A goodly number of women brought reports from local missionary societies. From outside of the state were Grant K. Lewis for the A. C. M. S., Homer Sala for the Church Extension Board, W. E. M. Hackleman for the Christian Board of Publication, and as the convention leader in the service of song. This mission, it is needless to say, was performed in his usual helpful way. The addresses by Mr. Meachem, Sunday-school specialist, were of the highest order. Our churches resolved to be more loyal to our general missionary interests this year.

We felt that we were treading on hallowed ground about old Bethany. Repeated pilgrimages were made to the old Campbell homestead and to God's acre, across the fields, where sleep so many of our illustrious dead. What a happy thought it was to purchase the farm and turn it over to the college. The place is destined to be to the Disciples all that Mt. Vernon is to the American people. Not one thread or board of it ought to be allowed to pass into ruin. Bethany will become more and more the Mecca of the Disciples. It will take two centuries to reveal to us the real value of the place. The old church ought to be preserved as it is, and a new memorial built by its side that would do proper credit to our history and be to the students of Bethany a constant sermon on the moral and spiritual grandeur of our holy faith. I look to Hiram as my beloved alma mater, but I love old Bethany as the mother of us all; and when I trod the historic corridor in the morning before chapel service, I found myself singing with the rest, "My father sent me to old Bethany." The bunch of bright Christian young folks is sure to awaken enthusiasm. We had a mighty good convention. We are going to Elkins next year.

W. D. VAN VOORHIS.

Parkersburg, W. Va.

New Mexico West Texas Convention

The New Mexico—West Texas Christian Missionary Society will hold its convention this year at Cloudcroft, beginning June 5 and continuing over one week. Cloudcroft is a mountain resort situated in the Sacramento Mountains in the southern part of New Mexico. It is known as "Nature's Roof Garden." Nine thousand feet above the sea, it is reached by a branch of the El Paso Southwestern railroad which leaves the main line at Alamogordo, and ascends by a circuitous and picturesque route, traversing twenty-five miles of track until it reaches the summit, where Cloudcroft is "literally hung in the heavens."

Here among the stately pines of the primeval forest, it is arranged to spend a week in recreation and fellowship, and in considering the King's business. It will be a week above the clouds, a week of education and of inspiration.

An excellent program is being arranged, providing for two sessions each day, one in the morning and one in the evening. The afternoons will be given over to informal conferences, retreats, rambling in the woods, visiting points of interest and general recreation. The speakers secured for the convention are such well known brethren as I. N. McCash, who will represent the A. C. M. S. and the Brotherhood, and will give some talks to the preachers; J. H. Mohorter, who will represent the N. B. A. and will present some of the early morning Bible studies; Randolph Cook of Trinidad, Col., who will speak for the great Southwest; and Herman P. Williams of Albuquerque, who was formerly a missionary in the Philippines and who will speak for the F. C. M. S. Besides these the missionaries and pastors at work in the Southwest will also be present and participate.

The railroads have granted a special rate from all points in New Mexico and West Texas, and arrangements have been perfected so that the cost of entertainment will be very slight. A most urgent invitation is extended to all Disciples residing in this territory to attend and share in the fellowship and deliberations of this convention.

Committee: P. J. Rice, F. F. Grim, W. E. Garrison.

The High Calling

(Continued from page 15.)

about some of these proposed bills of yours. This Reform business is being run into the ground. We are tired of it. The people are getting tired of it. You are going to have a great influence in the legislature. We concede that fact. Now, what we want to do is to talk over some of these bills and get your influence to modify or change in some ways."

Paul listened thoughtfully and when Maxwell was through, he said, "Will you mention the particular bills you have in mind. I am not certain I know after all just what your business with me is."

Maxwell coughed and drew up his chair nearer. The other two men did the same. The hum of the presses was beginning to pervade the building as Maxwell, in reply to Paul's request, continued.

(To be continued.)

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A Most Wholesome Book for Those Troubled Over Christian Doctrines.

Published at 75 cents by

THE BETHANY PRESS

The New Christian Century Co.

700 E. 40th St. Chicago

A Moral Obligation: An Immediate Duty

On behalf of the Commission of the Disciples of Christ I am reciting the following facts:

The apportioned share of the Disciples to the Federal Council of the churches of Christ for the past year was $1,300. A balance remained unpaid of the previous year's apportionment. This, however, the council is willing to cancel if the current year's obligation is met. Almost every other affiliated communion has met its apportionment including an $800 offering by the colored Baptists of the South.

This is a moral obligation. It has been incurred by the action of those among us who would not permit the Disciples of Christ to suffer the blameworthy censure of preaching Christian union and refusing to share the available instrument of co-operation which must precede actual union. It is true that we are not oblgated, as a brotherhood, for some among us sincerely oppose such an affiliation.

It becomes the duty, therefore, of all those among us who value the Federal Council as an efficient and immediate medium to make up the quota assigned us on behalf of the entire brotherhood. We must depend upon those churches and individuals who have the far vision and ready spirit of response.

The Commission on Christian Union is impotent to enter the already open doors so long as the Disciples stand on the embarrassing debtor side of this Christian ledger. Whether we regard the council as effective or not does not relieve us from the disregard in which our further preachment on Christian union will be held so long as we repudiate partnership in the fellowship peculiarly devoted to this end. The council is performing most worthy and desired tasks for the whole church, but even if it were inefficient, so long as it is held in esteem by Protestant America, our disfellowship in it reduces our appeal for union to that of a mere babbler in the ears of those so associated. If we lose our point of contact what does it value what truth we have to proclaim?

The commission has assigned me the pleasurable task of bringing this fellowship to the attention of our people and to became treasurer for such funds until the amount is raised. Proper recognition will be made each week through our papers of all money forwarded. Send to the Central Church of Christ, Des Moines, Iowa.

With an earnest passion,

FINIS IDLEMAN.

Progress the Spirit of Indiana Convention

The spirit of progress dominated the Indiana State Convention held at Hammond, May 13-16. Education was the keynote of the whole gathering, and directly or indirectly, it had a place in every message. There was nothing of partisanism; charity and breadth of mind abounded.

Harry G. Hill, Joseph C. Todd and Milo J. Smith, the officers of the convention, had gathered a notable group of speakers.

Charles H. Winders, of Indianapolis, gave the first important address Monday evening, May 13. His subject was "The Plea of Our Fathers and Our Plea." Mr. Winders' address was characterized by two qualities—loyalty and progressiveness. He was loyal to the essential position held by the fathers and recognized the necessity of adapting our statement and practice of the plea to the new ways of thinking and the new conditions of today. In unequivocal words he affirmed that our neighboring evangelical churches are churches of Christ and their members Christians. He dealt in a constructive and conservative way with the live issues of the hour in our brotherhood, and made a statement of our duty which set the convention talking throughout its sessions.

Harry G. Hill delivered the president's address Tuesday morning. Mr. Hill is just in the act of leaving the pulpit of Third Church, Indianapolis, where he has been for five years. Much talk has gone on as to the character of his teaching, and some expected his utterances at the convention to be somewhat startling. The note he struck, however, was, sane, evangelical, practical and loyal.

Tuesday evening was devoted to messages by Prof. T. C. Paul and Dr. H. C. Hurd, both of the Missionary Training School.

Prof. W. C. Morro, of Butler College, struck an important not in his Educational Address, Wednesday forenoon. "Education is not a rod, it is a cable, in which religion is a very important strand," was his thesis. He decried the fact that in our state universities it is possible for a man who has completed his course to be termed an educated man, though religion may have had no part in his training. Professor Morro expressed himself as strongly favoring church colleges.

"The Organized Adult Class" was the subject of a talk Wednesday evening, by W. C. Pearce, international superintendent Adult Bible classes. Following him Robert N. Simpson, of New Albany, president of the Brotherhood of Indiana, gave the Brotherhood address.

Thursday A. E. Dubber, speaking on "The Uniform Plan for Raising Missionary Money," "Standards of Efficiency" by J. M. Alexander, Church Extension and Ministerial Relief employed most of the forenoon.

Henry F. Cope, of Chicago, secretary of the Religious Education Association, made a significant contribution to the convention in "Education and the Program of the Kingdom," a speech which shattered outgrown habits and traditions of religious instruction. Mr. Cope defined the subject of religious education as two-fold: the developing of a Christian personality in the child, and the construction of a society adapted to produce and foster such a personality. It should be the aim of religious education to make it easy and natural to be religious.

In the same session Claude E. Hill spoke with characteristic force on Christian Endeavor, followed by O. E. Tomes and Hazel A. Lewis.

"Christian Union" was the subject of a thoughtful, incisive and fascinating address by Rev. C. P. Anderson, D. D., Episcopal Bishop of Chicago, at the concluding session, Thursday evening. It does not belittle the other speeches of the assembly to call it the climax of the convention. Bishop Anderson, of the Episcopal church, is vitally interested in Christian union. He has studied the Disciples' Movement keenly and sympathetically.

"The unity of the Christian Church is an existing fact," said Bishop Anderson. "Our duty is to make that unity manifest in an organic, visible oneness. Unity is of God; man makes union." It was Bishop Anderson's belief that when union comes to pass it will not require the sacrificing of the principles of any one church. Rather each will make its contribution to the whole church. It will be a process of synthesis and relation.

The speaker declared that we are not yet ready to define the platform of Christian union. That must come in another generation. Ours is the equally important work of preparing for that which those who follow us are to complete.

To C. J. Sharp, pastor of the Hammond church is due much of the success of the convention. He is an able executive.

The next meeting of the state convention will be at North Park, Indianapolis, in May, 1913. The officers chosen for the 1913 convention are: President, J. C. Todd, Bloomington; vice-president, J. H. Craig, Logansport; secretary, J. E. Gorsuch, Brazil.

—The Supreme Court of New Hampshire has returned a verdict that the clause of the will of Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, founder of the Christian Science church, bequeathing the residue of her estate, valued at about $2,000,000, to the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Boston, creates a "valid trust" The court holds that "the residuary clause is not a gift to the church, but a gift for religious purposes, sustainable as a charitable trust."

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

BOWLDEN BELLS FOR CHURCH AND SCHOOL

Sweet Tone Far Sounding Durable
Catalogue Free.
AMERICAN BELL & FOUNDRY CO., NORTHVILLE, MICH.

WE READ and clip for you daily everything printed in the current country and city press of America pertaining to the subject of particular interest to you.
NEWSPAPERS contain many items daily which would inform you exclusively of where you can secure new business, an order or a contract; where a new store has been started, a new firm incorporated or a contract is to be let. A daily press clipping service means more business
FOR YOU. Send Stamp for Booklet
THE CONSOLIDATED PRESS CLIPPING CO.
1109 167 W. Washington St., Chicago, U. S. A.

REMEMBER
CHILDREN'S DAY
For Foreign Missions
FIRST SUNDAY IN JUNE
SUPPLIES FREE
THE UNUSED CROSS.

ONE HALF THE WORLD IS BEYOND THE REACH OF ANY MESSENGER OF JESUS CHRIST.
AND I, IF I BE LIFTED UP FROM THE EARTH, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME
The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day Supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Bible Schools observing the day in the interest of Heathen Missions.
FREE SUPPLIES
1st. Coin Pocket Missionary Collectors. These are a great improvement on the missionary boxes formerly used. Attractive, convenient, suitable for old or young.
2d. Darkness and Light. The new Children's Day exercise by P. H. Duncan. Filled with beautiful songs, exercises, and recitations. Good for older pupils as well as little folks. Adapted to any school.
ORDER AT ONCE. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance. Write to
STEPHEN J. COREY,
Box 884. Cincinnati, Ohio.

Some Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing.
You need every one of this splendid list.

NOW PREPARING FOR THE PRESS.

THE MEANING OF BAPTISM

By Charles Clayton Morrison.

This notable volume is nearly ready for the press. A very large edition will be run at the first printing. It is expected that the book will have a wide sale throughout the Christian world. 250 pages, Cloth, $1.25

When this book appears it will be seen to be the most important work treating of the teachings of the Disciples that has appeared in this generation. It deals with a theme that is peculiarly alive to every mind that has had any part in the Disciples' reformatory movement. The author writes with conviction, but wholly without partisanship. He states issues incisively and faces them squarely. He holds an original and independent point of view for the treatment of the subject of Christian Baptism. He accepts the position of the Disciples as to the practice of immersion only, but rejects much of the reasoning traditionally put forth by his brethren and the Baptists in support of this practice. The book is refreshingly frank. In the opening chapter the author puts himself squarely in opposition to Alexander Campbell's argument.

FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

THE LIFE OF JESUS IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Loa Ermina Scott. A new Text Book for Young People's and Adult Bible Classes. Introduction by Professor E. B. Wakefield, of Hiram College. 120 pages, 50 cents. In quantities of 10 or more, 40 cents each.

This book comes nearer meeting all demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions — all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportions. It is the product of experience. The author used the material in her own successful career as a teacher. It was not written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in The Life of Christ, and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, Springfield, Ill.

For the purpose for which it was prepared it is superior to all other books with which I am familiar.—GEO. A. RAGAN, Claremont, Cal.

This work can not only be used profitably in our Bible-schools, but in Bible study classes of all sorts. Dr. Scott has done a splendid piece of work, which deserves a wide circulation.—CLAUDE E. HILL, Valparaiso, Ind.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Cleveland, Ohio.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study.—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland, Ohio.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the Gospels themselves. I would like to see this book used by a class in our Sunday-school in the near future.—A. W. FORTUNE.

The book is a happy combination of the catechetical and analytic methods of teaching and would thus seem to give the largest latitude for the exercise of the teacher's own personality.—B. A. ABBOTT, St. Louis, Mo.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION

Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic literary product of the Disciples' first century of history. Thousands have been sold and the volume is enjoying a steady demand. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Price, $1.00.

Z. T. Sweeney says:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

AN ILLUMINATING BIT OF AMERICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates [illegible] and the historic facts [illegible] harm that make them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 35c.

Willett Prof H L
1220 E 56th St

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—The Christian Worker.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

A FASCINATING RELIGIOUS STORY.

ATLAR STAIRS

By Charles J. Scofield.

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.00.

"A most excellent serial."—J. H. Garrison.
"An admirable story."—J. J. Haley.
"A most forceful and healthful piece of reading."—Z. T. Sweeney.
"If one begins this book he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished."—Christian Observer.
"A strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement."—Religious Telescope.

BOOKS BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

BASIC TRUTHS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Paper, 127 pages, 35 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style.

"For me the finest chapter in the book is that on the Resurrection. This gets one back into the lives of the Apostles on that Resurrection morn. It is a historical study indeed. One hears the tread of conquering hosts and the beating of the wings of twelve legions of angels."—P. C. Macfarlane.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

STUDIES IN THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

Cloth, $1.00.

One of the volumes in the Constructive Series of handbooks. It is prepared for the use of classes in secondary schools and in the secondary division of the Sunday-schools. It presents the entire material of First Samuel with explanatory notes, questions, and illustrations. It is used in a large number of Sunday-schools, in grades of the ages of eleven to fourteen.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS

Cloth, $1.25.

An introduction to the literature of the New Testament. The book is a work of collaboration with James M. Campbell, D. D., a prominent Congregational minister, who supplies the interpretative material in connection with each of the books of the New Testament. A handbook widely used by individual students and classes.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

Cloth, 35 cents.

A small handbook prepared for classes desiring to study the outline of the life of Christ, and a brief statement of the most important teachings of the Master. It is based upon the entire material of the four Gospels arranged in chronological order.

THE PROPHETS OF ISRAEL

Cloth, 35 cents.

A handbook on this, the most important theme of the Old Testament. It gives a survey of the history of prophecy in Israel from the beginning of the national life to the close of the Maccabæan age. It has been widely used in institutions of education and in Bible classes, and has passed through several editions.

THE RULING QUALITY

Board 35 cents net. Postage 4 cents.

A small book of sixty pages dealing with faith as the conquering quality in human life. The theme is interwoven with comments upon the quest of the Holy Grail as illustrated in Mr. Abbey's panels.

PUBLISHED BY THE BETHANY PRESS NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO. 700 E. 40th ST., CHICAGO.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXIX May 30, 1912 Number 22

ROBERT BROWNING

POET OF THE ASCENT OF MAN

BY JOHN R. SLAYTER.

THE SOWER AND THE TARES

A STORY FOR MEMORIAL DAY

BY EDGAR WHITE

CHICAGO

Topics of the Times

It takes money and lots of it nowadays to keep the wolf from the door, no matter whether the individual lives in a mansion or a ten dollar flat. The latest figures compiled by the statisticians show that the cost of living has advanced nearly 10 per cent in the last year, from May 1, 1911, to May 1, 1912. Prices of commodities generally have reached the highest point since the commercial agencies have been keeping tab. Not only have live stock, provisions and breadstuffs become more costly but building materials, textiles, coal and other essentials have been climbing. Bradstreet's has a method of comparing yearly average prices by which an index number represents a carefully compiled average of prices kept month by month. The agency has reported that the figure for May 1 last exceeds any previous figure during the twenty years that the system has been followed. It shows a rise in prices of 9.7 per cent since May 1, 1911, and an increase of 1.9 per cent since April 1 of this year.

The despised work of the "farm hand" has become a lucrative vocation in Wisconsin, more so, in fact, than the learned professions, judging from University of Wisconsin records. There are more applications in the hands of Prof. R. A. Moore of the agronomy department for men with agricultural training than he will be able to fill this year. When the university closed, in 1911, the agricultural college had more orders for graduates than could be supplied. Total salaries of $450,000 were involved in the jobs the department could not fill for lack of qualified men. While graduates of law, engineering, medicine, arts, and science were competing for such limited opportunities as were offered, the farmers had all been engaged before they completed their course, at salaries ranging from $600 to $3,000 a year. Before commencement each had found a position at an average salary of $1,180.

They are not striking in Australia these days. Labor conditions in Australia are rapidly approaching an ideal condition through the workings of the compulsory arbitration laws now being enforced there, according to Percy Hunter, director of immigration in New South Wales. Mr. Hunter said that reports of a deplorable condition because of strikes and labor troubles in Australia were not founded on fact. "There has been no real trouble there for two years," said he. "There recently was a street car strike in Queensland, but it fizzled out in a short time. The fact that strikers or employers are liable to serve a term in prison because of failure to submit their demands to arbitration effectually prevents strikes."

Engineers at Joliet, Ill., sank a very deep artesian well which they calculated would produce one million gallons of pure water every day and recruit the municipal supply of the city to such an extent that there would be no more water famine. A stream of pure shale oil instead of pure water burst forth and oil, apparently as free from water as at the start, was soon being pumped at the rate of thousands of gallons an hour. The well will be shut off when the engineers become convinced that they have struck an oil gusher, not a water well, and it will be later turned on, it being purposed to use the product to oil the streets this summer.

There is going to be a slight let up in new battleships, that is, as far as the United States is concerned. The navy appropriation bill, carrying $118,819,837, approximately $7,500,000 less than last year, has been introduced in the House. The usual two battleships are not carried, but two fuel ships at $1,207,320 each, six destroyers at $1,054,300 each, one tender to them at $1,636,200 and four submarines at $584,200 each are proposed. The Titanic disaster is referred to in the proposal for a wireless system around the world, with stations at the Pacific coast, the canal zone, Hawaii, Samoa, Guam and the Philippines. An appropriation of $1,000,000 is provided.

Proud of its 70 per cent reduction in casualties and 80 per cent reduction in fire losses effected during the last two years by "safe and sane" celebrations of the Fourth of July, New York City hopes to bring about still further improvements this year. Mayor Gaynor has appointed a general committee of 1,000 members, the head of which is Herman Bidder, of the New York Staats Zeitung, who had charge last year. Various subcommittees are being organized to take up the work of the celebration, which will include patriotic exercises in every borough and an enlarged athletic program this year. The board of aldermen is expected to provide $50,000, as it did last year, and citizens will subscribe an equal amount.

The dry season on the Isthmus of Panama has ended with a great rain storm. The dry period, which was the longest recorded since the Americans have occupied the zone, has greatly facilitated the work of digging the canal, and it is announced that 1,000 white employes will be dropped from the pay rolls before the end of May. Within the next three months Gatun Lake will rise thirty-three feet. All the dry excavation has now been practically completed.

It used to be quite the caper to get full on water as well as on land. This idea is changing along with the great growth of the temperance idea. Records of all kinds have been claimed by steamships coming into New York, but none more strange than the boast of the Columbia, of the Anchor line, which recently completed a trip from Glasgow without having sold a drink during the entire voyage. There was plenty to drink on board, but all the passengers were total abstainers.

The Bahaists, who recently made such a spectacular entrance upon the Chicago stage, coming to convert the pork-packing city to the cause of universal peace, struck a snag before they were well launched upon their world conquest. Their sole tenet is "Universal Brotherhood," and their besetting sin a disposition to smite one another under the fifth rib. Less than a month ago their oriental prophet was received with impressive ceremonies in the drill-hall of one of our great public buildings, but already they have divided, according to the daily papers, into opposing camps upon the question, "Who shall be greatest?" For a time they seem to have retired from public view, possibly seeking to settle among themselves who shall hold the bag before they pass the hat again.

A permit has just been granted, allowing the American Bible Society to ship twenty cases of Bibles into Persia each year.

About People

—J. Bruce Ismay, managing director of the White Star Line, has contributed $50,000 and Mrs. Ismay $5,000 as the nucleus of a fund which Mr. Ismay suggests the Earl of Derby, who is lord mayor of Liverpool, should initiate in order to provide pensions for the widows of seamen who lose their lives while serving in vessels of the British mercantile marine.

—King Frederick VIII, of Denmark, who died unknown in a street in Hamburg, Germany, last week, was born in 1843, and succeeded to the throne in 1906. During the first two years of his reign, he was not popular, but of late had won the affections of his people. His wife, whom he married in 1869, was the Princess Louisa, of Sweden and Norway. The new king, Christian X, was born in 1870, and in 1898, married Princess Alexandrine, of Mecklenburg-Schwerin.

—Carl R. Gray, who succeeds Louis W. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railroad, is a resident of Portland, Ore. Until recently he was stationed at St. Louis, as vice-president of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad. He entered the services of the St. Louis & San Francisco as a telegraph operator in 1883. He is 44 years old.

—The Prince of Wales will reach his legal majority on June 23, when he will have his own special household and large suites suitably appointed and set apart at Buckingham and Windsor palaces. The king will continue to supervise the occupations and pursuits of the boy, but the prince will have a governor and comptroller of the household, an equerry, and two secretaries, as well as a large staff of servants at special wages, and coachmen and grooms. The Prince of Wales will not sever himself from his affectionate family life, but will be able to entertain his friends at luncheons and dinners in his own apartments.

—The same question has arisen with respect to the will of Isidor Straus and wife, who died on the Titanic, as in the case of Charles Fair, the California millionaire, who was instantly killed with his wife in an automobile accident in France some years ago. The will provided that, should Mrs. Straus die before her husband, the laws of intestacy would govern the disposition of her legacy. The petition accompanying the will gives the value of the real estate owned by Mr. Straus at $265,000, while his personal property is simply given as being "in excess of $10,000." Mr. Straus left no special bequests to charity, the will explaining that by a letter to his sons, he had indicated his wishes in this regard, and was confident they would carry out his desires. One of the provisions of the will was, that Mrs. Straus, should she have lived, was to have the Straus town house and the summer home; together with the income for life from a trust fund of $1,200,000. Trust funds of $500,000 each were established for three daughters. The residuary legatees are the three sons. They also are named as executors of the estate. The will provided that all the trust funds should revert to the sons. This means that they probably will receive the share of the estate left for Mrs. Straus.

—Judge Lindley of the St. Louis Circuit Court is fond of a quiet joke. A raw German, summoned for jury duty, desired to be relieved. "Chudge," he said, "I can nicht understand goot English." Looking over the crowded bar, the judge replied: "Oh, you can serve! You won't have to understand good English. You won't hear any here."

The Christian Century
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

Cultivating the Objective Temper

THE COMMISSION ON CHRISTIAN UNITY of the American Episcopal church has recently issued a statement of its hope ultimately to bring about a conference of all Christian bodies to consider the possibility of the union of all Christians. It discourages too sanguine expectations of an early date for such a world conference. Much time must be allowed for preparation, not alone in arranging the formalities but in creating an atmosphere of union.

The commission suggests that, in the meantime, each communion give itself to a study of the principles and practices distinctive to itself and which it might regard as a worthy contribution to an ultimate basis of unity for Christendom. The theory upon which the commission proceeds has been tersely stated by its chairman, Bishop Anderson, of Chicago, who says that union will be attained not by compromise but by comprehension, that is by each denomination contributing a distinctive element to the united church. The commission therefore urges each denomination to make clear to itself and convincing to its neighbors precisely what characteristic of its own it wishes the united church to take over.

* * *

Whatever is to be said as to the need of this suggestion in the case of other communions, it will hardly be affirmed by any one familiar with the Disciples of Christ that they need any unusual stimulus to study and formulate the things regarded as peculiarly their own. To study and restate "our peculiar position" has been our perennial occupation. This has been the chief theme of our preaching and writing for a century. We are keenly aware of our distinctiveness. By adopting as their own the text, "Ye are a peculiar people," the preachers of the past two generations caught up the Jewish consciousness of isolation and transferred it to the Disciples of Christ. It is a serious question whether this self-consciousness has not been abnormal and unwholesome, whether it has not made us finical minded and over-nice as to the means by which our great ends were to be attained and no less clannish and sectarian in our temper than our Christian neighbors.

It is the growing conviction of a great number of the best Disciple minds that the great need of our body is to be set free from this subjective consciousness and to give itself with a great passion to the objective things of the Kingdom of God. A too sensitive consciousness of "our plea" inhibits the proclamation of the plea. An overwrought feeling of our distinctive mission in Christendom paralyzes the performance of that mission. Like Hamlet, the Disciples lose many a chance to do their duty because "the native hue" of their resolution "is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought."

* * *

Most readers will be able to recognize, among their acquaintances, the following picture of a certain type of business man. He is forever talking about the enormous possibilities of his business. He dreams great dreams. His fertile brain invents many devices and schemes for the expansion of his business. He is happy in the assurance that he can become a millionaire through the working out of those schemes. But he does not work them out. His business goes along from year to year upon the same level. Meantime he luxuriates in his possibilities, caresses this scheme and that, talks intimately to his friends about his peculiar opportunities, fondles his plans as a miser fondles his hoarded coins, but gets relatively nothing done. The truth is that such a man finds more satisfaction in contemplating the possibilities of his business than in doing business. He would be less happy in working out his plans than in revolving them in his imagination.

He is a victim of over subjectivity. He has a rich and vivid consciousness of ends, but lacks the stimulus to translate them into terms of means.

In this picture there is no intention of drawing an invidious analogy with respect to the Disciples. It is only meant to ask the question whether we too may not be a victim to this same subjectivity; whether we too may not be more absorbed in the contemplation of our plea than in the proclamation of it, in the perennial re-examination and refinement of our plans than in the execution of them, whether we may not be deriving more satisfaction from the sense that we hold the key to the locked gate of Christian unity than in actually opening the gate to ourselves and all the foot-weary and weakened battalions of Christ's divided army.

* * *

This at least is certain, that if the intervening years, prior to the world conference on Christian unity, can be spent profitably by other Christian bodies in a subjective study of their respective distinctive characteristics, these years can be spent by the Disciples of Christ to much greater profit in an objective study of the great undistinctive, catholic features of our holy religion. This interminable re-examination of our plea has too long inhibited the doing of our work, narrowed our circle of interests, cultivated a finical attitude with respect to methods and words, and developed a more or less clannish consciousness which our Christian neighbors have found it difficult to distinguish from the sect spirit against which we are ever inveighing.

In striking contrast to the later temper of the Disciples is the temper of Thomas Campbell's Declaration and Address. Every paragraph of that great document deals with objective, undistinctive things. There is an entire absence of the subjective temper. In beginning their history the Disciples made no claim for themselves, for any distinctive views of their own with which the rest of the religious world would have to reckon before there could be unity. They did not set out any "conscientious convictions" which others must beware not to violate. It was in the clash of debate and later in the pride of their denominational successes that the subjective attitude was developed.

What Disciples now need is not further to refine their thought about their distinctiveness but to enlarge and enrich their souls with respect to their present essential oneness with all the people of God.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Servant Problem and Feudalism

The statistics indicate a very large increase in the number of women employed in offices, stores and factories in the last ten years and but a small increase in those accepting domestic service. Meanwhile the wealth and luxury of the country has grown and the need of more women in domestic service is urgent. The wages paid in the cities for this class of service make it the one kind of employment where a woman has a chance to accumulate a savings account.

In spite of these facts, there is an ever greater dearth of house help. Why this refusal of the young women of modern times to work in homes, choosing instead the unfavorable environment of the factory or store? Various reasons have been assigned; such as the definiteness of the hours in work outside the home, the opportunity of mingling with other young people, and the satisfaction of working where something new was to be learned.

Probably none of these are the true reasons for our young women deciding to work outside the home. The true reason is the survival of feudalism in domestic service. The mistress talks with her neighbor about the "servant class" with a tone of voice that indicates her contempt for working girls in homes. The mistress has long since been compelled to abandon this attitude toward nurses, especially those who are trained. Our lady has even unbent to receive at her table the governess of her children. But her love of the feudal still works out in the way she treats her other domestic help.

It is to the credit of the women who live in this materialistic age that they would sacrifice commercial advantage rather than accept treatment which classes them as a little less than human. Our young women have the hopes of normal women to marry and have homes of their own. They know that the wearing of a uniform with individious suggestions, the necessity of receiving callers in the kitchen, the whole atmosphere of domestic service militates against the fulfilment of these hopes.

The dearth of domestic help is to increase. It is a slow strike without violence, where at last our medieval ladies, many of whom happen to be the daughters of serving women, will be brought to a more human view of working women.

What is Socialism?

It is usually assumed that a perfectly definite body of political doctrine falls under the classification of socialism. The way to dispel this illusion is to ask a few socialists in different parts of the country what they believe. Except for a few generalities, it will appear that socialism is a shifting changing thing which has yet to put its feet upon the ground.

Early in the history of socialism there were those who opposed any alliance with trades unions since the latter by their alleviating measures would delay the grand crisis that is to usher in socialism. This was later modified, and the socialists now defend every position of labor unionists, when they are in conflict with capital. There was once a time when socialistic writers would have nothing to do with the smaller social reforms such as child labor laws, as these too would delay the cataclysm. This position has of course been long since abandoned.

Geographically, socialism is most diverse. Prof. Small says there are three socialisms in Chicago, that of the south side, the west side and the north side and that none of these are like the socialism of Milwaukee.

There are Fabian socialists who would usher in the reign of socialism by getting it bit by bit. There are the political actionists and the direct actionists. The former would depend upon political agitation. The latter would employ the anarchist agencies of violence to usher in the socialist reign of order. This group with the anarchistic tools are known as the Industrial Workers of the World. They would combine certain labor union methods of organization with their propaganda. They would hope to bring about a world strike to starve the employers into submission. The humor of starving men into submission who own the granaries has never occurred to them but humor is no more the dominating quality of the sectarian in politics than it is of the sectarian in religion.

This many sided socialism will of course go the way of all other political parties. Each has arisen with a definite body of doctrine, which became diversified through criticism until at last the party has had no other bond of unity than political success. Yet each party leaves its mark on history.

Red Cross Appeals for Flood Victims

The Red Cross has issued an urgent appeal for funds for the relief of sufferers from the Mississippi floods. Money in large amounts is needed—and needed at once to feed and clothe thousands of refugees, to send nurses and doctors to see that hastily patched-up refugee camps do not become hotbeds of typhoid and malaria, and, as the flood subsides, to re-establish the sufferers in their homes where houses, stock, fences—all the means of livelihood—are swept away.

Ernest P. Bicknell, director of the American Red Cross, issues the appeal and describes the situation in detail in this week's issue of The Survey magazine, which is the accredited spokesman for the organization. He shows how the flood has been progressive and cumulative. Starting at Cairo, Ill., April 1, it has followed the Ohio and Mississippi rivers down their courses to New Orleans. A great belt of devastated country lies in the flood's path. Farms, villages, cities, have been wrecked. Live stock is dead. Houses were carried away. 150,000 people are homeless. There are 25,000 refugees in and about only two of the many flooded districts—at Vicksburg, Miss., and Helena, Ark.

The Army has done splendid work, Mr. Bicknell says, in rushing supplies, forming refugee camps, rescuing survivors. But the Red Cross must now take charge all down the course of the rampaging rivers. It must continue to feed the people, to maintain order and regulate sanitation, to nurse the sick, to provide for the babies that were born in the army tents.

Gradually it must re-establish the people in their homes. That is the biggest task of all. For that task, the Red Cross is particularly well equipped. Its agents are all through the stricken districts. The need is for money—in generous sums.

Mr. Bicknell points out that the comparatively slow progress of the flood has robbed it of the elements of surprise and horror which have been important parts in raising large relief funds following sudden disaster. The prompt action of the Army has led some to think that all needs have been met. Just the contrary is the case. To keep tens of thousands of people well in camps and to restore them to their homes and to self-support is a task measuring up in many aspects to the Red Cross work at San Francisco. Contributions should be sent to the mayor of your city, or the governor of your state, or to Jacob H. Schiff, treasurer American Red Cross, 52 William Street, New York City.

The Need of a Modern Amos

The Bible student is told that the prophet Amos introduced a new era in Israel by becoming the first of the writing prophets. After visiting the corrupt altars of Bethel with their idolatrous worship, he returned to write the words he had delivered against king and nation. If the student of biblical history is to regard him as an innovator, the sociologist may also find him introducing a new era.

So far as we know, he was the first human being to preach against the inhumanities of war. Before his time, war had been glorious. Even Elijah and Elisha had not as yet perceived any incongruity between their notions of the universal sovereignty of God and the practice of killing men by wholesale. Amos condemns Gaza for selling captives of war. He condemns Tyre for the same offense which is aggravated by its being the violation of the brotherly covenant. The Ammonites are arraigned for the most shocking barbarities practiced against women, offences unknown to modern warfare. The Moabites are accused of violating the graves of the dead in the fierceness of their war hatred.

Even now we are hiring men in every country to devise new implements of destruction. The invention of the dirigible balloon and of the flying machine were largely brought to pass by the desire to use the air as a place of vantage for the throwing of bombs in warfare. We have invented machine guns that would mow down a whole regiment in five minutes. We have cannon that can project a ball twenty miles through the air. We have bullets that flatten against the human body and tear an immense hole through the body they strike. Some of these cruel inventions we have agreed by arbitration not to use. In other cases, we have agreed not to us them and the agreement is violated.

The list of arraignments that might be brought against modern nations by a second Amos would be none the less shocking than that which was brought by the first prophet against war.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Bahaism in the United States

While we are sending our missionaries to foreign countries, they are sending their missionaries to us. Influential cults are now organized on the Pacific coast for the purpose of converting America to their practices. One of the latest of the new arrivals is Bahaism, a Persian product whose teachings may be learned by a reference to the following words for which we are indebted to the Continent:

Now that Abbas Effendi, head of the Bahaist religion, is traveling across the United States, there will, of course, be a good many persons of wabbly religion wabbling toward this soft-voiced prophet and his preaching. Alert pastors will naturally find themselves obliged to read pretty seriously and deeply on Bahaism in order to be ready to talk with those who are superficially attracted to it. Competent librarians anywhere will guide them to the works of E. G. Browne and M. H. Phelps as probably the best authorities on the subject. But for those who have not the time to dig deep in books nothing else quite so useful is to be obtained anywhere as a pamphlet published by the Board of Foreign Missions, "Bahaism and Its Claims," by Dr. William A. Shedd, the eminent Presbyterian missionary at Urumia, Persia. This short analysis demonstrates that Bahaism has little substance outside of borrowed Christian ideals tied to a Mohammedan theology and ritual. In some respects, observes Dr. Shedd, Bahaism's teachings exalt Mohammed even more than does Islam itself, while, on the other hand, it has nothing more to say for Jesus than Islam says.

Catholic Gifts to Missions

The following table of gifts is interesting because of the fact that our own country is a "foreign missionary" country to the Roman Catholic church. Its missionary propaganda embraces all countries, but its gifts of money are not as large as one would expect. Single denominations in the United States gave almost as much for foreign missions last year as did all the papal dominions. It has justly been observed that Romanism's gifts are more in men than in money. Certainly the heroism of missions in that communion has ever been one of the brilliant chapters of missionary annals.

National director, Rev. Joseph Freri, of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, which is the foreign mission body of the Catholic Church, has just made public the annual report of 1912, which shows that the total receipts from all countries were $1,454,845, an increase of $57,509 over the year 1910, when the donations reached $1,397,355. This is the largest amount collected by the society in any year since its foundation in 1882. On May 3 last it entered the ninetieth year of its existence, and the alms donated by Catholics in all those years total $80,349,653. As usual France occupies the place of honor this year, having contributed $605,155. Last year she raised $608,256. The United States collected $281,234, an increase of nearly $15,000 over 1910. Germany is third in the list of the largest contributors, having raised $186,234. In 1896, the year before the society sent its own delegate to this country, Catholics in the United States collected for the society the sum of $32,855. Being a missionary country it shared largely in the distribution of the society's funds. In fact, its share far exceeded what had been collected. The figures show that from 1822 to 1900 the United States received exactly $5,807,393, and in that period had contributed $1,120,420. From 1822 to 1908 the society distributed $10,495,339 among needy mission fields of America.

The church in this country is making an extraordinary effort to show its appreciation of the assistance from the foreign mission department. It is going to train and equip missionaries itself for the distant lands. Under the auspices of the hierarchy a foreign mission college has been established at Hawthorne, N. Y., for this purpose. Next month the Cathedral College founded by Cardinal Farley will send two of its graduates to this institution to prepare for mission labors in various parts of the world.

The American delegation of the society was established in 1897, with offices in Baltimore. In 1903 New York was made the home of the National offices by Reverend Freri. These offices are at 627 Lexington Avenue. The total amount collected by the society in this country since the establishment of the delegation is $2,137,279. Of this amount $2,049,440 was contributed during Reverend Freri's administration.

Better Baptist Business

At the Northern Baptist Convention, being held in Des Moines May 22 to 29, the American Baptist Home Mission Society will celebrate its eightieth anniversary, and its veteran corresponding secretary, the Rev. Dr. Henry L. Morehouse, will preach the anniversary sermon. The combined debts of the home and foreign societies, forming part of the convention, amount to $151,000 and some preliminary work is being done to see if this cannot be raised, wholly or in part, during the convention or before it.

Baptists are making tremendous strides of late in business methods, the saving of missionary money and the increasing of efficiency. Under old methods each society sent out its agents to present its cause. Two or more salaries were paid, additional car fares run up. Under new plans Baptists have now five joint secretaryships, and three additional ones are soon to be named. The existing ones are located at Chicago, for the west and southwest, in West Virginia, Ohio, Wisconsin and the Yellowstone country. In one of the new secretaryships the American Baptist Publication Society will join. Joint secretaries combine all Baptist causes, and save salaries and car fare, while presenting unity to the churches and securing abler representatives.

President Taft and Romanism

President Taft has frequently been charged with making concessions to Romanism of late, and we are glad to give the following letter given out by the president himself in answer to these charges. The letter covers quite completely the rumors that have had a wide circulation of late. Because of the aggressive spirit of Rome it is difficult for a president to keep himself from "entangling alliances," but we believe that the president has maintained the spirit of the constitution so far as religious interests are concerned. President Taft says:

Among the insidious methods of attack pursued by some against me is the attempt to arouse religious prejudice on the charge that I am in some manner unduly favoring the Roman Catholic Church.

I have unduly favored no church, but have treated them all with absolute impartiality.

In 1902, I visited Rome and conferred with Pope Leo XIII, in an attempt to settle the friar land controversy, which had arisen in the Philippines, while I was governor general, and after a time I succeeded in doing so.

When, last March, my aide, Major Butt, set out on a trip solely for his health and proposed to visit Rome, he asked me for a letter of introduction to the present Pope that he might have the privilege of an audience, and I gave him such a letter.

The letter contained nothing but a statement of who Major Butt was, and an expression of the hope that he might have the honor of being received. The only note or letter from the Pope or any representative of his in answer to this letter of introduction which I have received is a cablegram of condolence for all concerned sent by Cardinal Merry del Val by direction of the Pope at the time of the Titanic disaster and making an inquiry as to the fate of Maj. Butt, to which I replied expressing my thanks and giving the facts.

The letter introducing Maj. Butt contained no reference to the recent appointment of American cardinals and no comment on, or reference to, the Catholic Church or any matter relating to it.

The stories circulated that I have made any inquiry, or have taken anywhere at any time, any part, or manifested any interest in questions of social precedence of the recently appointed cardinals are wholly without foundation.

The evidence that there is a conspiracy for the purpose of arousing religious prejudice against me is shown by the fact that at the instance of some one unknown to me, it was reported in a great many very respectable newspapers that I sent a message of welcome and congratulation to the newly appointed apostolic delegate by wireless to the incoming steamer which was bearing him to New York. No such message was sent by me or by any one by my authority. A denial of the published report was issued from the White House, but the denial has obtained no publicity.

The statement that I suspended an order made by the Indian commissioner affecting the garb of the teachers in certain Indian schools which have been transferred from the Catholic Church to the government, is true. I did this for the reason that the commissioner had issued the order after consulting with the secretary of the interior and without awaiting his conclusions.

The propriety of the order has now been made the subject of an open, free discussion by all the parties in interest and the decision of the secretary of the interior will soon be handed down.

I say nothing of the merits of the controversy except that the order reversed a condition which has existed 15 years and affected 30 or 40 teachers who, as nuns, had been long before my time incorporated in the service of the government and who would be in effect expelled from that service by the order should it prevail. They were therefore entitled to a full hearing.

—Baptists own and control ten theological seminaries, valued at $1,760,295 with an endowment of $4,720,427.

—Baptists own and control ninety-nine universities and colleges, valued at $334,271,135, with an endowment of $32,613,201.

—Baptists have 30,585 students in their colleges and universities. This means that about one-seventh of all the university and college students in the United States are in Baptist institutions.

—Baptists own about one-eighth of all the college and university property in the United States, and control one-ninth of the endowment funds.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Published Weekly by

The New Christian Century Co.

Entered as Second-Class Matter Feb. 28, 1902, at the Post Office at Chicago, Illinois, Under Act of March 3, 1879.

EDITORS—CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS—SILAS JONES, IDA WITHERS HARRISON, ORVIS F. JORDAN, ELLIS B. BARNES.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Subscription price $2.00. If paid strictly in advance $1.50 will be accepted. To ministers if paid strictly in advance, $1.00 per year. Single copy, 5 cents.

EXPIRATIONS—The label on the paper shows the month to which subscription is paid. List is revised monthly. Change of date on label is a receipt for remittance on subscription account.

DISCONTINUANCES—In order that subscribers may not be annoyed by failure to receive the paper, it is not discontinued at expiration of time paid in advance (unless so ordered), but is continued pending instruction from the subscriber. If discontinuance is desired, prompt notice should be sent and all arrearages paid.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—In ordering change of address give the old as well as the new. If the paper does not reach you regularly, notify us at once.

REMITTANCES—Should be sent by draft or money order payable to The New Christian Century Company. IF LOCAL CHECK IS SENT ADD TEN CENTS FOR EXCHANGE.

700-714 EAST FORTIETH ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

United Religious Press Building

Promises for the Life to Come

The kind of persons we are now decides for us the kind of life we hope to enjoy in the next world. We cannot get beyond ourselves even when we read the most precious promises of Holy Scripture. The sensual man longs for a heaven of sensuality. The pure in heart expect to see God. The loafer looks for a place of eternal rest. The worker cannot think of a heaven in which there is nothing to do. The prospect of a deeper understanding of the universe, of man, and of God is pleasing to the thinker. The lover of mankind sees a city of God in which there is perfect justice and every one enjoys the birthright of a child of God.

"The Innuits," says Spencer, "expect to feast on reindeer-meat; after death the Creek goes where game is plenty and gods very cheap, where corn grows all the year around and the springs of pure water are never dried up; the Comanches look forward to hunting buffaloes which are 'abundant and fat'; while the Patagonians hope 'to enjoy the happiness of being eternally drunk.' The conception differs elsewhere as the food, etc., differs. The people of the New Hebrides believe that in the next life 'the cocoanuts and the breadfruit are finer in quality, and so abundant in quantity as never to be exhausted.' Arriaga says that the Peruvians 'do not know, either in this life or in any other, any greater happiness than to have a good farm wherefrom to eat and drink.' And pastoral peoples show a kindred adjustment of belief; the Todas think that after death their buffaloes join them, to supply milk as before."

